4. We must abound in good discourse, and with our tongues must glorify God, and edify others. It is part of the character of a righteous man, (v. 30.) That his mouth speaketh wisdom; not only he speaks wisely, but he speaks wisdom, like Solomon himself, for the instruction of those about him; his tongue talks not of things idle and impertinent, but of judgment, that is, of the word and providence of God, and the rules of wisdom for the right ordering of the conversation. Out of the abundance of a good heart will the mouth speak that which is good, and edify others.

5. We must have our wills brought into an entire subjection to the will and word of God; (v. 31.) The law of God, of his God, is in his heart; and in vain do we pretend that God is our God, if we do not receive his law into our hearts, and resign ourselves to the government of it. It is but a jest and mockery to speak wisdom, and to talk of judgment, (v. 30.) unless we have the law in our hearts, and walk as we speak. The law of God must be a commanding, ruling, principle in the heart; it must be a light there, a spring there, and then the conversation will be regular and uniform, none of his steps will slide; it will effectually prevent backsliding into sin, and the uneasiness that follows from it.

II. What is assured to us, as instances of our happiness and comfort, upon these conditions.

1. That we should have the blessing of God, and that he should bestow the spring, the sweetness, and security, of all our temporal comforts and enjoyments; (v. 22.) Such as be blessed of God, as all the righteous are, with a Father's blessing, by virtue of that shall inherit the earth, or the land, for so the same word is translated, v. 29. the land of Canaan, that glory of all lands. Our creature-comforts are then comforts indeed to us, when we see them flowing from the blessing of God, from his favour, his promise, and his covenant with us; and if we are sure of the blessing of God, we are sure not to want any thing that is good for us in this world. The earth shall yield us her increase, if God, as our own God, gives us his blessing, lxvii. 6. And as those whom God blesses are thus blessed indeed, for they shall inherit the land; so those whom he curses are cursed indeed, and they shall be cut off; and rooted out; and their extirpation by the divine curse will set off the establishment of the righteous, by the divine blessing, and be a fail to it.

2. That God will direct and dispose of our actions and affairs, so as may be most for his glory; (v. 23.) The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord; by his grace and holy Spirit he directs the thoughts, affections, and designs, of good men; he has all hearts in his hand, but theirs by their own consent; by his providence he overrules the events of the world, to the glory of his own name, and plain before them, both what they should do, and what they may expect. Observe, God orders the steps of a good man; not only his way in general, by his written word, but his particular steps, by the whispers of conscience, saying, This is the way, walk in it. He does not always show him his way at a distance, but leads him step by step, as children are led, and so keeps him in a continual dependence upon his guidance; and this, (1.) Because he delights in his way, and is well-pleased with the paths of righteousness wherein he walks. The Lord knows the way of the righteous, (i. 6.) it knows it will, favor, and does as he pleased. (2.) That he may delight in his way. Because God orders according to his own will, therefore he delights in it: for as he loves his own image upon us, so he is well-pleased with what we do under his guidance.

3. That God will keep us from being ruined by our falls either into sin or into trouble; (v. 24.) Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down. (1.) A good man may be overtaken in a fault, but the grace of God shall recover him to repentance, so that he shall not be utterly cast down. Then he may, for a time, lose the joys of God's salvation, yet they shall be restored to him; for God shall uphold him with his hand, uphold him with his free spirit. The root shall be kept alive, though the leaf wither; and there will come a spring after the winter. (2.) A good man may be in distress, his affairs embarrased, his spirits sunk, but he shall not be utterly cast down. God will be the Strength of his heart, when his flesh faileth, and will uphold him with his comforts, so that the spirit he has made shall not fail before him.

4. That he shall not want the necessary supports of this life, (v. 25.) I have been young, and now am old; and, among all the changes I have seen in men's outward condition, and the observations I have made upon them, I never saw the righteous forsaken of God and man, as I have sometimes seen wicked people profits, and mankind; may never go about the earth; nor do I ever remember to have seen the seed of the righteous reduced to that extremity as to beg their bread. David had himself begged his bread of Abimelech the priest, but it was when Saul hunted him; and our Saviour has taught us to except the case of persecution for righteousness sake out of all the temporal promises, (Mark x. 30.) because that has such peculiar honours and comforts attached to the abased, such blessings, as the apostle reckons it, Phil. i. 29.) than a sense of grievance. But there are very few instances of good men, or their families, that are reduced to such extreme poverty as many wicked people bring themselves to by their wickedness. He had not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging their bread; forsaken, so some expound it. If they do want, God will raise them up friends to help them, without a scandalous exposing themselves to the reproach of common beggars; or if they go from door to door for meat, it shall not be with despair, as the wicked man that wanders abroad for bread, saying, Where is it? Job xv. 22. Nor shall he be denied, as the prodigal, that would fain have filled his belly, but no man gave unto him, Luke xxv. 16. Nor shall he grudge, if he be not satisfied, as David's enemies, when they wandered up and down for meat, lix. 15. Some make this promise relate especially to those that are chariable and liberal to the poor, and to intimate that David never observed any that brought themselves to poverty by their charity; it is withholding more than is meet that tends to poverty, Prov. xi. 4.

5. That God will not desert us, but graciously protect us in our difficulties and straits; (v. 28.) The Lord loves judgment; he delights in doing righteousness, and he hath set his face against the enemy of his people, (i. 6.) and against them who mistake, and bring themselves to judgment for righteousness sake; and therefore he forsook not his saints in affliction, when others make themselves strange to them, and become shy of them; but he takes care that they be preserved for ever, that the saints in every age be taken under his protection, that the succession be preserved to the end of time, and that particular saints be preserved from all the temptations, and through all the trials, of this present time, to that happiness which shall be for ever. He will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom, that is, a preservation for ever, 2 Tim. iv. 18. Ps. xii. 7.

6. That we shall have a comfortable settlement in this world, and in a better when we leave this. That we shall dwell forever (Ps. xxxviii. 27.) and be set off, as the seed of the wicked, v. 28. That we shall inherit the land which the Lord our God gives us, and dwell therein for ever, v. 29. They shall not be tossed that make God their Rest, and are at home in him. But on this earth there is no dwelling for ever, no continuing city; it is in heaven only, that city which has foundations, that the righteous shall dwell for ever; that will be their everlasting habitation.

7. That we shall not become a prey to our adversaries, that seek our ruin, v. 32, 33. There is an adversary that takes all opportunities to do us a mischief, a wicked one that watches the righteous, (as a roaring lion watches his prey,) and seeks to slay them; there are wicked men that do so, that are very subtle; they watch the righteous, that they may have an opportunity to do them a mischief effectually, and may have a pretence wherewith to justify themselves in the doing of it; and they are very sly, for they seek to slay him: but it may very well be applied to the wicked one, the Devil, that old serpent, who has his wiles to entrap the righteous, his devices which we should not be ignorant of; that great red dragon, who seeks to slay them; that roaring lion, who goes about continually, restless and raging, and seeking whom he may devour. But it is here promised that he shall not prevail, neither Satan nor his instruments (1.) He shall not prevail as a field-adversary; The Lord will not leave him in his hand; he will not permit Satan to do what he would, nor will he withdraw his strength and grace from his people, but will enable them to resist and overcome him, and their faith shall not fail, Luke xxii. 31, 32. A good man may fall into the hands of a messenger of Satan, and be sorely buffeted, but God will not leave him in his hands, 1 Cor. x. 13. (2.) He shall not prevail as a law-adversary; God will not condemn him unless he is judged, though he be urged to do it by the accuser of their brethren, that accuses them before our God day and night. His false accusations will be thrown out, as these exhibited against Joshua, (Zech. iii. 1, 2.) The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan. It is God that justifies, and then who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect?

34. Wait on the Lord, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it. 35. I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree; 36. Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found. 37. Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace. 38. But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off. 39. But the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord; he is their strength in the time of trouble. 40. And the Lord shall help them, and deliver them: he shall deliver them from the wicked, and save them, because they trust in him.

The psalmist’s conclusion of this sermon, (for that is the nature of this poem,) is of the same purport with the whole, and inculcates the same things.

I. The duty we are pressed upon us is still the same, to wait on the Lord, and keep his way; duty is ours, and we must mind it, and make conscience of it, keep God’s way, and never turn out of it, nor loiter in it, keep close, keep going; but events are God’s, and we must refer ourselves to him for the disposal of them; we must wait on the Lord, attend the motions of his providence, carefully observe them, and conscientiously accommodate ourselves to them. If we make conscience of keeping God’s way, we may with cheerfulness wait and commit to him our way; and we shall find him a good Master both to his working servants and to his waiting servants.

II. The reasons to enforce this duty are much the same too, taken from the certain destruction of the wicked, and the certain salvation of the righteous. This good man, being tempted to envy the prosperity of the wicked, that he might fortify himself against the temptation, goes to the sanctuary of David’s Psalms, (2.) the Lord understands their end, and thence gives us to understand it, and by comparing that with the end of the righteous, baffles the temptation, and puts it to silence. Observe,

1. The misery of the wicked, at last, however they may prosper a while. The end of the wicked shall be cut off; (v. 36.) and that cannot be well, that will undoubtedly end so ill. The wicked, in their prosperity, will not be cut off from all good, and all hopes of it; a final period will be put to all their joys, and they will be forever separated from the fountain of life to all evil. (1.) Some instances of the remarkable ruin of wicked people David had himself observed in this world; that the pomp and prosperity of sinners would not secure them from the judgments of God, when their day was come to fail; (v. 33, 36.) I have seen a wicked man, (the word is singular,) suppose Saul, or Ahithophel, (for Davi d was an old man when he penned this psalm,) in great power, formidable, (so some render it,) the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, carrying all before him with a high hand, and seeming to be firmly fixed, and finely flourishing, spreading himself like a green bay-tree, which produces all leaves and no fruit; like a native home-born Israelite, (so Dr. Hammond,) likely to take root. But what became of him? Eliphaz, long before, had learned, when he saw the foolish taking root, to curse his habitation, Job v. 3. And David saw cause for it; for this bay-tree is withered away as soon as the fig-tree Christ cursed; he was withering away as a dream, as a shadow, such was he, and all the pomp and power he was so proud of; he was gone in an instant, he was not, I sought him with wonder, but he could not be found. He had acted his part, and then quitted the stage, and there was no more of him; (2.) The total and final ruin of sinners, of all sinners, will shortly be made as much a spectacle to the saints, as they are now sometimes made a spectacle to the world; (v. 34.) When the wicked are cut off; (and cut off they certainly will be,) thou shalt see it, with awful adorations of the divine justice. The transgressors shall be destroyed together, v. 38. In this world, God singles out here one sinner, and then another, and so on; but he made an example in terrains—as a warning; but in the day of judgment there will be a general destruction of all the transgressors, and not one shall escape. They that have sinned together shall be

This is one of the penitential psalms; it is full of grief and complaint, from the beginning to the end. David's sins and his afflictions are the cause of his grief and the matter of his complaint. It would seem to be the beginning of his penitence, and in pain, which reminded him of his sins, and helped to humble him for them; he was, at the same time, deserted by his friends, and persecuted by his enemies, so that he had been cut off from all friends and from all sympathy. 1. Of God's displeasure and of his own sin, which provoked God against him, v. 1, 5. II. Of his bodily sickness, v. 6, 10. III. Of the unkindness of his friends, v. 11, IV. Of injuries which his enemies did him, pleading his good conduct toward them, yet confessing his sins against God, v. 12, 20. Lastly, He concludes the psalm with earnest prayers to God, for his gracious presence and help, v. 21, 22. In singing this psalm, we ought to be much affected with the malignity of sin; and if we have not such troubles as are here described, we know not how soon we may have, and therefore we must sing of them by way of preparation, and we know that others have them, and therefore we must sing of them by way of sympathy.

A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

1. O LORD, rebuke me not in thy wrath; neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.
2. For thine arrows stick fast in me, and thy hand presseth me sore.
3. There is no soundness in my flesh because of thine anger; neither is there any rest in my bones because of my sin.
4. For mine iniquities are gone over my head; as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me.
5. My wounds stink, and are corrupt, because of my foolishness.
6. I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly; I go mourning all the day long.
7. For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease; and there is no soundness in my flesh.
8. I am feeble and sore broken: I have roared by reason of the dishueness of my heart.
9. LORD, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee.
10. My heart panteth, my strength faileth me: as for the light of mine eyes, it also is gone from me.
11. My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore; and my kinsmen stand afar off.

The title of this psalm is very observable; it is a psalm 'to bring to remembrance'; the 70th psalm, which was likewise penned in a day of affliction, is so entitled. It is designed, 1. To bring to his own remembrance; we will suppose it penned when he was sick and in pain, and then it teaches us that times of sickness are times to bring to remembrance; to bring the sin to remembrance, for which God contended with us; to awaken our consciences to deal faithfully and plainly with us, and set our sins in order before us, for our humiliation. In a day of adversity, consider. Or we may suppose it penned after his recovery, but designed as a record of the convictions he was under, and the workings of his heart when he was in affliction, that, upon every review of this psalm, he might call to mind the good impressions then made upon him, and make a fresh improvement of them. To the same purport was the writing of Hezekiah, when he had been sick. 2. To put others in mind of the same things which he was himself mindful of, and to teach them what to think, and what to say, when they are sick and in affliction; let them think as he did, and speak as he did.

I. He deprecates the wrath of God and his displeasure in his affliction; (v. 1.) O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath. With this same petition he began another prayer, for the visitation of the sick, v. 1. This was most upon his heart, and should most upon ours, when we are in affliction; that, however God rebukes and chastens us, it may not be in wrath and displeasure, for that will be wormwood and gall in the affliction and misery. Those that would escape the wrath of God, must pray against that, more than any outward affliction, and be content to bear any outward affliction, while it comes from, and consists with, the love of God.

II. He bitterly laments the impressions of God's displeasure upon his soul; (v. 2). Thine arrows stick fast in me. Let Job's complaint (ch. vi. 4.) expand itself, as if by the arrows of the Almighty he means the terrors of God, which did set themselves in array against him. He was under a very melancholy, frightful, apprehension of the wrath of God against him for his sins, and thought he could look for nothing but judgment and fiery indignation to devour him. God's arrows, as they are sure to hit the mark, so they are sure to stick where they hit, to stick fast, till he is pleased to draw them out, and to bind up his hand in his bosom, and wound and slay his terrors. This will be the everlasting misery of the damned—the arrows of God's wrath will stick fast in them, and the wound will be incurable. "Thy hand, thy heavy hand, presses me sore, and I am ready to sink under it; not only lies hard upon me, but it lies long; and who knows the power of God's anger, the weight of his hand?" Sometimes God shot his arrows, and stretched forth his hand, for David, (xviii. 14.) but now against him; so uncertain is the continuance of divine comforts where yet the continuance of divine grace is assured. He complains of God's wrath, as that which inflicted the bodily distemper he was under; (v. 3.) There is no soundness in my flesh, because of thine anger. The bitterness of it, infused in his mind, affected his body; but that was not the worst, it caused the disequilibrium of his heart, by reason of which he forgot the courage of a soldier, the dignity of a prince, and all the cheerfulness of the sweet psalmist of Israel, and resorted terribly, v. 8. Nothing will disquiet the heart of a good man so much as the sense of God's anger; which shows what a fearful thing it is to fall into his hands. The way to keep the heart quiet, is, to keep ourselves in the love of God, and to do nothing to offend him.

III. He acknowledges his sin to be the procuring, provoking, cause of all his troubles, and groans under the load of guilt than any other load, v. 3. He complains that his flesh had no soundness, his bones had no rest, so great an agitation he was in. "It is because of thine anger; that kindles the fire which burns so fiercely," but, in the next words, he justifies God herein, and takes all the blame upon himself. "It is because of my sin. I have deserved it, and so have brought it upon myself; my own iniquities do correct me." If our trouble be the fruit of God's anger, we may thank ourselves, it is our sin that is the cause of it. And all the rest of it is sin that makes us so. If there were not sin in our souls, there would be no pain in our bones, no illness in our bodies.

It is sin, therefore, that this good man complains most of. 1. As a burthen, a heavy burthen; (v. 4.) "Mine iniquities are gone over my head, as proud waters over a man that is sinking and drowning, or as a heavy burthen upon my head, pressing me down, more than I am able to bear," May we be so under the weight of our sin.

The power of sin dwelling in us is a weight; (Heb. xii. 1.) All are clogged with it, it keeps men from soaring upward and pressing forward; all the saints are complaining of it as a body of death they are loaded with, Rom. vii. 24. The guilt of sin committed by us is a burthen, a heavy burthen; it is a burthen to God, he is pressed under it, (Amos ii. 13.) a burthen to the whole creation, which groans under it, Rom. viii. 21, 22. Accordingly, John writes to the sinner himself, either a burthen of repentance, when he is pricked to the heart for it, labouring, and is heavy laden, under it; or a burthen of ruin, when it sinks him to the lowest hell, and will for ever detain him there; it will be a talent of lead upon him, Zech. v. 8. Sinners are said to bear their iniquity. Threatenings are burthens. 2. As wounds, dangerous wounds; (v. 5.) "My wounds stick and are corrupt; (as wounds in the body, rankle and fester, and grow foul, for want of being cleansed and washed after,) and it is through my own foolishness." Sins are wounds, (Gen. iv. 23.) painful, mortal, wounds. Our wounds by sin are often in a bad condition, no care taken of them, no application made to them, and it is owing to the sinner's foolishness, in not confessing sin, xxxii. 3. 4. A slight sore neglected may prove of fatal consequence, and so may a slight sin, slighted and left unrepented of.

IV. He considers the consequences of his afflictions, and gives ease to his grief, by giving vent to it, and pouring out his complaint before the Lord.

1. He was troubled in mind, his conscience was pained, and he had no rest in his own spirit; and a wounded spirit who can bear? He was troubled, or distorted, bowed down greatly, and went mourning all the day long, v. 6. He was always pensive and melancholy, which made him a burthen and terror to himself. His spirit was feeble and sore-broken, and his heart disquieted, v. 7. Herein David, in his sufferings, was a type of Christ, who, being in his agony, cried out, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful. This is a sorner affliction than any other in this world; whatever God is pleased to lay upon us, we have no reason to complain, as long as he preserves to us the use of our reason and the peace of our consciences.

2. He was sick and weak in body; his loins filled with a loathsome disease, some swelling, our necks, or inflammation; some think a plague-sore, such as Hezekiah's boil; and there was no soundness in his flesh, but, like Job, he was all over dismembered. See, (1.) What vile bodies those are which we carry about with us; what grievous diseases they are liable to; and what an offence and grievance they may soon be made by some diseases to the souls that animate them, as they always are a cloud and clog. (2.) That the bodies both of the greatest kings and the best of men have in them the same seeds of diseases that the bodies of others have, and are liable to the same disorders. David himself, though so great a prince, and so great a saint, was not exempt from the most grievous diseases; there was no soundness even in his flesh; probably this was after his sin in the matter of Uriah, and thus did he smart in his flesh for his fleshly lusts. When, at any time, we are dismembered in our bodies, we ought to remember how God has been dishonoured in and through our bodies. He was broken, v. 8. His heart panted, and was in a continual palpitation, v. 10. His strength and limbs failed him; as for the light of his eyes, that was gone from him, either with much weeping, or by a dejection of rheum upon them, or through the lowness of his spirits, and the frequent returns of fainting.

Note. Sickness will tame the strongest body; and the stoutest spirit. David was famed for his courage and great exploits; and yet, when God condescended with him by bodily sickness, and the impressions of his wrath upon his mind, his hair is cut, his heart fails him, and he is become weak as water. Therefore let not the strong man glory in his strength, nor any man set grief at defiance, however it may be thought at a distance.

3. His friends were unkiond to him; (v. 11.) My friends were unknown to me. Our friends may change their looks to us, on the first day of our mirth now stand aloof from my sore; they would not sympathize with him in his griefs, nor so much as come within hearing of his complaints, but, like the priest and Levite, (Luke x. 31.) passed by on the other side. Even his kinsmen, that were bound to him by blood and alliance, stood afar off. See what little reason we have to trust in man, or to wonder if we be disappointed in one has something or other to propose, that may be a mischief to me.” Mischief, covered and carried on by deceit, may well be called a snare.

3. “They are very insolent and abusive; when my foot slips, when I fall into any trouble, or when I make any mistake, misplace a word, or take a false step, they magnify themselves against me, and are ready to found a charge of malice, and to promise themselves that it will ruin my interest, and that, if I slip, I shall certainly fall and be undone.”

4. “They are not only unjust, but very ungrateful; they hate me wrongfully; (v. 19.) I never did them any ill turn, nor so much as bore them any ill-will, nor ever gave them any provocation; nay, they render evil for good, v. 20. Many a kindness I have done them; for which I might have expected a return of kindness less; for my love they call my adversaries,” cix. 4. Such a rooted enmity is in the hearts of wicked men to goodness for its own sake, that they hate it, even then when they themselves have the benefit of it; they hate prayer, even in those that pray for them; and hate peace, even in those that would be at peace with them; but very ill-natured those are whom no courtesy will oblige, who are rather exasperated by it.

5. “They are very impious and devilish; they are my adversaries merely because I follow the thing that good is;” they hated him, not only for his kindness to them, but for his devotion and obedience to God; they hated him because they hated God, and all that bear his image. ‘If we suffer ill for doing well, we must not think it strange; from the beginning it was so; Cain slew Abel, because his works were righteous; nor must we think it hard, because it will not always be so; for so much the greater will our reward be.

6. They are many and mighty; they are lively, they are strong, they are multiplied: (v. 19.) Lord, how are they increased that trouble me? iii. 1. Holy David was weak and faint, his heart panted, and his strength failed, he was melancholy and of a sorrowful spirit, and persecuted by his friends; but, at the same time, his wicked enemies were strong and lively, and their number increased; let us not therefore be surprised if God’s enemies, by their outward condition, none knows love or hatred by all that is before them. It should seem that David, in this, as in other complaints he makes of his enemies, has an eye to Christ, whose persecutors were such as are here described, perfectly lost to all honour and virtue. None hate Christianity, but such as have first divested themselves of the first principles of humanity, and broken through its most sacred bonds.

II. He reflects, with comfort, upon his own peaceable and pious behaviour, under all the injuries and indignities that were done him. It is then only that our enemies do us a real mischief, when they provoke us to sin; (Neh. vi. 13.) when they prevail to put us out of the possession of our own souls, and drive us from God and our duty; if by divine grace we are enabled to prevent this mischief, we quench their fiery darts, and are saved from harm; if still we hold fast our integrity and our peace, can it hurt us? This David did here.

1. He kept his temper, and was not ruffled or discomposed by any of the slights that were put upon him, or the mischievous things that were said or done against him; (v. 13, 14.) “I, as a deaf man, heard not; I took no notice of the affronts put upon me, did not resent them, nor was put into disquiet or by any of the mischiefs they used, or study to return the injury.” Note, The less notice we take of the unkindness and injuries that are done us, the more we consult the quiet of our own minds. Being deaf, he was dumb, as a man in our expectations of kindness from men. Adversity tries friendship, and separates between the precious and the vile. It is our wisdom to make sure a Friend in heaven, who will not stand aloof from our sore, and from whose love no tribulation or distress shall be able to separate us. David, in his troubles, was a type of Christ in his agony, Christ on his cross, feeble and sore-broken, and then desert-ed by his friends and kinsmen, who beheld afar off.

Lastly, In the midst of his complaints he con-forts himself with the cognizance God graciously took both of his griefs and of his prayers; (v. 9.) “Lord, all my desire is before thee; thou knowest what I want, and what I would have, my groaning is not hid from thee. Thou knowest the burthen I groan under, and the blessings I groan after.” The groanings which cannot be uttered are not hid from him that searches the heart, and knows what is the mind of the Spirit, Rom. viii. 26, 27. In singing this, and praying it over, whatever burthen lies upon our spirits, we should by faith cast it upon God, and all our care concerning it, and then be easy.

12. They also that seek after my life lay snares for me; and they that seek my hurt speak mischievous things, and imagine deceits all the day long. 13. But I, as a deaf man, heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth. 14. Thus I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reproves. 15. For in thee, O Lord, do I hope: thou wilt hear, O Lord my God. 16. For I said, Hear me; lest otherwise they should rejoice over me: when my foot slippeth, they magnify them-selves against me. 17. For I am ready to halt, and my sorrow is continually before me. 18. For I will declare mine iniquity; I will be sorry for my sin. 19. But mine enemies are lively, and they are strong; and they that hate me wrongfully are multiplied.

20. They also that render evil for good are mine adversaries; because I follow the thing that good is.

21. Forsake me not, O Lord: O my God, be not far from me. 22. Make haste to help me, O Lord my salvation.

In these verses,
1. David complains of the power and malice of his enemies, who, it should seem, not only took occasion, from the weakness of his body, and the trouble of his mind, to insult over him, but took advantage thence to do him a mischief. He has a great deal to say against them, which he humbly offers as a reason why God should appear for him, as (xxv. 19.) Consider mine enemies.

2. “They are very subtle and politic; they lay snares, they imagine deceits, and herein they are restless and unwearyed, they do it all the day long; they speak mischievous things one to another; every whose mouth there are no reproofs; he was as silent as if he had nothing to say for himself, for fear of putting himself into a heat, and incensing his enemies yet more against him; he would not only not recriminate upon them, but not so much as vindicate himself, lest his necessary defence should be construed his offence. Though they sought after his life, and his silence might be taken for confession of his guilt, yet he was as a dumb man that opens not his mouth. Note, When our enemies are most clamorous, it is, generally, our prudence to be silent, or to say little, lest we make bad worse. David could not hope by his mildness to win upon his enemies, or by his soft answers to turn away their wrath, for they were men of such base spirits, that they rendered him evil for good; and yet he carried it thus meekly toward them, that he made them the better the worse. He did not argue with these men, nor give way to his own heat, and forfeit the divine protection, though he could justify himself, before God he will judge and condemn himself; (v. 18.) "I will declare mine iniquity, and not cover it, I will be sorry for my sin, and not make a light matter of it;" and this helped to make him silent under the rebukes of Providence, and the reproaches of men. Note, If we be truly penitent for sin, that will make us patient under afflication, and particularly so under unjust enemies. Two things are required in repentance, (1.) Confession of sin; "I will declare mine iniquity; I will not only in general own myself a sinner, but I will make a particular acknowledgment of what I have done amiss."

We must declare our sins before God freely and fully, and with their aggravating circumstances, that we may give glory to God, and take shame to ourselves. (2.) Contrition for sin; "I will be sorry for it." he will have sorrow; every true penitent grieves for the dishonour of God, and the wrong he has done to himself; "I will be in care or fear about my sin," (so some,) "in fear lest it ruin me, and in care to get pardoned." IV. He concludes with very earnest prayers to God for his gracious presence with him, and seasonable powerful succour in his distress; (v. 21, 22.) "Forsake me not, O Lord, though my friends forsake me, and though I desverse to be forsaken by them." (v. 7.) He would be as ready as others when the heart is ready to fear them." Nothing goes so far to the heart of a good man in affliction, than to be under the apprehension of God's deserting him in wrath; nor does any thing therefore come more feelingly from his heart than this prayer, "Lord, be not thou far from me; make haste for my help; for I am ready to perish, and in danger of being lost, if relief do not come quickly. God gives us leave, it only to call upon him when we are in trouble, but to come to him in that posture. He promised, He that shall come to God, whom I serve, and on whom I depend to hear me out; and my Salvation, who alone art able to save me, who hast engaged thyself by promise to save me, and from whom alone I expect salvation. Is any afflicted, let him thus pray, let him thus plead, let him thus hope, in singing this psalm.

PSALM XXXIX.

David seems to have been in a great strait, when he penned this psalm, and, upon some account or other, very uneasy; for it is with some difficulty that he conquers his passion, and composes his spirit, himself to take that good counsel which he had given to others, (37.) to rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him, without fretting; for it is best to give the good advice than to take it. (1.) It was a very good example, of quietness under affliction. What was the particular trouble which gave occasion for the conflict David was now in, does not appear. Perhaps it was the disease, the sickness of the body, the surprise of the trial of his patience, and that suggested to him these meditations of mortality; and, at the same time, it should seem too, himself was weak and ill, and under some pre- vailing weakness, which might dispirit him. His condition had advantages against him, and watched for his halting, that they might have something to reproach him for. Thus aggrieved, 1. He relates the struggle that was in his breast, between care and comfort, between passion and prayers, v. 1-3. He meditates upon the doctrine of man's frailty and mortality, and prays to God to instruct him in it, v. 4-6. He applies himself to God for the pardon of his sins, the removal of his afflictions, and the lengthening out of his life till he was ready for death, v. 7-13. This is a funeral psalm, and very proper for the occasion; in singing it, we should get our hearts duly affected with the brevity, uncertainty, and calamitous state, of human life; and those on whose consciences God has, by death, made breaches, will find this psalm of great use to them, in order to their obtaining of what we ought much to aim at under such an affliction, which is, to get it sanctified to us for our spiritual benefit, and to get our hearts reconciled to the holy will of God in it.

To the chief musician, even to Jeduthun. A psalm of David.

I

SAID, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue; I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me. 2. I was dumb with silence; I held my peace, even from good; and my sorrow was stirred. 3. My heart was hot within me; while I was musing the fire burned: then spake I with my tongue, 4. Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am. 5. Behold, thou hast made my days as a hand-breadth, and mine age is as nothing before thee: verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Selah. 6. Surely every man walketh in a vain show: surely they are disquieted in vain; he healeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them.

David here recollects, and leaves upon record, the workings of his heart under his afflictions; and it is good for us to do so, that what was thought amiss, may be amended, and what was well thought of, may be improved the next time.

1. He remembered the covenants he had made with God, to walk circumspectly, and to be very cautious both of what he did, and what he said. When, at any time, we are tempted to sin, and are in danger of falling into it, we must, call to mind the solemn vows we have made against sin, against the particular sin we are upon the brink of. God can, and will, remind us of them; (Jer. ii. 20.) Thou say'st, I will not transgress; and therefore we ought to remind ourselves of them. So David did here.

2. He remembers that he had resolved, in general, to be very cautious and circumspect in his walking; (v. 1.) I said, I will take heed to my ways; and it was well said, and what he would never in, and therefore must never gainsay. Note, (1.) It is the great concern of every one of us, to take heed to our ways, that is, to walk circumspectly, while others walk at all adventures. (2.) We ought steadfastly to resolve that we will take heed to our ways, and frequently to renew that resolution; fast bind, fast find. (3.) Having resolved to take heed to our ways, we must, upon all occasions, remind ourselves of that resolution, for it is a covenant never to be forgotten, but which we must be always mindful of.

2. He remembers that he had in particular covenanted against tongue sins—That he would not sin with his tongue. That he would not speak amiss, either to offend God, or offend the generation of the right way; (Jer. ii. 17.) A word not so good as we could wish, not to sin in thought; but if an evil thought should arise in his mind, he would lay his hand upon his mouth, and suppress it, that it should go no further: and this is so great an attainment, that if any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man; and so needful a one, that he who seems to be reli-

David had resolved, (1.) That he would, at all times, watch against tongue sins. “I will keep a bridle, or muzzle, upon my mouth;” a bridle upon it, as upon an unruly horse, to guide and direct it, to check and curb it, to keep it in the right way, and on a good path; when he was watching in the habit, is the bridle upon the head; watchful-ness in the act and exercise, is the hand upon the bridle, a muzzle upon it, as upon an unruly dog that is fierce, and does mischief; by particular steadfast resolution, corruption is restrained from breaking out at the lips, and so is muzzled. (2.) That he would double his guard against them, when there was most danger of scandal; when the wicked is before me, how can I keep from being in company with the wicked, he would take heed of saying any thing that might harden them, or give occasion to them to blaspheme. If good men fall into bad company, they must take heed what they say. Or, when the wicked is before me, in my thoughts. When he was contemplating the pride and power, the prosperity and flourishing estate, of evil-doers, he was tempted to speak amiss; and therefore then he would take special care what he said. Note, the stronger the resolution is, the stronger the resolution must be against it.

II. Pursuant to these covenants, he made a shift, with much ado, to bridle his tongue; (v. 2.) I was dumb with silence, I held my peace even from good. His silence was commendable; and the greater the provocation was, the more praise-worthy was his silence. Watchfulness and resolution, in the strength of God’s grace, will do more toward the bridling of the tongue than we can imagine, though it be an un evil. But what shall we say of his keeping silence even from good? Was it his wisdom, that he restrained good discourse when the wicked were before him, because he would not cast pearls before swine? I rather think it was his weakness; because he might not say anything, he would say nothing, but ran into an extreme, which was a rethor to the law, for that prescribes a mean between extremes. The same law which forbids all corrupt communication, forbids also that, which is good, and to the use of edifying, Eph. iv. 29.

III. The less he spoke, the more he thought, and the more warmly. Binding the discomposed part, did but draw the humour to it; My sorrow was stirred, my heart was hot within me, v. 3. He could bridle his tongue, but he could not keep his passion under; though he suppressed the smoke, that was as a fire in his bones, and while he was musing upon his afflictions, and upon the prosperity of the wicked, the fire burned. Note, Those that are of a fretful discontented spirit, ought not to pore much, for, while they suffer their thoughts to dwell upon the causes of the calamity, the fire of their discontent is fed with fuel, and burns the more furiously. Impatience is a sin that has its ill cause within ourselves, and that is musing, and its ill effects upon ourselves, and that is less than burning. If there were we could prevent the mischief of ungoverned passions, we must redress the grievance of un gover ned thoughts.

IV. When he did speak, at last, it was to the purpose; At the last, I spoke with my tongue; some make what he said, to be the breach of his good purpose, and that, in what he said, he sinned with his tongue; and so they make what follows, to be a passionate wish, that he might die like Elijah, Kings i. 9. But I rather take it to be, not the breach of his good purpose, but the reformation of his mistake in carrying it too far; he had kept silence from good, but now he would so keep silence no longer. He had no thing to say to the wicked that were before him, for to them he knew not how to place his words, but, after long musing, the first word he said, was, a prayer, and a devout meditation upon a subject, which it will be good for us all to think much of.

He prays to God, that we may be able of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the near approach of death; (v. 4.) Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days. He does not mean, "Lord, let me know how long I shall live, and when I shall die," we could not, in faith, pray such a prayer, for God has no where promised to let us know, but has, in wisdom, locked up that knowledge among the secret things which belong not to us, nor would it be good for us to know it, but let it be a subject to consider, "I know mine end," means, "Lord, give me wisdom and grace to consider it."

The living know that they shall die, (Eccl. ix. 5.) but few care for thinking of it; we have therefore need to pray, that God by his grace would conquer that aversion which is in our corrupt hearts, to the thoughts of death. "Lord, make me to consider," (1.) What death is; it is my end, the end of my life, and all the employments and enjoyments of life; it is the end of all men. (2.) It is a final period to our state of probation and preparation, and an awful entrance upon a state of recompense and retribution. To the wicked man, it is the end of all his joys; to a godly man, it is the end of all his griefs. "Lord, give me to know my end, to be better acquainted with death, to make it more familiar to me, (Job xvii. 14.) and to be more affected with the greatness of the change. Lord, give me to consider what a serious thing it is to die."

(2.) "How near it is; Lord, give me to consider the measure of my days, that they are measured in the counsel of God; the end is a fixed end, so the word signifies, My days are determined; (Job xlv. 5.) and that the measure is but short; "My days will soon be numbered and finished." When we look upon death as a thing at a distance, we are tempted to adjourn the necessary preparations for it; but when we consider how short life is, we shall see ourselves concerned to do what our hand finds to do, not only with all our might, but with all possible expedition. (3.) That it is continually working in us; "Lord, give me to consider how frail I am, how scanty the stock of life is, and how faint the spirits, which are as the oil, to keep that lamp burning. We find, by daily experience, that the earthly house of this tabernacle is mouldering and going to decay; "Lord, make me to consider this, that we may secure mansions in the house not made with hands."

2. He meditates upon the brevity and vanity of life, pleasing it with God's mercy under the burdens of life, as Job often, and pining it with himself, for his quickening to the business of life. (1.) Man's life on earth is short, and of no continuance, and that is a reason why we should sit close to it, and prepare for the end of it; (v. 5.) He who has not made life his chief end breaks breathes, the breaths, a certain dimension, a small one, and the measure whereof we have always about us, always before our eyes; we need no rod, no pole, no measuring line, wherewith to take the dimension of our days, nor any skill in arithmetic wherewith to compute the number of them; no, we have the standard of them at our fingers' end, and there is no multiplication of it, it is but one hand breadth in all. Our time is short, and God has made it so; for our time is long with him; it is short, and he knows it to be so; "It is as nothing before thee." He remembers how short our time is, lxxxxx. 47. "It is nothing in comparison with thee," so some. All time is nothing to God's eternity, much less our share of time. (2.) Man's life on earth is vain, and of no value, and therefore it is folly to be fond of it, and wisdom to make sure of a better life. Adam is Abel, man is vanity, in his present state; he is not what he seems to be, has not what he promised himself; he shall all that until lie at a continual uncertainty, and if there were not another life after this, all things considered, he were made in vain. He is vanity; he is mortal, he is mutable. Observe how emphatically this truth is expressed here. [1.] Every man is vanity, without exception; high and low, rich and poor, all meet in this. [2.] He is so at his best estate, when he is young, and strong, and healthful, in wealth and honour, and the height of prosperity; when he is most easy, and merry, and secure, and thinks himself most happy.

[3.] He is altogether vanity, as vain as you can imagine. All man is all vanity, so it may be read; every thing about him is uncertain, nothing is substantial and durable but what relates to the new man. [4.] Verily he is so. This is a truth of undoubted certainty, but which we are very unwilling to believe, and need to have solemnly attested to us, as indeed it is by frequent instances. [5.] Selah is annexed, as a note commanding observation. "Stop here, and pause a while, that you may take time to consider and apply this truth, that every man is vanity."

We ourselves are so.

Now, for the proof of the vanity of man, as mortal, he here mentions three things, and shows the vanity of each of them, v. 6. First, The vanity of our joys and honours: Surely every man walks (even when he walks in state, when he walks in measure,) as a shadow, in an image, in a vain show. When he makes a figure, his fashion passes away, and his great pomp is but great fancy, Acts xxv. 23. It is but a show, and therefore a vain show, like the rainbow, the gaudy colours of which must needs vanish and disappear quickly, when the substratum is but a cloud, a vapour; such is life, (Jam. iv. 14.) and therefore such are all the gaieties of it. Secondly, The vanity of our griefs and fears; Surely they are disquieted in vain. Our disquietudes are often groundless; we vex ourselves without any just cause, and the occasions of our trouble are often the creatures of our own fancy and imagination: and they are always fruitless; we disquiet ourselves in vain, for we cannot, with all our disquietment, alter the nature of things, nor the counsel of God; things will be as they are, when we have disquieted ourselves ever so much about them. Thirdly, The vanity of our cares and toils. He takes a great deal of pains to show this, and they are but a cloud of man's musings in the furrows of the field, good for nothing, unless they be spread. But when he has filled his treasures with his trash, he knows not who shall gather them, nor to whom they shall descend when he is gone: for he shall not take them away with him. He asks not, For whom do I labour? and that is his folly, Eccl. iv. 8. But if he did ask, he could not tell whether he should be a wise man or a fool, a friend or a foe; (Eccl. ii. 19.) This is vanity.

7. And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee. 8. Deliver me from all my transgressions; make me not the reproach of the foolish. 9. I was dumb, and opened not my mouth; because thou didst it. 10. Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thy hand. 11. When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou maketh his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. Selah. 12. Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear unto my cry; hold not thy peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were. 13. O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more.

The psalmist, having meditated on the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the vanity and vexation of spirit that attend all the comforts of life, here, in these verses, turns his eyes and heart heavenward. When there is no solid satisfaction to be had in the creature, it is to be found in God, and in communion with him; and to him we should be driven by our appointments in the world. David here expresses,

I. His dependence on God, v. 7. Seeing all is vanity, and man himself is so, 1. He despairs of a happiness in the things of the world, and disclaims all expectation from it: "Now, Lord, what wait I for? Even nothing from the things of sense and time; I have nothing to wish for, nothing to hope for, from this earth." Note, The consideration of the vanity and frailty of human life, should deaden our desires to the things of this world, and lower our expectations from it. If the world be such a thing as this, God deliver me from having or seeking my portion in it. We cannot count upon constant health and prosperity, nor upon comfort in any relation, for it is all as uncertain as our continuance here. "Now, though I have sometimes foolishly promised myself this and the other, from the world, now I am of another mind." 2. He still holds happiness and satisfaction in God: My hope is in thee. Note, When creature-confidences fail, it is our comfort that we have a God to go to, a God to trust to, and we should thereby be quickened to take so much the faster hold of him by faith.

II. His submission to God, and his cheerful acquiescence in his holy will, v. 9. If our hope be in God for a happiness in the other world, we may well afford to reconcile ourselves to all the dispensations of his providence concerning us in this world; "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, in a way of complaint and murmuring." He now again recovered that serenity and sedateness of mind which were disturbed, v. 2. Whatever comforts he is deprived of, whatever crosses he is burdened with, he will be easy; "because thou didst it;" it did not come to pass by chance, but according to the counsel of God. We may here see, 1. A good God doing all, and ordering all events concerning us. Of every event we may say, "This is the finger of God, it is the Lord's doing," whoever were the instruments. 2. A good man, for that reason, saying nothing against it. He is dumb, he has nothing to object, no question to ask, no dispute to raise upon it. All that God does is well done.

III. His desire toward God, and the prayers he puts up to him; Is any afflicted? Let him pray, as David here,

1. For the pardoning of his sin, and the preventing of his shame, v. 8. Before he prays, (v. 10.) Remove thy stroke from me, he prays, (v. 8.) "Deliver me from all mine offences, from the guilt I have contracted, the punishment I have deserved, and the power of corruption I have beencaptivated by." When God forges our sins, he delivers us from them, when he delivers us from them all. He pleads, Make me not a reproach to the foolish. Wicked people are foolish people; and then they show their folly most, when they think to show their wit, by scoffing at God's people. When David prays that God would pardon his sins, and not make him a reproach, it is to be taken as a prayer for peace of conscience; ("Lord, leave me not to the power of melancholy, which the foolish will laugh at me for;") and as a prayer for grace, that God would never leave him to himself, so far as to do any thing that might make him a reproach to bad men. Note, This is a good reason why we should both watch and pray against sin, because the credit of our profession is nearly concerned in the preservation of our integrity.

2. For the removal of his affliction, that he might speedily be eased of his present burdens; (v. 10.) Remove thy stroke away from me. Note, When we are under the correcting hand of God, our eye must be to God himself, and not to any other, for relief. He only, that inflicts the stroke, can remove it; and we may then, in faith, and with satisfaction, pray that our afflictions may be removed, when our ways are pleasant, (Isa. xxxviii. 17.) and when, as here, the psalmist is saying, "I am sick, and have no work, and we are humbled under the hand of God. (1.) He pleads the great extremity he was reduced to by his affliction, which made him the proper object of God's compassion; I am consumed by the blow of thy hand. His sickness prevailed to that degree, that his spirits failed, his strength was wasted, and his body emaciated. "The blow, or conflict, of thy hand has brought me even to the gates of death." Note, the strongest resolutions, and the best of men cannot bear up under, much less make head against, the power of God's wrath. It was not his case only, but any man will find himself an unequal match for the Almighty, v. 11. When God, at any time, contends with us, when with rebukes he corrects us, [1.] We cannot imitate the equity of his controversy, but must acknowledge that he is righteous in it; for, whenever he corrects man, it is for iniquity. Our ways and our doing procure the trouble to ourselves, and we are beaten with a rod of our own making. It is the yoke of our transgressions, though it be bound with his hand, Lam. i. 14. [2.] We cannot oppose the effects of his controversy, but he will be too hard for us. As we have nothing to move in arrest of his judgment, so we have no way of escaping the execution. God's rebukes make man's beauty to consume away like a moth; we often see, we sometimes feel, how much the body is weakened and decaying by knowledge in a little time; the countenance is changed; where are the ruddy cheek and lip, the sprightly eye, the lively look, the smiling face? It is the reverse of all this that presents itself to view. What a poor thing is beauty; and what fools are they that are proud of it, or in love with it, when it will certainly, and may quickly, be consumed thus! Some make the moth to represent man, who is as easily crushed as a moth with the touch of a finger, Job i. 9. Others make it to represent the divine rebukes, which silently and insensibly waste and consume us, as the moth does the garment. All which abundantly proves what he had said before, that surely every man is vanity, weak and helpless; so he will be found when God comes to contend with him.

had set him a praying; and afflictions are sent to stir up prayer. If they have that effect, and, when we are afflicted, we pray more, and pray better, than before, we may hope that God will hear our prayer, and give ear to our cry; for the prayer which, by his providence, he gives occasion for, and which, by his Spirit of grace, he indites, shall not return void. [3.] It had helped to weary him from the world, and, in the midst of his distress, he had begun, more than ever, to look upon himself as a stranger and sojourner here, like all his fathers, not at home in this world, but travelling through it to another, to a better, and would never reckon himself at home till he came to heaven. He pleads it with God; "Lord, take cognizance of me, and of my wants and burdens, for I am a stranger here, and therefore meet with strange usage; I am slighted and oppressed as a stranger; and whence should I expect relief from, than from that other country to which I belong?"

Lastly, He prays for a reprove yet a little longer; (v. 13.) "O spare me, ease me, raise me up from this illness, that I may recover strength both in body and mind, that I may get into a more calm and composed frame of spirit, and may be better prepared for another world, before I go hence by death, and shall be no more in this world." We may make this to be the prayer of a passionate soul, that God would send him help quickly, or it would be too late, like that, Job x. 20, 21. But I rather take it as a pious prayer, that God would continue him here, till by his grace he had made him fit to go hence, and that he might finish the work of life, before his life was finished; Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee.

PSALM XL.

It should seem, David penned this psalm, upon occasion of his deliverance, by the power and goodness of God, from some great and pressing trouble, by which he was in danger of being overwhelmed; probably, it was some trouble of mind, arising from a sense of sin, and of God's displeasure against him for it; whatever it was, the same Spirit that indited his praises for that deliverance, was in him, at the same time, a Spirit of prophecy, testifying of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Thus; if ever he was aware, he was led to speak of Christ's undertaking, and the discharge of his undertaking, in words that must be applied to Christ only; and therefore how far the praises that here go before Christ's undertaking, and the prophecies that follow, may safely and profitably be applied to him, it will be worth while to consider. In this psalm, I. David records God's favour to him, in delivering him out of his deep distress, with thankfulness to his praise, v. 1-5. II. That he takes occasion to speak of the work of our redemption by Christ, v. 6-10. III. That gives him encouragement to pray to God for mercy and grace, both for himself and for his friends, v. 11-17. If, in singing this psalm, we mix faith with the prophecy of Christ, and join in sincerity with the praises and prayers here offered up, we make melody with our hearts to the Lord.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. WA I TED patiently for the Lord; and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry. 2. He brought me up also out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. 3. And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God: many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord. 4. Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust; and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies. 5. Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works when thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward: they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered.

In these verses, we have,

I. The great distress and trouble that the psalmist had been in. He had plunged into a horrible pit, and into miry clay, (v. 2.) out of which he was brought himself, and God held him back from drowning himself sinking yet further. He says nothing, here, either of the sickness of his body, or the insults of his enemies, and therefore we have reason to think it was some inward disquiet, and perplexity of spirit, that was now his greatest grievance. Despondency of spirit, under the sense of God's withdrawals, and prevailing doubts and fears about the eternal state, are indeed a horrible pit many are in, and have been so to many a dear child of God.

II. His humble attendance upon God, and his believing expectations from him in those depths; I waited patiently for the Lord, v. 1. Waiting, I waited. He expected relief from no other than from God; the same hand that tears, must heal, that smites, must bind up, (Hos. vi. 1.) it will never be done. From God he expected relief, and having no other to expect, or to doubt it would come in due time. There is power both in God to help the weakest, and grace enough in God to help the unworthiest, of all his people that trust in him. But he waited patiently; which intimates that the relief did not come quickly; yet he doubted not but it would come, and resolved to continue believing, and hoping, and praying, till it did come. Those whose expectation is from God may wait with assurance, but must wait with patience. Now this is very applicable to Christ. His agony, both in the garden, and on the cross, was the same continued, and it was a horrible pit and miry clay. Then was his soul troubled and exceeding sorrowful; but then he prayed, Father, glorify thy name; Father, save me; then he kept hold of his relation to his Father, "My God, my God," and thus waited patiently for him.

III. His comfortable experience of God's goodness to him in his distress, which he records for the honour of God, and his own and others' encouragement.

1. God answered his prayers; He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. Those that wait patiently for God, though they may wait long, do not wait in vain. Our Lord Jesus was heard, in that he feared, Heb. v. 7. Nay, he was sure that the Father heard him always. 2. He showed his fears, and stilled the tumult of his spirits, and gave him a settled peace of conscience; (v. 2.) He brought me out of that horrible pit of despondency and despair, scattered the clouds, and shone bright upon my soul, with the assurances of his favour; and not only so, but set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. Those that have been under the prevalence of a religious melancholy, and by the grace of God have been delivered, may apply this very feeling to themselves; they are brought up out of a horrible pit. (1.) The mercy is completed by the setting of their feet upon a rock, where they find firm footing, are as much elevated with the hopes of heaven, as they were, before, cast down with the fears of hell. Christ is the Rock on which a poor soul may stand fast, and on whose mediation alone between us and God we can build any solid hopes or satisfaction. (2.) It is continued in the establishment of their goings. Where God has given a steadfast hope, he expects there should be a steady, regular, conversation; and if that be the blessed fruit of it, we have reason to acknowledge, with abundances of thankfulness, the riches and power of his grace.
3. He filled him with joy, as well as peace, in believing; "He has put a new song in my mouth; he has given me cause to rejoice, and a heart to rejoice." He was brought, as it were, into a new world. See Rom. vi. 10. His new song, even praise to our God; for to his praise and glory, must all our songs be sung. Fresh mercies, especially such as we never before received, call for new songs. This is applicable to our Lord Jesus, in his reception to paradise, his resurrection from the grave, and his exaltation to the joy and glory set before him; he was brought out of the horrible pit, set upon a rock, and had a new song put in his mouth.

IV. The good improvement that should be made of this instance of God's goodness to David.

1. David's experience would be an encouragement to many to hope in God, and, for that end, he leaves it here upon record; Many shall see, and fear, and trust in the Lord. They shall fear the Lord and his justice, which brought David, and the Son of David, into that horrible pit; and shall say, The Lord shall distinguish; This shall he done to the dry? They shall fear the Lord and his goodness, in filling the mouth of David, and the Son of David, with new songs of joy and praise. There is a holy, reverent, fear of God, which is not only consistent with, but the foundation of, our hope in him. They shall not fear him and shun him, but fear him and trust in him, in their greatest straights, not doubting but to find him as able and ready to help them as David did, in his distress. God's deserting us, and our great, Continued encouragement to trust in God; when it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief for our sins, he demanded our debt from him; and when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand, he made it to appear that he had accepted the payment he made, and was satisfied with it; and what greater encouragement can we have to fear and worship God, and to trust in him? (Ps. xxii. 23. v. 1, 2.)

The psalmist invites others to make God their Hope, as he did, by pronouncing those happy that do so; (v. 4.) "Blessed is the man that maketh the Lord his Trust, and him only; that has great and good thoughts of him, and is entirely devoted to him, and respects not the proud; does not do as they do that trust in themselves, nor depends upon those who proudly encourage others to trust in them, for both the one and the other turn aside to lies, as indeed all those that do turn aside from God." This is applicable, particularly, to our faith in Christ. Blessed are they that trust in him, and in his righteousness alone, and respect not the proud Pharisees, that set up their own righteousness in competition with that, that will not be governed by their dictates, nor turn aside to lies, with the unbelieving Jews, who submit not to the righteousness of God, Rom. x. 3. Blessed are they who escape that temptation.

2. The joyful sense he had of this mercy, led him to observe, with thankfulness, the many other favours he had received from God, v. 5. When God puts new songs into our mouth, we must not forget our former songs, but repeat them; "Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, both for me and others; this is but one of many." Many are the benefits with which we are daily loaded, both by the providence, and by the grace, of God. (1.) They are his works; not only the gifts of his bounty, but the operations of his power; he works for us, he works in us, and thus he favours us with matter, not only for thanks, but for praise. (2.) They are wonderful; the contrivance of them admirable; his condescension to us, in bestowing them upon us, admirable; eternity itself will be short enough to be spent in the admiration of them. (3.) All his wonderful works are the product of his thoughts to us-ward. He does all, according to the counsel of his own will, (Eph. i. 11.) the purposes of his grace which he purposed in himself, according to the counsel of his will, (Eph. i. 11.) These are the projects of infinite wisdom, the designs of everlasting love; (1 Cor. ii. 7. Jer. xxxiii. 3.) thoughts of good, and not of evil, Jer. xxix. 11. His gifts and callings will therefore be without repentance, because they are not sudden resolves, but the result of his thoughts, his many thoughts, to us-ward. (4.) They are innumerable; they cannot be methodised, or reckoned up in order; there is an order in all God's works, but they are so many that present themselves to our view at once, that we know not where to begin, nor which to name next; the order of them, and their natural references and dependencies, and how the links of the golden chain are joined, are a mystery to us, and what we shall not be able to account for, till the vail be rent, and the mystery of God finished. Nor can they be counted, not the heads of them; when we have said the most we can, of the wonders of divine love to us, we must conclude with an Et cetera, and adore the depth, despairing to find the bottom.

6. Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt-offering and sin-offering hast thou not required. ; Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me; 8. I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart. 9. I have preached righteousness in the great congregation: lo, I have not refrained my lips. O Lord, thou knowest. 10. I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation: I have not concealed thy loving-kindness and thy truth from the great congregation.

The psalmist, being struck with amazement at the wonderful works that God had done for his people, is strangely carried out here to foretell that work of wonder which excels all the rest, and is the foundation and foretaste of all, that of our redemption by our Lord Jesus Christ. God's thoughts, which were to us-ward concerning that work, were the most curious, the most copious, the most gracious, and therefore to be most admired. This paragraph is quoted by the apostle, (Heb. x. 5, &c.) and applied to Christ, and his undertaking for us. As in the institutions, so in the devotions, of the Old Testament, there is more of Christ than perhaps the Old Testament saints were aware of; and when the apostle would speak of the Redeemer's voluntary undertaking of his work, he does not fetch his account out of the book of God's secret counsels, which belong not to us, but from the things revealed. Observe,

1. The utter insufficiency of the legal sacrifices to atone for sin, in order to our peace with God and our happiness in him; Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; thou wouldest not have the Redeemer to offer them; something he must have to offer, but not these; (Heb. viii. 3.) therefore he must not be of the house of Aaron, Heb. vii. 14.
Or, In the days of the Messiah, burnt-offering and sin-offering will be no longer required, but all those ceremonial institutions will be abolished. But that is not all; even while the law concerning them was in full force, it might be said, God did not desire them, nor accept them, for they could in no way yield the guilt of sin by satisfying God's justice; the life of a sheep, which is so much inferior in value to that of a man, (Matth. xii. 12,) could not pretend to be an equivalent, much less an expedient, to preserve the honour of God's government and laws, and repair the injury done to that honour by the sin of man. They could not take away the terror of sin, by pacifying the conscience, nor the power of wicked influence; nor could they counteract the fear of Him, who is the fountain of the life of a sheep, which is so much inferior in value to that of a man it was written of him. 1. In the close rolls of the divine decree and counsel; there it was written, that his ear was opened, and he said, Lo, I come, there the covenant of redemption was recorded, the counsel of peace between the Father and the Son and the Holy Ghost; and he had an everlasting commandment he received of his Father. 2. In the letters patent of the Old Testament, Moses and all the prophets testified of him; in all the volumes of that book something or other was written of him, which he had an eye to, that all might be accomplished, John xix. 28.

V. The pleasure he took in his undertaking; having freely offered himself to it, he did not fail, nor shew that it was a wretched business; but, to the contrary, did experience satisfaction to himself; (v. 8, 9;) I delight to do thy will, O my God; it was, to Christ, his meat and drink to go on with this work appointed to him; (John iv. 34.) and the reason here given, is, Thy law is within my heart; it is written there, it rules there, it is an active commanding principle there. It is meant of the law, concerning the work and office of the Mediator, what he was to do and suffer; this law was dear to him, and had an influence upon him in his whole undertaking. Note, When the law of God is written in our hearts, our duty will be our delight.

VI. The publication of the gospel to the children of men, even in the great congregation, v. 9, 10. The same that, as a Priest, wrought out redemption for us, as a Prophet, by his own preaching first, then by his apostles, and still by his word and Spirit, makes it known to us. The great salvation began to be spoken by the Lord, Heb. ii. 5. It is the gospel of Christ, that is preached to all nations. Observe, 1. What it is that is preached; it is righteousness, (v. 9;) God's righteousness, (v. 10;) the everlasting righteousness which Christ has brought in; (Dan. ix. 24.) compare Rom. i. 16, 17. It is God's faithfulness to his promise, and the salvation which had long been looked for. It is God's loving-kindness and his truth, his mercy according to his word. Note, In the work of our redemption, we ought to take notice how bright all the divine attributes shine, and give to God the praise of each of them. 2. To whom it is preached; to the great congregation, (v. 9;) and again, v. 10. When Christ was here on earth, he preached to multitudes, thousands at a time. The gospel was preached both to Jews and Gentiles, to great congregations of both. Solemn religious assemblies are a divine institution, and in them the glory of God, in the face of Christ, ought to be both praised, to the glory of God, and preached for the edification of men. 3. How it is preached; freely and openly; I have not restrained my lips, I have not hid it, I have not concealed it. This intimates, that whoever undertook to preach the gospel of Christ, would be in great temptation to hide it and conceal it, because it must be preached with great contention, and in the face of great opposition; but Christ himself, and those whom he calls to that work, set their faces as a flint. (Isa. v. 22.) They were sufficiently carried on in it. It is well for us, that they were so, for by this means our eyes come to see this joyful light, and our ears to hear this joyful sound; which otherwise we might for ever have perished in ignorance of.

11. Withhold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O Lord: let thy loving-kindness and thy truth continually preserve me. 12. For innumerable evils have compassed me about; mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up: they are more than the hairs of my head; therefore my heart faileth. 13. Be pleased, O Lord, to deliver me: O Lord, make haste to help me. 14. Let them be ashamed and confounded together that seek after my soul to destroy it; let them be driven backward, and put to shame, that wish me evil. 15. Let them be desolate for a reward of their shame, that say unto me, Aha, aha! 16. Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee: let such as love thy salvation say continually, The Lord be magnified. 17. But I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me: thou art my help and my deliverer; make no tarrying, O my God.

The psalmist, having meditated upon the work of redemption, and spoken of it in the person of the Messiah, now comes to make improvement of the doctrine of his mediation between us and God, and therefore speaks in his own person. Christ having done his Father's will, and finished his work, and given orders for the preaching of the gospel to every creature, we are encouraged to come boldly to the throne of grace, for mercy and grace.

I. This may encourage us to pray for the mercy of God, and to put ourselves under the protection of that mercy; (v. 11.) "Lord, thou hast not spared thy Son, nor withheld him; withhold not thou thy tender mercies then, which thou hast laid up for us in him; for wilt thou not with him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. viii. 32.) "Let thy loving-kindness and thy truth continually preserve me." The best saints are in continual danger, and see themselves undone, if they be not continually preserved by the grace of God; and the everlasting loving-kindness and truth of God are that which we have to depend upon for our preservation to the heavenly kingdom, lxi. 7.

II. This may encourage us, in reference to the guilt of sin, that Jesus Christ has done that towards our discharge from it which sacrifice and offering could not do. See here, 1. The frightful sight he had of sin, v. 12. This was that which made the discovery he was now favoured with, of a Redeemer, very welcome to him. He saw his iniquities to be evils, the worst of evils; he saw that they compassed him about; in all the reviews of his life, and his reflections upon each step of it, still he discovered something amiss. The threatening consequences of his sin surrounded him; look which way he would, he saw some mischief or other waiting for him, which he was conscious to himself his sins had deserved. He saw them taking hold of him, arresting him, as the bulwark does the poor debtor; he saw them to be innumerable, and more than the hairs of his head. Convinced, awakened, consciences are apprehensive of danger from the numberless number of the sins of infirmity, which seem small as hairs, but, being numerous, are very dangerous; Who can understand his errors? God numbers our hairs, (Matth. x. 30.) which yet we cannot number; so he keeps an account of our sins, which we cannot account. The sight of them oppressed him, that he could not look up, or lift up his head; I am not able to look up, much less could he keep up his heart; therefore my heart fails me. Note, The sight of our sins in their own colours would drive us to distraction, if we had not at the same time some sight of a Saviour. 2. The careful course he had to God, under the sense of sin; (v. 10.) seeing himself brought by his sins to the very brink of ruin, eternal ruin, with what a holy passion does he cry out, "Be pleased, O Lord, to deliver me; (v. 13.) O save me from the wrath to come, and the present terrors I am in, through the apprehensions of that wrath; I am undone, I die, I perish, without speedy relief. In a case of this nature, where the bliss of an immortal soul is concerned, delays are dangerous; therefore, O Lord, make haste to help me."

III. This may encourage us to hope for victory over our spiritual enemies, that seek after our souls to destroy them; (v. 14.) they meditate about continually seeking to devour. If Christ has triumphed over them, we, through him, shall be more than conquerors. In the belief of this, we may pray, with humble boldness, let them be ashamed and confounded together, and driven backward, v. 15. Both the conversion of a sinner, and the glorification of a saint, are great disappointments to Satan, who does this among us, with all his power and subtlety, to hinder both; now, our Lord Jesus having undertaken to bring about the salvation of all his chosen, we may in faith pray, that, both these ways, that great adversary may be confounded. When a child of God is brought into that horrible pit, and the miry clay, Satan cries, Aha, aha, thinking he has gained his point; but he shall rage when he sees the brand plucked out of the fire, and shall be desolate, for a reward of his scorn. The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan. The accuser of the brethren is cast out.

IV. This may encourage all that seek God, and love his salvation, to rejoice in him, and to praise him, v. 16. See here, 1. The character of good people; conformably to the laws of natural religion, they seek God, desire his favour, and in all their exigencies apply themselves to him, as a people should seek unto their God; conformably to the laws of revealed religion, they love his salvation, that great salvation of which the prophets insisted and searched diligently, which the Redeemer undertook to work out when he said, Lo, I come. All that shall be saved love the salvation, not only as a salvation from hell, but a salvation from sin. 2. The happiness secured to good people by this prophetic prayer; They that seek God shall rejoice and be glad in him, and with good reason, for he will not only be found of them, but will be their happiness. But, saith he, Their salvation shall be filled with the joy of his salvation, and shall say continually, The Lord be magnified; and thus they shall have a heaven upon earth; blessed are they that are thus still praising God.

Lastly, This may encourage the saints, in distress and affliction, to trust in God, and comfort themselves in him, v. 17. David himself was one of these, I am poor and needy; a king, perhaps, now on the throne, and yet, being troubled in spirit, he calls himself poor and needy, lest and undone, without a Saviour; in want and distress, yet the Lord thinketh upon me, in and through the Mediator, by whom we are made accepted. Men forget the poor and needy, and seldom think of them; but God's thoughts toward them, which he had spoken of, (v. 5.) are their support and comfort. They may assure themselves that God is their Help in trouble, their troubles, and will be, in due time, their Deliverer out of all their trouble; they will make no long tarrying; for the vision is for an appointed time, and therefore, though it tarry, we may wait for it, for it shall come; it will come, it will not tarry.

PSALMS XL.

God's kindness and truth have often been the support and comfort of the saints, when they have had most experience of men's unkindness and treachery. David here found them so upon a sick bed; he found his enemies very barbarous, but his God very gracious. 1. He here comforts himself in his communion with God under his sickness, by faith receiving and laying hold of God's promises to him, (v. 1, 3.) and lifting up his heart in prayer to God: He here represents the malice of his enemies against him, their false accusations of him, their spiteful reflections upon him, and their insolent conduct toward him, v. 5, 9. He leaves his case with God, not doubting but that he would own and favor their enemies, v. 10, 11, and so the psalm concludes with a doxology, v. 13. Is any afflicted with sickness? let him sing the beginning of this. Is any persecuted by enemies? let him sing the latter end of it; and we may and should so meditate as if we were committed to the calamities and comforts of good people in this world.

To the chief musician. A Psalm of David.

1. BLESSED is he that considereth the poor: the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. 2. The Lord will preserve him, and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth: and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies. 3. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness. 4. I said, O Lord, be merciful unto me; heal my soul; for I have sinned against thee.

In these verses we have,

I. God's promises of succour and comfort to those that consider the poor; and we may suppose that David makes mention of these, with application, either, 1. To his friends, who were kind to him, and very considerable of his case, now that he was in affliction; Blessed is he that considers poor David. Here and there he met with one that sympathized with him, and was concerned for him, and kept up their good opinion of him, that, notwithstanding his afflictions, while his enemies were so insolent and abusive to him; on these he pronounced this blessing, not doubting but that God would recompense to them all the kindness they had done him, particularly when they also came to be in affliction. The provocations which his enemies gave him did but endear his friends so much the more to him: or, 2. To himself: he had the testimony for him, and had considered the poor; that, when he was in honour and power at court, he had taken cognizance of the wants and miseries of the poor, and had provided for their relief, and therefore was sure God would, according to his promise, strengthen and comfort him in his sickness. Here is a comment upon that promise; Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Observe,

(1.) What the mercy is which is required of us, it is to consider the poor or afflicted, whether in mind, body, or estate: these are we to consider with prudence and tenderness; we must take notice of their affliction, and inquire into their state; must sympathize with them, and judge charitably concerning them; we must wisely consider the poor; we must ourselves be instructed by the poverty and affliction of others; it must be Maschil to us, that is the word here used.

(2.) What the mercy is that is promised to us, if we thus show mercy; He that considers the poor, if he cannot relieve them, yet he considers them, and has a compassionate concern for them, and, in relieving them, does it considerately and with discretion, shall be considered by his God: he shall not only be recompenced in the resurrection of the just, but he shall be blessed upon the earth; this branch of goodness, as much as any other, has the promise of the life that now is, and is usually recompensed with temporal blessings. Liberality to the poor is the surest and safest way of thriving; such as practise it may be sure of Seasonable and effectual relief from God.

[1.] In all troubles; He will deliver them in the day of evil, so that, when the times are at the worst, it shall go well with them, and they shall not fall into the calamities in which others are involved; if any be hid in the day of the Lord's anger, they shall. Those who thus distinguish themselves from those that have hard hearts, God will distinguish from those that have hard usage. And, in danger! He will preserve and keep them alive; and those who have a thousand times forfeited their lives, as the best have, must acknowledge it as a great favour if they have their lives given them for a prey. He does not say, "They shall be preserved," but, "They shall be preserved and kept alive, when the arrows of death fly thick round about them." Do their enemies threaten them? God will not deliver them into the will of their enemies; and the most potent enemy we have can have no power against us, but what is given him from above. The good-will of a God that loves us, is sufficient to secure us from the ill-will of all that hate us, men or devils! and that good-will we may promise ourselves an interest in, if we have considered the poor, and helped to relieve and rescue them.

[2.] Particularly in sickness; (v. 3.) The Lord will strengthen him, both in body and mind, upon the bed of languishing, on which he had long lain sick, and he will make all his bed; a very condescending expression, alluding to the care of those that nurse and tend sick people, especially of mothers for their children when they are sick, which is to make their beds easy for them; and that bed must needs be well-made which God himself has the making of. He will make all his bed from head to foot, and as it was his to turn his bed, so he will turn his bed, (so the word is,) to shake it up, and make it very easy; or, he will turn it into a bed of health. Note, God has promised his people that he will strengthen them, and make them easy, under their bodily pains and sicknesses. He has not promised that they shall never be sick, nor that they shall not lie long languishing, nor that their sickness shall not be unto death; but he has promised to enable them to bear their affliction with patience, and cheerfully to wait the issue; the soul shall by his grace be made to dwell at ease, when the body lies in pain.

II. David's prayer, directed and encouraged by these promises; (v. 4.) I said, Heal my soul. It is good for us to keep some account of our prayers, that we may not unsay, in our practices, any thing that we said in our prayers. Here is, 1. His humble petition; Lord, be merciful to me. He appeals to mercy, as one that knew he could not stand the test of strict justice. The best saints, even those that have been merciful to the poor, have not made God their Debtor, but must throw themselves on his mercy. When we are under the rod, we must thus recommend ourselves to the tender mercy of our God; Lord, heal my soul. Sin is the sickness of the soul, pordening mercy heals it, renewing grace heals it; and this spiritual healing we should be more carful for, that our sins are not strictly our own; the public confession; "I have sinned against thee, and therefore my soul needs healing; I am a sinner, a miserable sinner, therefore, God, be merciful to me," Luke xviii. 13. It does not appear that this has any reference to any particular gross act of sin, but, in general, to his many sins of iniquity, which his sickness set in order before him, and the dread of the consequences of which made him pray, Heal my soul.

5. Mine enemies speak evil of me; When shall he die, and his name perish? 6. And if he come to see me, he speaketh vanity: his heart gathereth iniquity to itself; when he goeth abroad, he telleth it. 7. All that hate me whisper together against me: against me do they devise my hurt. 8. An evil disease, say they, cleaveth fast unto him: and now that he lieth, he shall rise up no more.

9. Yea, mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me. 10. But thou, O Lord, be merciful unto me, and raise me up, that I may requite them. 11. By this I know that thou favourest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me. 12. And as for me, thou upholdest me in mine integrity, and settest me before thy face for ever. 13. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and Amen.

David often complains of the insolent conduct of his enemies toward him, when he was sick, which, as it was very barbarous in them, so it could not but be very grievous to him. They were not, indeed, arrived at that modern pitch of wickedness, of poisoning his meat and drink, or giving him something to make him sick; but, when he was sick, they insulted over him; (v. 5.) Mine enemies speak evil of me; designing thereby to grieve his spirit, to ruin his reputation, and so to sink his spirits. I. They longed for his death; When shall he die, and his name perish with him? He had but an uncomfortable life, and yet they grudged him that; but it was a useful life, he was, upon all accounts, the greatest ornament and blessing of his country; and yet, it seems, there were some who were sick of him, as the Jews were of Paul, crying out, Away with such a fellow from the earth. We ought not to desire the death of any; but to desire the death of useful men, for their usefulness, has much in it of the venom of the old serpent. They envied him his name, and the honour he had won, and doubted not but, if he were dead, that would be laid in the dust with him; yet, see how they were mistaken; when he had served his generation, he did die; (Acts xiii. 36.) but did his name perish? No, it lives and flourishes, to this day, in the sacred writings, and will, to the end of time; for the memory of the just is, and shall be, blessed.

II. They picked up every thing they could, to reproach him with; (v. 6.) "If he come to see me," (as it has always been reckoned a piece of neighbourly kindness to visit the sick,) "he speaks vanity; he pretends friendship, and that his errand is to mourn with me, and to comfort me; he tells me he is very sorry for me; and if you will not give me my wish, I will curse you to my health; but it is all flattery and falsehood." We complain, and justly, of the want of sincerity in our days, and that there is scarcely any true friendship to be found among men; but it seems, by this, that the former days were no better than these; David's friends were all compliment, and had nothing of that affection for him in their hearts which they made profession of; nor was that the worst of it; it was not only a case of deceit, but they came to see that, they might make themselves ridiculous upon everything he said or did, and might represent it as they pleased to others, with their own comments upon it, so as to render him odious or ridiculous; His heart gathereth iniquity to itself; puts ill constructions upon every thing; and then, when he goes among his companions, he tells it them, that they may tell it others; Report, say they, and we will report it, Jer. xx. 13. If he complained much of his ill, they would reproach him for his pusillanimity; if he scarcely complained at all, they would reproach him for his stupidity. If he prayed, others would mock him; if he reproved sinners, they would mock him; if he did not for shame speak out, and which, if they did, they knew would be confuted; whisperers and backbiters are put together among the worst of sinners, Rom. i. 29, 30. They whispered, that their plot against him might not be discovered, and so defeated; there is seldom whispering, (we say,) but there is lying, or some mischief on foot. Those whisperers devised evil to David; concluding he would die, if he contrived quickly, theycontrived how to broach all the measures he had concert for the public good, to prevent the prosecution of them, and to undo all that he had hitherto been doing; this he calls devising hurt against him; and they doubted not but to gain their point; An evil disease, a thing of Belial, say they, clears fast unto him; the reproach with which they had loaded his name, they hoped, would clear so fast to it, that it would wither with him, and then they should gain their point; they went by a modern and usual method of reproach, which is, to cast upon his honour thereheto—Fling an abundance of calumny, and part will be sure to stick. The disease he is now under will certainly make an end of him; for it is the punishment of some great enormous crime, which he will not be brought to repent of, and proves him, however he has appeared, a son of Belial; or, it is inflicted by Satan, who is called Belial, the wicked one, 2 Cor. vi. 13. It is (according to a loose way of speaking, they have) "as a devilish disease, and therefore it will clear fast to him, and now that he lieth, now that his distemper prevails so far as to oblige him to keep his bed, he shall rise up no more, we shall be rid of him, and divide the spoil of his preferments." We are not to think it strange, if, when good men are sick, there be those that hope for their death, as well as those that fear it, which makes the world not worthy of them, Rev. xi. 10.

IV. There was one particularly, in whom he had reposed a great deal of confidence, that took part with his enemies, and was as abusive to him as any of them; (v. 9.) My own familiar friend; probably, he means Ahithophel, who had been his bosom friend, and prime minister of state, in whom he trusted as one inviolably firm to him, and whose advice he relied much upon, in dealing with his enemies, who did eat of his bread, with whom he had been very intimate, and whom he had taken to sit at the table with him; nay, whom he had maintained and given a livelihood to, and so oblied, both in gratitude and interest, to adhere to him. They had their maintenance from the king's palace, did not think it meet for them to see the king's dishonour, (Ezra iv. 14.) much less to do him dishonour; yet this base and treacherous confidant of David's, forgot all the eaten bread, and lifted up his heel against him that had lifted up his head; not only deserted him, but insulted him, which endeavoured to supplant them. Those are wicked indeed, whom no courtesy done them, nor confidence reposed in them, will oblige; and let us not
1. He prayed to God that they might be disappointed. He said nothing to them, but turned himself to God; “O Lord, be thou merciful to me, for they are unmerciful,” v. 10. He had prayed in revenge; David knew that if he could but procure an opportunity of making it appear that he bears no malice to those that have been injurious to him, but, on the contrary, that he is ready to do them any good office. Or, “That, as a king, I may put them under the marks of my just displeasure, banish them the court, and forbid them my table for the future;” which would be a necessary piece of justice, for warning to others. Perhaps in this prayer is couched a prophecy of the execution of his design, on whom God raised up, that he might be a just Avenger of all the wrongs done to him and to his people, particularly by the Jews, whose utter destruction followed, not long after.

2. He assured himself that they would be disappointed; (v. 11.) “By this I know that thou favourst me and my interest, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me.” They hoped for his death, but he found himself, through mercy, recovering, and thus he added to the comfort of his recovery. That it would be a disappointment to his adversaries; they would be crest-fallen and wretchedly ashamed, and there would be no occasion to upbraid them with their disappointment, they would fret at it themselves. Note, Though we may not take a pleasure in the fall of our enemies, we may take a pleasure in the frustrating of their designs against us. (2.) That that would be a token of God’s favour to him, and a certain evidence that he did favour him, and would continue to do so. Note, When we can discern the favour of God to us, in any mercy personal or public, that doubles it, and sweetens it.

3. He depends upon God, who had thus delivered him from many an evil work, to preserve him to his heavenly kingdom, as blessed Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 18. “As for me, farasmuch as thou favourdest me, as a fruit of that favour, and to qualify me for the continuance of it, thou hast holiest me in mine integrity; and, in order to that, settest me before thine face, hast thine eye always upon me for good;” or, “Because thou dost, by thy grace, uphold me in my integrity, I know that thou wilt, in thy glory, set me for ever before thy face.” Note, (1.) When at any time we suffer in our reputation, our chief concern should be about our integrity, and then we may cheerfully leave it to God to secure our reputation. (2.) The man in the world holds his integrity no longer than God upholds him in it; for by his grace we are what we are; if we be left to ourselves, we shall not only fall, but fall away. (3.) It is a great comfort to us, that, however weak we are, God is able to uphold us in our integrity, and will do it, if we commit the keeping of it to him. (4.) If the grace of God did not take a constant care of us, we should not be upheld in our integrity; his eye is always upon us, else we should soon find ourselves in the utmost disorder. God now upholds in their integrity, he will set before his face for ever, and make happy in the vision and fruition of himself; “He that endures to the end, shall be saved.”

4. The psalm concludes with a solemn doxology, or adoration of God as the Lord God of Israel, v. 13. It is not certain whether this verse pertains to this particular psalm; if so, it teaches us this, That a believing heart, in our preservation through grace to glory, is enough to fill our hearts with joy, and our mouths with everlasting praise, even in our greatest straits; or, this verse may have been added as the conclusion of the first book of Psalms, which is reckoned to end here; the like being subjoined to lxixii., lxxxiix., cixi., and then it teaches us to make God the Omega, who is the Alpha, to make him the End, who is the Beginning, of every good work. We have seen (1.) To give glory to God as the Lord God of Israel, v. 13. II. To give glory to God, as the Lord God of Israel, v. 13. III. To give glory to God, as the Lord God of Israel, v. 13. People who have done great and kind things for them, and has more and better in reserve. (2.) To give him glory as an eternal God, that has both his being and his blessedness from everlasting and to everlasting. (3.) To do this with great affection and fervour of spirit; intimated in the double seal set to it; Amen and Amen; Be it so now, be it so to all eternity. We say, Amen to it, and let all others say, Amen, too.

PSALM XLI.

If the book of Psalms be, as some have styled it, a mirror, or looking-glass, of pious and devout affections, this psalm, in particular, deserves, as much as any one psalm, to be so entitled, and is as proper as any other to kindle and excite such in us; gracious desires are here strong and fervent; gracious hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, and here struggling, but the pleasure (passion comes off a conqueror. Or we may take it for a conflict between sense and faith; sense objecting, and faith answering. I. Faith begins with holy desires toward God, and communication to him, v. 1, 2. II. Sense complains of the darkness and cloudiness of the present condition, aggravated by the remembrance of the former enjoyments, v. 3, 4. III. Faith silences the complaint with the assurance of a good outcome, at last, v. 5. IV. Sense repeats its complaints of the present dark and melancholy state, v. 6, 7. V. Faith holds up the heart, notwithstanding, with hope that the day will dawn, v. 8. VI. Sense repeats its lamentations, (v. 9, 10.) and sighs out the same remonstrance it had before made of its grievances. VII. Faith gets the last word, (v. 11.) for the silence of the complaints of sense, and though it be almost the same with that, (v. 5.) yet now it prevails and carries the day. The title does not tell us who was the Sense of this psalm, but, most probably, it was David; and we may conjecture it was penned by him at a time when, either by Saul’s persecution, or Absalom’s rebellion, he was driven from the sanctuary, and cut off from those who were waiting upon God’s preservation of him. The spirit of it is the same with the former, and therefore we may presume it was penned by the same hand, and upon the same or a like occasion. In singing it, we may use either outward actions, or even inward directions; but not both at once to ourselves the melancholy expressions we find here; if not, we must, in singing them, sympathize with those whose case they speak too plainly, and thank God it is not our case. But if we can, both inwardly and outwardly express and excite holy desires toward God, and dependence on him, we must earnestly endeavour to bring our minds up to.

To the chief musician, Maschil, for the sons of Korah.

1. As the hart panteth after the waterbrooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. 2. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appeare before God? 3. My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God? 4. When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: for I had gone with the multitude; I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy-day. 5. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance.

Holy love to God, as the Chief Good, and our Felicity, is the power of godliness, the very life and soul of religions without which, all external professions and performances are but a shell and carcasse: now here we have some of the expressions of that love. Here is, 1. Holy love, thirsting; love upon the wing, soaring upward in holy desires toward the Lord, and toward the remembrance of his name; (v. I, 2.) "My soul hangeth, thirsteth, for God, for nothing more than God, but still for more and more of him. Now observe, 1. When it was that David thus expressed his vehement desire toward God. It was, (1.) When he was thus debarr'd from his outward opportunities of waiting on God; when he was banished to the land of Jordan, a great way off from the courts of God's house. Note, Sometimes God teaches us effectually to know the worth of mercies by the want of them, and whets our appetite for the means of grace, by cutting us short in those means. We are apt to loathe that manna, when we have plenty of it, which will be very precious to us, if ever we come to know the scarcity of it. (2.) When he was deprived, in a great measure, of the inward comfort he used to have in God; he now went mourning, but he went on panting. Note, If God, by his grace, has wrought in us sincere and earnest desires toward him, we may take comfort from these, when we want those ravishing delights we have sometimes had. If God be becoming other to us after God is as sure an evidence that we love him, as rejoicing in God. Before the psalmist records his doubts, and fears, and griefs, which had sorely shaken him, he premiseth this, That he looked upon the living God as his Chief Good, and had set his heart upon him accordingly, and was resolved to live and die by him; and, casting anchor thus at first, he rides out the storm. 2. He overtime of his desire, and what it is he thus thirsts after. (1.) He pants after God, he thirsts for God; not the ordinances themselves, but the God of the ordinances. A gracious soul can take little satisfaction in God's courts, if it do not meet with God himself there; "Oh that I knew where I might find him! That I might have more of the tokens of his favour, the graces and comforts of his Spirit, and the earthen's of his glory." (2.) He has, herein, an eye to God, as the living God, that God in himself, and is not satisfied with any ordinance which gives him all and happiness to those that are his; the living God, not only in opposition to dead idols, the works of men's hands, but to all the dying comforts of this world, which perish in the using. Living souls can never take up their rest any where short of a living God. (3.) He longs to come and appear before God; to make himself known to him, as being conscious to himself of his own sincerity; to attend on him as a servant appears before his master, to pay his respects to him, and receive his commands; to give an account of himself, as one from whom our judgment proceeds. To appear before God is as much the desire of the upright, as it is the dread of the hypocrite. The psalmist knew he could not come into God's courts, but he must incur expense, for so was the law, that none should appear before God empty; yet he longs to come, and will not grudge the charges.

3. What is the degree of this desire. It is very incommensurable with the condition of his soul that thirsts, which bespeaks not only the sincerity, but the strength, of his desire; his longing for the water of the well of Bethlehem was nothing to this. He compares it to the panting of a hart, or deer, which is naturally hot and dry, especially of a hunted buck, after the water-brooks. Thus earnestly do a gracious soul desire communion with God; thus impatient is it in the want of that communion; so impossible does it find it to take up in any thing short of that communion; and so insatiable is it in taking the pleasures of that communion, when the opportunity of it returns, still thirsting after the full enjoyment of him in the heavenly kingdom.

II. Holy love, mourning for God's present withdrawals, and the want of the benefit of solemn ordinances; (v. 3.) "My tears have been my meat day and night, during this forced absence from God's house." His circumstances were sorrowful, and he accommodated himself to them, received the impressions, and returned the signs, of sorrow; even the royal prophet was a weeping prophet, when he wanted the comforts of God's house. His tears were mingled with his meat; nay, they were his meat, day and night; he fed, he feasted, upon his own tears, when there was such just cause for them; and it was a satisfaction to him, that he found his heart so much affected with a grievance of this nature. Observe, He did not think it enough to have shed a tear or two, at parting from the sanctuary, to weep a farewell-prayer, when he took his leave, but, as long as he continued under a forced absence from that place of his delight, he never looked up, but wept, day and night. Note, Those that are deprived of the benefit of public ordinances, constantly miss them, and therefore should constantly mourn for the want of them, till they are restored to them again.

Two things aggravat his grief: 1. The reproaches with which his enemies teased him; They continually say unto me, Where is thy God? (1.) Because he was absent from the ark, the token of God's presence; judging of the God of Israel by the gods of the heathen, they concluded he had lost his God. Note, Those are mistaken, who think that, when they have robbed us of our Bibles, and our ministers, and our solemn assemblies, they have robbed us of our God: for though God has tied us to them, when they are to be bound, he has not tied himself to them. We know where our God is, and where to find him, when we know not where his ark is, nor where to find that. Wherever we are, there is a way open heavenward. (2.) Because God did not immediately appear for his deliverance, they concluded that he had abandoned him; but herein also they were deceived: it does not follow that the saints have lost God, because God has left their friends. However, by this base reflection on God and his people, they added affliction to the afflicted and that was what they aimed at. Nothing is more grievous to a gracious soul, than that which is intended to shake its hope and confidence in God. 2. The remembrance of his former liberties and enjoyments, v. 4. Son, remember thy good things, is a great aggravation of evil things; so much do our for our dejections, we must charge ourselves to hope in God; when the soul embraces itself, it sinks; if it catch hold on the power and promise of God, it keeps the head above water. Hope in God, (1) That he shall have glory from us; "I shall yet praise him; I shall experience such a change in my estate, that I shall not want matter for praise; and such a change in my spirit, that I shall not want a proper occasion to give pleasure to the crown of heaven and happiness of a man, and the greatest desire I have of every good man, to be unto God for a name and a praise. What is the crown of heaven's bliss but this, that there we shall be for ever praising God? And what is our support under our present woes but this, that we shall yet praise God, that they shall not prevent, or abate, our endless hallelujahs? (2) That we shall have comfort in him. We shall praise God, in God's help of his counsellors, for his favour, and the support we have by it, and the satisfaction we have in it. Those that know how to value and improve the light of God's countenance, will find in that a suitable, seasonable, and sufficient, help, in the worst of times, and that which will furnish them with constant matter for praise. David's believing expectation of this kept him from sinking, nay, it kept him from drooping; his harp was a palliative cure of Saul's melancholy, but his hope was an effectual cure of his own.

6. O my God, my soul is cast down within me: therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites, from the hill Mizar. 7. Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy water-sprouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me. 8. Yet the Lord will command his loving-kindness in the day-time, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life. 9. I will say unto God my rock, Why hast thou forgotten me? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy? 10. As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me; whilst they say daily unto me, Where is thy God? 11. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

Complaints and comforts here, as before, take their turn, like day and night, in the course of nature.

1. He complains of the dejections of his spirit, but comforts himself with the thoughts of God, v. 6. 1. In his troubles; his soul was disquieted, and he goes to God, and tells him so, O my God, my soul is cast down within me. It is a great support to us, when upon any account we are distressed, that we have liberty of access to God, and liberty of speech before him, and praise. I shall yet praise him, I shall have a just cause to praise, a just cause to praise him, whosoever he be, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

soul is plunged; therefore, to prevent its sinking, I will remember thee, meditate upon thee, and call upon thee, and do thou that will do to keep up my spirit.’ Note, The way to forget the sense of our miseries, is, to remember the God of our mercies. It was an uncommon case, when the psalmist remembered God, and was comforted, and therefore had recourse to that expedient now. He was now driven to the utmost borders of the land of Canaan, to shelter himself from his persecutors; sometimes to the country about Jordan, when discovered there, to the land of the Hermonites, or to a hill called Mizar, or the little hill; but, (1.) Wherever he went, he took his religion along with him; in all these places, he remembered God, and lifted up his heart to him, and kept his secret communion with him. This is the comfort of the banished, the wanderers, the travellers, of that wretched state; that, where his heart was so much upon, and which lay so near it. Though the billows of sorrow and displeasure against him, but comforts himself with the hopes of the return of his favour in due time.

1. He saw his troubles coming from God’s wrath, and that discouraged him; (v. 7.) ‘Deep calls unto deep, one affliction comes upon the neck of another, as if it were called to hasten after it; and thy water-spouts give the signal, and sound the alarm, of war.’ It may be meant of the terrors and terrors of his mind, under the apprehensions of God’s anger. One frightful thought summoned another, and made way for it, as is usual in melancholy people; he was overpowered and overwhelmed with a deluge of grief, like that of the old world, when the windows of heaven were opened, and the fountains of the great deep were broken up. Or, it is an allusion to a ship at sea, in a great storm, tossed by the roaring waves, which go over it, evil. 25. What is the man that is born of woman, that at any time, we must call them God’s waves and his billows, that we may humble ourselves under his mighty hand, and may encourage ourselves to hope, that, though we be threatened, we shall not be ruined; for the waves and billows are under a divine check, The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of these many waters. Let not good men think it strange, if they be exercised with many and various trials, and if they come thick upon them; God knows what it does, and so shall they shortly. Jonah, in the while’s belly, made use of these words of David, Jon. ii. 3. (they are exactly the same in the original,) and of him they were literally true, All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me; for the book of psalms is contrived so as to reach every one’s case.

2. He expected his deliverance to come from God’s faithfulness; (v. 8.) ‘Yet the Lord will command his loving-kindness. There is a certainty; He will command his loving-kindness; the promise is certain, it will not always be so; Non si male nec et aliem sic evit—Though affairs are now in an evil plight, they may not always be so. After the storm, there will come a calm, and the prospect of this supported him, when deep called unto deep. Observe, (1.) What he promised himself from God; The Lord will command his loving-kindness. He eyes the favour of God, as the fountain of all good; he looked for, that is life, that is better life, that is life with that. God will gather those from whom he has, in a little while, hid his face, Isa. liv. 7, 8 God’s conferring of his favour, is called his commanding it; this intimates the freeness of it, we cannot pretend to merit it, but it is bestowed in a way of sovereignty, he gives like a king; it intimates also the efficacy of it; he speaks his loving-kindness, and makes us to hear it; speaks, and it is done. He commands deliverance, (xlv. 4.) commands the blessing, (cxxxiii. 3.) as one having authority. By commanding his loving-kindness, he commands down the waves and billows, that they shall obey him. This he will do in the day-time, for God’s loving-kindness will make day in the soul, at any time. Though weeping has endured for a night, a long night, yet joy will come in the morning. (2.) What he promised for himself to God. If God command his loving-kindness for him, he will meet it, and bid it welcome with his best affections and devotions. [1.] He will rejoice in God; In God’s day, in God’s house, in God’s presence, in God’s love, in God’s mercy, in God’s grace; in God’s promise, in God’s faithfulness, in God’s duty, in God’s ways, in God’s commands. The mercies we receive in the day, we ought to return thanks for at night; when others are sleeping, we should be praising God. See cxix. 62. At midnight, will I rise to give thanks. In silence and solitude, when we are retired from the huries of the world, we must be pleasing ourselves with the thoughts of God’s goodness. Or in the night of affliction; [2.] Before the day dawns, in which God commands his loving-kindness, I will sing songs of praise in the night. Under all this, though the saints can rejoice in hope of the glory of God, singing in hope, and praise in hope, Rom. v. 2, 3. It is God’s prerogative to give songs in the night, Job xxxix. 10. [2.] He will seek to God in a constant dependence upon him; My prayer shall be to the God of my life. Our believing expectation of mercy must not supersede, but quicken, our prayers for it. God is the God of our life, in whom we live and move and have our being. He comforts; and therefore to whom should we apply ourselves by prayer, but to him? And from him what good may not we expect? It would put life into our prayers, in them to eye God as the God of our life; for then it is for our lives, and the lives of our souls, that we stand up to make request.

III. He complains of the insolence of his enemies, and yet comforts himself in God as his Friend, v. 11.

1. His complaint is, that his enemies oppressed and reproached him, and this made a great impression upon him. (1.) They oppressed him to that degree, that he went mourning, from day to day, from place to place, v. 9. He did not break out into indecent passions, though abused as never man was, but he silently wept out his grief, and went mourning; and for this we cannot blame him, it must needs grieve a man that truly loves his country, and seeks the good of it, to see himself persecuted and hardly used, as if he were an enemy to it. Yet David ought not hence to have concluded that God had forgotten him, and cast him off, nor thus to have expostulated with him, as if he did him as much wrong in suffering him to be trampled upon, as they did that trampled upon him; Why go I mourning? And why hast thou forgotten me? We may complain to God, our afflictions are not allowed thus to continue against us. (2.) They reproached him so cuttily, that it was a sword in his bones, v. 10. He had mentioned before what the reproach was that touched him thus to the quick, and here he repeats it, They say daily unto me, Where is thy God? A reproach which was therefore very grievous to him, both because it reflected dishonour upon God, and was intended to discourage his hope in God, which he had enough to do to keep up in any measure, and much with his tears and to feel of itself.

2. His comfort is, that God is his Rock, v. 14.
A Rock to build upon, a Rock to take shelter in; the Rock of ages, in whom is everlasting strength, would be his Rock, his Strength in the inner man, both for doing and suffering. To him he had access with confidence, to God his Rock; he might say what he had to say, and be sure of a gracious audience. He therefore repeats what he had said, (v. 5.) and concludes with it, (v. 11.) Why art thou cast down, O my soul? His griefs and fears were clamorous and troublesome, they were not silenced, though they were again and again answered; but here, at length, his faith came off a conqueror, and forced the enemies to quit the field. And he gains this victory, (1.) by his own faith, (2.) by his own courage; choosing himself, as before, for his dejections and disquietudes, and encouraging himself to trust in the name of the Lord, and to stay himself upon his God. Note, It may be of great use to us, to think our good thoughts over and again, and if we do not gain our point with them at first, perhaps we may the second time; however, where the heart goes along with the words, it is no vain repetition. We have need to press the same thing over and over, and put it into our hearts, and all little enough. (2.) By adding one word to it; there, he hoped to praise God for the salvation that was in his countenance; here, “I will praise him,” says he, “as the Salvation of my countenance, from the present cloud that is upon it; if God smile upon me, that will make me look pleasant, look up, look forward, look round, with pleasure.” He adds, and my God, “related to me, in covenant with me; all that he is, all that he has, in mind, according to the true intent and meaning of the promise;” this thought enabled him to triumph over all his griefs and fears; God’s being with the saints in heaven, and being their God, is that which will wipe away all tears from their eyes, Rev. xxii. 3, 4.

This psalm, it is likely, was penned upon the same occasion with the former, and, having no title, may be looked upon as an appendix to it; the malady presently returning, he had immediate recourse to the same remedy, because he had entered it in his book, with a probatum est upon it. The 2d verse of this psalm is almost the very same with the 9th verse of the foregoing psalm; this is exactly the same with the 11th verse of that. Christ himself, who had the Spirit without measure, when there was occasion, prayed a second and third time, saying the same words, Matt. xxvi. 44. In this psalm, 1. He appeals to God concerning the injuries that were done him by his enemies, v. 1, 2. II. He prays to God to restore to him the free enjoyment of public ordinances again, and promises to make a good improvement of them, v. 3, 4. III. He endeavours to still the tumult of his own spirit, with a lively hope and confidence in God; (v. 5.) If, in singing this psalm, we labour after these, we sing with grace in our hearts.

1. Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation; O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man. 2. For thou art the God of my strength; why dost thou cast me off? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy? 3. O send out thy light and thy truth: let them lead me, let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles. 4. Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy: yea, upon the harp will I praise thee, O God, my God. 5. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope in God; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

David here makes his application to God by faith and prayer, as his Judge, his Strength, his Guide, his Joy, his Hope, with suitable affections and expressions.

I. As his Judge, his righteous Judge, who, he knew, would judge him, and who, (being conscious of his own integrity,) he knew, would judge for him; (v. 1.) Judge me, O God, and plead my cause.

There were those that accused him, against them he had to do; and forthwith he cast out his court, where he stood unjustly convicted and condemned, he appeals to the court of heaven, the supreme judicature; praying to have their judgment given against him, reversed, and his innocence cleared. There were those that had injured him, against them he is plaintiff, and exhibits his complaint to him who is the Avenger of wrong, praying for justice for himself, and upon them. Observe, 1. Who his enemies were, with whom he had this struggle. Here was a single body of men, whom he calls an ungodly or unmerciful nation; those that are unmerciful make it appear that they are ungodly, for those that have any fear or love of their master will have compassion on their fellow-servants. And here was one bad man the head of them, a deceitful and unjust man; most probably, Saul, who not only showed no kindness to David, but dealt most perfidiously and dishonestly with him. If Absalom was the man he meant, his character was no better. As long as there are such bad men out of hell, and nations of them, it is not strange that good men, who are yet out of heaven, meet with hard and base treatment. Some think that David, by the spirit of prophecy, calculated this psalm for the use of the Jews in their captivity in Babylon, and that the Chaldeans are the ungodly nation here meant; to them it was very applicable, but only as other like scriptures, none of which are of private interpretation. God might design it for their use, whether David did or no. 2. What is his prayer with reference to them; Judge me. As to the quarrel God had with him for sin, he prays, “Enter not into judgment with me, for then I shall be condemned,” but as to the quarrel his enemies had with him, he prays, “Lord, judge me, for I know that I shall be justified, plead my cause against them, take my part, and in thy providence appear on my behalf.” He that has an honest cause may expect that God will plead it. “Plead my cause! I pray thee to deliver me from them, that they may not have their will against me.” We must reckon our cause sufficiently pleaded, if we be delivered, though our enemies be not destroyed.

II. As his Strength, his all-sufficient Strength; so he eyes God, (v. 2.) Thou art the God of my strength, my God, my Strength, from whom all my strength is derived, in whom I strengthen myself, whom I call for my strength and help. 1. I am weak as water, and utterly unable either to do or suffer any thing for thee.” David now went mourning, destitute of spiritual joys, yet he found God to be the God of his strength. “If we cannot comfort ourselves in God, we may stay ourselves upon him, and may have spiritual supports when we want spiritual delights. David here pleads this with God; “Thou art the God on whom I depend as a peculiar virtue, why thou hast turned against me?” This was a mistake; for God never cast off any that trusted in him, whatever melancholy apprehensions they may have had of their own state. “Thou art the God of my strength; why then is mine enemy too strong for me, and why go I mourning because of his oppressive power?” It is hard to reconcile the mighty force of the church’s enemies with the almighty power of the church's God; but the day will reconcile them, when all his enemies shall become his footstool.

III. As his Guide, his faithful Guide; (v. 3.) Lead me, bring me to thy holy hill. He prays, 1. That God by his providence would bring him back from his banishment to his former state, and to the free enjoyment of the privileges of God's sanctuary. His heart is upon the holy hills and the tabernacles, not upon his family-comforts, his court-preferences, or his diversions; he could bear the want of these, but he is impatient to see God's tabernacles again; nothing so amiable in his eyes as those; thither he would be brought back. In order to this, he prays, "Send out thy light and thy truth, to lead me, to the holy hill, to the Spirit of light and truth, who supplies the want of Christ's bodily presence, to lead us into the mystery of godliness, and to guide us in the way to heaven." When God sends his light and truth into our hearts, those will guide us to the upper world in all our devotions, as well as in all our aims and expectations; and if we conscientiously follow that light and that truth, they will certainly bring us to the holy hill above.

IV. As his Joy, his exceeding Joy. If God guide him to his tabernacles, if he restore him to his former liberties, he knows very well what he has to do; Then will I go unto the altar of God, v. 4. He will get as near as he can unto God, his exceeding Joy. Note, 1. Those that come to the tabernacles, should come to the altar; those that come to ordinances, should qualify themselves to come, and then come to special ordinances, to those that are most affecting and most binding. The nearer we come, the closer we cleave, to God, the better. 2. Those that come to the altar of God, must see to it that therein they come unto God, and draw near to him with the heart, with a true heart: we come in vain to holy ordinances, if we do not in them come to the holy God. 3. Those that come unto God, must come to him as their exceeding Joy, not only as their fitness. But as their present Joy; and as the Spirit, which is thy favour, which is light, and the performance of thy promise, which is truth. We need desire no more to make us happy, than the good that flows from God's favour, and is included in his promise. That mercy, that truth, is enough, is all; and when we see these in God's providences, we see ourselves under a very safe conduct. Note, Those whom God leads, he leads to his holy hill, and to his tabernacles; those therefore who are led by the Spirit of God, have the assurance of their acceptance, and the promise of their salvation. 4. When we go to God as our exceeding Joy, our comforts and joy must be the matter of our present prayer and praise. Upon the harp will I praise thee, O God my God. David excelled at the harp; (1 Sam. xvi. 16, 18.) and with that in which he excelled he would praise God; for God is to be praised with the best we have; it is fit he should, who is the best.

V. As his Hope, his never-failing Hope, v. 5. Here, as before, David quarrels with himself for his dejections and despondencies, and owns he did ill to yield to them, and that he had no reason to do so; Why art thou cast down, O my soul? He then quiets himself in the believing expectation he had of giving glory to God; Hope in God, for I shall yet praise him; and of enjoying glory with God, He is the Health of my countenance, and my God. This is what we cannot too much insist upon, for it is what we must live and die by.

PSALM XLIV

We are not told either who was the penman of this psalm, or when, and upon what occasion, it was penned; upon a melancholy occasion, we are sure, not so much to the penman himself, (then we could have found occasions enough for it in the history of David and his afflictions,) but to the church of God in general; and therefore, we suppose it penned by David, yet we must attribute it purely to the spirit of prophecy, and must conclude that that spirit (whatever he himself had) had in view the captivity of Babylon, or the sufferings of the Jewish church under Antiochus, or rather, the afflicted state of the Christian church in its early days, (to which v. 22. is applied by the apostle, Rom. viii. 36.) and indeed in all its days on earth, for it is its determined lot; and to be in the kingdom of heaven through many tribulations. And if we could not apply any gospel-psalms pointing at the privileges and comforts of Christians, why should we not have one pointing at their trials and exercises? It is a psalm calculated for a day of fasting and humiliation, upon occasion of some public calamity, either pressing or threatening. In it the church is taught, 1. To own with thankfulness, to the glory of God, the great things God had done for their fathers, v. 1. 2. To exhibit a memorial of their present calamitous estate, v. 9. 16. 3. To file a protestation of their integrity and adherence to God, notwithstanding, v. 17. 22. 4. To lodge a petition at the throne of grace for succour and relief, v. 22. 28. In singing this psalm, we ought to give God the praise of what he has formerly done for his people, to represent our own grievances, or sympathize with those parts of the church that are in distress, to engage ourselves, whatever happens, to cleave to God and duty, and then cheerfully to wait the event.

1. We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work thou didst in their days, in the times of old; 2. How thou didst drive out the heathen with thy hand, and plantedst them; how thou didst afflict the people, and cast them out. 3. For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them; but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them. 4. Thou art my King, O God: command deliverances for Jacob. 5. Through thee will we push down our enemies; through thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us. 6. For I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me. 7. But thou hast saved us from our enemies, and hast put them to shame that hated us. 8. In God we boast all the day long, and praise thy name for ever. Selah.

Some observe, that most of the psalms that are entitled Maschil, psalms of instruction, are sorrowful psalms; for afflictions give instructions, and sorrow of spirit opens the ear to them; Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest and teachest.

In these verses, the church, though now trampled upon, calls to remembrance the days of her triumph, of her triumph in God, and over her enemies. This is very largely mentioned here. 1. As an aggravation of the present distress. The yoke of servitude cannot but lie very heavy on the necks of those that used to wear the crown of victory; and the tokens of God's displeasure must, at least, grieve those to whom those that have been long accustomed to the tokens of his favour. 2. As an encouragement to hope that God would yet turn again their captivity, and return in mercy to them; accordingly he mixes prayers and comfortable expectations with his record of former mercies. Observe,

1. Their commemoration of the great things God had formerly done for them. In general; (v. 1.) Our fathers have told us what work thou didst in those days. Observe, 1. The many operations of providence are here spoken of as one work; "They have told us the work which thou didst;" for there is a wonderful harmony and uniformity in all that God does, and the many wheels make but one wheel; (Ezek. x. 13.) my works make but one work. 2. It is a debt which every age owes to posterity, to keep an account of God's works of wonder, and to transmit the record of them to the next generation. Those that have enjoyed God's goodness and favours have an obligation to tell those that come after them what God did in their days, we are bound to tell those that come after us what he has done in our days, and let them do the like justice to those that shall succeed them; thus shall one generation praise his works to another; (cxxxiv. 4.) the fathers of the children shall make known his truth, Isa. xxxviii. 19. 3. We must not only make mention of the work God has done in our own days, but must also acquaint ourselves with God's work for our children, with what he did in the times of old, long before our own generation. It is not enough of this we have in the scripture a sure word of history, as sure as the word of prophecy. 4. Children must diligently attend to what their parents tell them of the wonderful works of God, and keep it in remembrance, as that will be of great use to them. 5. Former experiences of God's power and goodness are strong supports to faith, and powerful pleas in the presence of God. See how Gideon insists upon it, Judg. vi. 13. Where have all his miracles which our fathers told us of? In particular, their fathers had told them.

(1.) How wonderfully God planted Israel in Canaan at first, v. 2. 3. He drove out the natives, to make room for Israel, afflicted them, and cast them out, gave them as dust to Israel's sword, and as driven stubble to their bow. The many complete victories which Israel obtained over the Canaanites, under the command of Joshua, or by the Canaanites, under the command of Joshua, were not to be attributed to themselves, nor could they challenge the glory of them; [1.] They were not owing to their own merit, but to God's favour and free grace; It was through the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour to them. Not for thy righteousness, or the uprightness of thy heart, dost God drive them out from before thee, (Deut. ix. 5, 6.) but because God would perform the oath which he swore unto their fathers, Deut. vii. 8. The Lord promises to allow us, the more comfort it administers to us, that we may see all our successes and enlargements coming to us from the favour of God and the light of his countenance. [2.] They were not owing to their own might, but to God's power engaged for them, without which all their own efforts and endeavours would be vain. It was not by their own sword that they got the land in possession, though they had great numbers of mighty men; nor did their own arm save them from being driven back by the Canaanites, and put to shame; but it was God's right hand and his arm. He fought for Israel, else they had fought in vain; it was through him that they did valiantly and victoriously. It was God that planted Israel in that good land, as the careful husbandman plants a tree, from which he promises himself fruit. See xxx. 8. This is applicable to the planting of the Christian church in the world, by the preaching of the gospel. Paganism was wonderfully driven out, as the Canaanites, not all at once, but piece by piece, little by little, not by any human policy or power, (for God had said, ix. 6.) but by the weak and foolish things of the world, but by the wisdom and power of God; Christ by his Spirit went forth conquering and to conquer; and the remembrance of that is a great support and comfort to those that groan under the yoke of antichristian tyranny; for to the state of the church under the power of the New Testament Babylon, some think, (and particularly learned Amyraldus,) the complaints in the latter part of this psalm may very fitly be accommodated. He that by his power and goodness planted a church for himself in the world, will certainly support it by the same power and goodness; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

(2.) How frequently he had given them success against their enemies that attempted to disturb them in the possession of that good land; (v. 7.) Thou hast, many a time, saved us from our enemies, and made us a name to them that hate us; witness the successes of the Judges, how the nations that oppressed Israel. Many a time have the persecutors of the Christian church, and those that hate it, been put to shame by the power of truth, Acts xii. 10.

II. The good use they make of this record, and had formerly made of it, in consideration of the great things God had done for their fathers of old. They had taken God for their sovereign Lord, had sworn allegiance to him, and put themselves under his protection; (v. 4.) Thou art my King, O God. He speaks in the name of the church, as (xxiv. 12.) Thou art my King of old; God, as a king, has made laws for his church, provided for the peace and good order of it, judged for it; pleaded its cause, fought its battles, and protected it; it is his kingdom in the world, and ought to be subject to him, and to pay him tribute; or, the psalmist might have chosen this name, Where is thy King, Whither shall I go with my petitions, but to thee? The favour I ask is not for myself, but for thy church." Note, It is every one's duty to improve his personal interest at the throne of grace, for the public welfare and prosperity of the people of God; as Moses, "If I have found grace in thine eyes, guide thy people," Exod. xxxiii. 13.

2. They had always applied themselves to him by prayer for deliverance, when at any time they were in distress; Command deliverances for Jacob. Observe, (1.) The enlargedness of their desire; they pray for deliverances, not one, but many, as many as they had need of, how many soever they were, a series of deliverances, a deliverance from every danger. 2. The strength of their faith in the power of God; they do not say, Work deliverances, but, Command them, which denotes his doing it easily and instantly, (v. 6.) God has made a great weak, and the murrain was the end of the faith of the centurion, (Matth. viii. 8.) Speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed; it denotes also his doing it effectually; "Command it, as one having authority, whose command will be obeyed;" Where the word of a king is, there is power, much more the word of the King of kings. 3. They had trusted and triumphed in him. As he owned it was not their own sword and bow that had saved them, (v. 3.) so neither did they trust to their own sword or bow to save them for the future; (v. 6.) I will not trust in my bow, nor in any of my military preparations, as if those would stand me instead without God; no, through thee will we push down our enemies; (v. 5.) we will attempt it in thy strength, relying only upon that, and not upon the number or valour of our forces; and, having thee on our side, we will not doubt of success in the attempt. Through thy name, by virtue of thy wisdom directing us, thy power strengthening us, and working for us, and thy promise securing success to us, we shall, we will, tread them under that rise up against us.

They made him their Joy and Praise; (v. 8.) "In God we have boasted, in him we do, and will boast, every day, and all the day long." When their enemies boasted of their strength and success, as Sennacherib and Rabshakeh hectored Hezekiah, they owned they had nothing to boast of, in answer thereunto, but their relation to God, and their interest in him; and if he were for them, they could set all the world at defiance. Let him that glories, glory in the Lord, and let that for ever exclude all other boasting. Let those that trust in God, make their boast in him, for they know whom they have trusted; let them boast in him all the day long, for it is a subject that can never be exhausted. But let them withal praise his name for ever; if they have the comfort of his name, let them give unto him the glory due to it.

9. But thou hast cast off, and put us to shame; and goest not forth with our armies. 10. Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy; and they which hate us spoil for themselves. 11. Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat; and hast scattered us among the heathen. 12. Thou seluest thine people for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price. 13. Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us. 14. Thou makest us a by-word among the heathen, a shaking of the head among the people. 15. My confusion is continually before me, and the shame of my face hath covered me, 16. For the voice of him that reproacheth and blasphemeth; by reason of the enemy and avenger.

The people of God here complain to him of the low and afflicted condition that they were now in, under the prevailing power of their enemies and oppressors, which was the more grievous to them because they were now trampled upon, who had always been used, in their struggles with their neighbours, to win the day and get the upper hand; and because those were now their oppressors, whom they had many a time triumphed over and made tributaries; and especially because they had boasted in their God, with great assurance that he would still protect and prosper them, which made the distress they were in, and the disgrace they were under, the more shameful. Let us see what the complaint is.

1. That they wanted the usual tokens of God's favour to them, and presence with them. (v. 8.) "Thou hast cast off; thou seest me, hast cast me off, and our cause, and to have cast off thy wonted care of us, and concern for us, and so hast put us to shame, for we boasted of the constancy and perpetuity of thy favour. Our armies go forth as usual, but they are put to flight, we gain no ground, but lose what we have gained, for thou goest not forth with them, for, if thou didst, which way soever they turned, they would prosper; but it is quite contrary." Note, God's people, when they are cast down, are tempted to think themselves cast off, and forsaken of God; but it is a mistaken. Hath God cast away his people? God forbid, Rom. 11. 2. That they were put to the worst before their enemies in the field of battle; (v. 10.) Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy, as Joshua complained when they met with a repulse at Ai; (Josh. vii. 8.) "We are dispirited, and have lost the ancient valor of Israelites; we flee, we fall, before those that used to flee and fall before us; and then they that hate us have the plunder of our camp, and often cut, and strip, and plunder, and do reckoned all their own that they can lay their hands on. Attempts to shake off the Babylonish yoke have been ineffectual, and we have rather lost ground by them." 3. That they were doomed to the sword and to captivity; (v. 11.) "Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat. They make no more scruple of killing an Israelite than of killing a sheep; nay, in the very act of the butcher, they make a trifle of it, they take a pleasure in it, as a hungry man in his meat; and we are led with as much ease, and as little resistance, as a lamb to the slaughter; many are slain, and the rest scattered among the heathen, continually insulted by their malice, or in danger of being infected by their iniquities." They looked upon themselves as bought and sold, and charged it upon God, Thou seluest thy people; when they should have charged it upon their own sin; for your iniquities have you sold yourselves; (Isa. lii. 1.) However, thus far was it, that they looked above the instruments of their trouble, and kept their eye upon God, as well knowing that their worst enemies had no power against them, but what was given them from above; they own it was God that delivered them into the hands of the ungodly, as that which is sold is delivered to the bayer. Thou seluest them for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price; intimating, that they could have suffered this contentedly, if they had been sure that it would have redounded to the glory of God, and that his interest might have been some way served by their sufferings; but it was quite contrary, Israel's distress was God's dishonour, so far from being a Gainer, in his glory by the sale of them, that it should seem he was greatly a Loser by it; see Isa. lii. 5. Ezek. xxxvi. 20.

IV. That they were loaded with contempt, and all possible ignominy was put upon them. In this also they acknowledge God, "Thou makest us a reproach; thou bringest those calamities upon us which occasion the reproach, and thou permittest their virulent tongues to smite us." They complain, 1. That they were publicly ridiculed and hated, and were looked upon as the most contemptible people under the sun; their troubles were turned to their reproach, and upon the account of them they were derided. 2. That their neighbours, those about them, from whom they could not withdraw, were most abusive to them, v. 13. 3. That the heathen, the people that were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and aliens to the covenants of promise, made them their sport. Yes, they are the sport of their God, as triumphing in their fall, v. 14. 4. That the reproach was constant and incessant; (v. 15.) My confusion is continually before me. The church in general, the psalmist in particular, were continually teased and vexed with the insults of the enemy. To those that are going down, every one cries, "Down with them." 5. That it was very grievous, and in a manner overwhelmed him; The shame of my face has covered me. He blushed for sin, or rather for the dishonour done to God, and then it was a holy blushing. 6. That it reflected upon God himself; the reproach which the enemy and the avenger cast upon them, was downright blasphemy against God, v. 16. and 2 Kings xix. 3. There was therefore strong reason to believe that God would appear for them. As there is no trouble more grievous to a generous and ingenious mind than reproach and calumny, so there is none more grievous to a holy gracious soul than blasphemy and dishonour done to God.

17. All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant. 18. Our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way; 19. Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death. 20. If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god; 21. Shall not God search this out? for he knoweth the secrets of the heart. 22. Yea, for thy sake are we killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter. 23. Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord? arise, cast us not off for ever. 24. Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest our affliction and our oppression? 25. For our soil is bowed down to the dust; our belly cleaveth unto the earth. 26. Arise for our help, and redeem us, for thy mercies sake.

The people of God, being greatly afflicted and oppressed, here apply themselves to him; whither else should they go?

1. By way of appeal, concerning their integrity, which he only is an infallible Judge of, and which he will certainly be the Reward of.

Two things they call God to witness to.

1. That though they suffered these hard things, yet they kept close to God, and to their duty; (v. 17.) "All this is come upon us, and it is as bad perhaps as bad can be, yet have we not forgotten thee, neither cast off the thoughts of thee, nor deserted the worship of thee; for though we cannot deny but that we have dealt foolishly, yet we have not dealt foolishly in thy covenant, so as to cast thee off, and take to other gods. Though idolaters were our conquerors, we did not therefore entertain any more favourable thoughts of their idols and idolatries; though thou hast seemed to forsake us, and withdraw from us, yet we have not therefore forsaken thee." The trouble they had been long in was very great; "We have been sore-broken in the place of dragons, among men as fierce, and furious, and cruel, as dragons; we have been covered with the shadow of death, we have been under deep melancholy, and apprehensive of nothing short of death; we have been wrapped up in obscurity, and buried alive; and thou hast thus broken us, thou hast thus covered us; (v. 19.) yet we have not harboured any hard thoughts of thee, nor meditated a retreat from thy service; though thou hast slain us, we have continued to trust in thee; our heart is not turned back, we have not secretly withdrawn our affections from thee, neither have our steps, either in our religious worship, or in our conversation, declined from thy way, (v. 16.) the way which thou hast appointed us to walk in." When the heart turns back, the steps will soon decline; for it is the evil heart of unbelief that inclines us to depart from God. Note, We may the better bear our troubles, when pressing soever, if in them we still hold fast our integrity. While our troubles do not drive us from God, we must not suffer them to drive us from our comfort in God; for he will not leave us, if we do not leave him.

For the proof of their integrity, they take God's omniscience to witness, which is as much the comfort of the upright heart, as it is the terror of hypocrites; (v. 20, 21.) "If we have forgotten the name of our God, under pretence that he had forgotten us in our distress, have stretched out our hands to a strange god, as more likely to help us, shall not God search this out? Shall he not know it more fully and distinctly, than we know that which we have with the greatest care and diligence searched out? Shall he not judge it, and call us to an account for it?" Forgetting God was a heart sin, and stretching out the hand to a strange god was often a secret sin, Ezek. viii. 12. But heart sins and secret sins are known to God, and must be reckoned for. For God is an infallible Judge of all the secrets of the heart.

2. That therefore they suffered these hard things, because they kept close to God and to their duty; (v. 22.) "It is for thy sake that we are killed all the day long, because we stand related to thee, are called by thy name, call upon thy name, and will not worship other gods." In this, the Spirit of prophecy had reference to those who suffered, even unto death, for the testimony of Christ, to whom it is applied, v. 23. and xi. 36. of our soul. They were put to such lingering deaths, that they were in the killing all the day long; so universally was this practised, that, when a man became a Christian, he reckoned himself as a sheep appointed for the slaughter.

II. By way of petition, with reference to their present distress, that God would, in his own due time, work deliverance for them. Their request is very importunate, Awake, arise, v. 25. and Thee for all us; (v. 26.) thee specially and powerfully to our relief, lxxxi. 2. Stir up thy strength, and come and save us. They complained, (v. 12.) that God had sold them; here they pray, (v. 26.) that God would redeem them, for there is no appealing from God, but by appealing to him; if he sell us, it is not any one else that can redeem us; the same hand that tears, must heal, that smites, must bind up, Hos. vi. 1. They complained, (v. 9.) Thou hast cast us off; but here they pray, (v. 23.) "Cast us not off for ever; let us not be finally forsaken of God." The expostulations are very moving; Why sleepest thou? v. 23. He that keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps; but, when he does not immediately appear for the deliverance of his people, they are tempted to think he sleeps. The expression is figurative, as (lxxxviii. 63.) Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep; but it was applicable to Christ in the letter; (Matth. viii. 24.) he was asleep when his disciples were in a storm, and they awoke him, saying, Lord, save us, we perish. Wherefore hidest thou thy face, that we may not see thee and the light of thy countenance?" Or, "that thou mayest not see us and our distresses? Thou forgettest our affliction and our oppression, for it still continues, and we see no way open for our deliverance."

And lastly, The pleas are very proper; not their own merits and righteousness, though they had the testimony of their consciences concerning their integrity, but they plead the poor sinner's pleas.
1. Their own misery, which made them the proper objects of the divine compassion; (v. 25.) "Our soul is bowed down to the dust, under prevailing grief and fear; we become as creeping things, the most despicable animals, our belly cleaves unto the earth, we cannot lift up ourselves, neither revive our own drooping spirits, nor recover ourselves out of our low and sad condition, and we lie exposed to be trodden on by every insulting foe." 2. God’s mercy; "O redeem us for thy mercy-sake; we depend upon the goodness of thy nature, which is the glory of thy name, (Exod. xxxiv. 6.) and upon those sure mercies of David, which are conveyed by the covenant to all his spiritual seed."

PSALM XLV.

This psalm is an illustrious prophecy of Messiah the Prince; it is all over gospel, and points at him only, as a Bridegroom espousing the church to himself, and as a king ruling in it, and ruling for it. It is probable that our Saviour has reference to this psalm when he compares the kingdom of heaven, more than others, to a nuptial solemnity, the solemnity of a royal nuptial, Matt. xxii. 2.—xxv. 1. We have no reason to think it has any reference to Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter; if I thought it had reference to any other than the mystical marriage between Christ and the church, I would rather apply it to some of David's marriages, because he was a man of war, such a one as the bridegroom here is described to be, which Solomon was not. But I take it to be purely and only meant of Jesus Christ; of him speaks the prophet this, of him and of no other man; and to him (v. 6, 7.) it is applied in the New Testament, (Heb. 1. 8.) nor can it be understood of any other person. The prophet speaks of the solemnity of the soul to the chief musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, Maschil. A song of loves.

1. My heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the King; my tongue is the pen of a ready writer. 2. Thou art fairer than the children of men; grace is poured into thy lips: therefore God hath blessed thee for ever. 3. Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most Mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty. 4. And in thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things. 5. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the King's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee.

Some make Shoshannim, in the title, to signify an instrument of six strings; others take it in its primitive signification for lilies or roses, which, probably, were strewed, with other flowers, at nuptial solemnities; and these are applicable to Christ, who calls himself the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valleys, Cant. ii. 1. It is a song of loves, concerning the holy love that is between Christ and his church. It is a song of the well-beloved, the virgin, the companions of the bride, (v. 14.) prepared to be sung by them; the virgin company, that attend the Lamb on mount Zion, are said to sing a new song, Rev. xiv. 3, 4.

The preface (v. 1.) speaks, 1. The dignity of the subject. It is a good matter, and it is pity that such a moving art as poetry should ever be employed about the dead. 2. It is touching the King, King Jesus, and his kingdom and godhead. Note, Those that speak of Christ, speak of a good matter, no subject so noble, so copious, so fruitful, so profitable, and so well-becoming us; it is a shame that this good matter is not more the matter of our discourse. 2. The excellency of the management; this song was a confession with the mouth, of faith in the heart, concerning Christ and his church. 1. The title is as well digested as it well deserved; My heart is inditing it, which, perhaps, is meant of that Spirit of prophecy that dictated the psalm to David; that Spirit of Christ which was in the prophets, 1 Pet. i. 11. But it is applicable to his devout meditations and affections in his heart, out of the abundance of which his mouth spake. Things concerning Christ ought to be thought of by us with all possible seriousness, with fixedness of thought, and a fire of holy love; especially when we are to speak of such superlative things, as Christ and divine things, when we speak, from the heart, that which has warmed and affected us; and we should never be rash in speaking of the things of Christ, but weigh well beforehand what we have to say, lest we speak amiss. See Eev. v. 2. (2.) It was well expressed; I will speak of the things which I have made. He would express himself, [1.] With all possible clearness, as one that did himself understand, and was affected with, the things he spake of. Not, "I will speak the things I have heard from others," that is speaking by rote; but, "the things which I have myself studied." Note, What God has wrought in our souls, as well as what he has wrought for them, we must declare to others, lxvi. 16. [2.] With all possible cheerfulness, freedom, and fluency; "My tongue is as the pen of a ready writer, guided by my heart in every word, as the pen is by the hand." We call the prophets the fummen of scripture, whereas really they were but the pen. The tongue of the most subtle disputant, and the most eloquent orator, is but the pen with which God writes what he pleases. Why should we quarrel with the pen, if bitter things be written against us; or idolize the pen, if it write in our favour? David not only spake what he thought of Christ, but wrote it, that it might spread the farther, and last the longer. His tongue was as the pen of a ready writer, that there should be nothing slip. When the heart is inditing a good matter, it is pity but the tongue should be as the pen of a ready writer, to leave it upon record.

In these verses, the Lord Jesus is represented,

1. As most beautiful and amiable in himself. It is a marriage song; and therefore the transcendental excellencies of Christ are represented by the beauty of the royal Bridegroom; (v. 2.) Thou art fairer than the children of men. 2. As a saviour for the children of men. He proposed (v. 1.) to speak of the King, but immediately directs his speech to him. They that have an admiration and affection for Christ, love to go to him and tell him so. Thus we must profess our faith, that we see his beauty, and our love, that we are pleased with it; Thou art fair, thou art fairer than the children of men. Note, Jesus Christ is in himself, and in the eyes of all believers, more amiable and lovely than the children of men.
believe shall be saved; so much terror, and there fore majesty, in that word, He that believes not, shall be damned; that we may well say, in the chariot of that gospel, which these words are the sum of, the Redeemer rides forth in glory and majesty. In thy majesty ride prosperously, v. 4.
Prosper thou; ride thou; this speaks the promise of his Father, that he should prosper according to the good pleasure of the Lord; that he should divolve with the strong, in recompense of his suffierings. Those three explications of this word from God says, Prosper, Isa. li. 10. 12. And it denges the good wishes of his friends, praying that he may prosper in the conversion of souls to him, and the destruction of all the powers of darkness that rebel against him: Thy kingdom come; Goon and prosper.
3. The glorious cause in which he is engaged;
because of truth, meekness, and righteousness, which were, in a manner, sunk and lost among men, and with which Christ came to retrieve and rescue.
(1.) The gospel itself is truth, meekness, and righeteousness; it commands by the power of truth and righteousness; for Christianity has these, incontes-tsibly, on its side, and yet it is to be promoted by meekness and gentleness, 1 Cor. iv. 12, 13. 2 Tim.
ii. 25. (2.) Christ appears in it, in his truth, meekness, and righteousness, and these are his glory and majesty, and because of these he shall prosper.
For his gentleness and meekness enable him to believe on him because he is true, to learn of him be cause he is mighty, and to serve him because he is gentle, xi. 29.) the gentleness of Christ is of mighty force. 2 Cor. x. 1. Men are brought to submit to him because he is righteous, and rules with equity.
(3.) The gospel, as far as it prevails with men, sets up in their hearts truth, meekness, and righteousness, rectifies their mistakes by the light of truth, controls their passions by the power of meekness, and governs their hearts and lives by the laws of righteousness. Christ came, by setting up his kingdom among men, to restore those glories to a degenerate world, and to maintain the cause of those just and rightful rulers under him, that by error, ma-lace, and iniquity, had been deposited.
4. The success of his expedition; “Thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things; thou shalt experience a wonderful divine power going along with thy gospel, to make it victorious; and the effects of it will be terrible things.” (1.) In order to the conversion of the nations, he must have such terrible things to be done; the heart must be pricked, conscience must be startled, and the terrors of the Lord must make way for his consolations; this is done by the right hand of Christ. The Comforter shall continue, John xvi. 8. (2.) In the conquest of the gates of hell, and its supporters, in the destruction of Judaism and Paganism, terrible things will be done, which will make men’s hearts fail them for fear, (Luke xxii. 26.) and great men and chief causes are given to the heathen nations to make war on them, Rev. vi. 15. The next verse describes these terrible things; (v. 5.) Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king’s enemies. [1.] Those that were by nature enemies are thus wounded, in order to their being reduced and reconciled. Convictions are like the arrows of the bow, which are sharp in the heart on which they fasten, and bring good that to fall under Christ, in subject to his laws and service through his grace and merit. They shall be broken, Matth. xxvi. 44. [2.] Those that persist in their enmity are thus wounded, in order to their being ruined. The arrows of God’s terrors are sharp in their hearts, whereby they shall fall under him, so as to be made his footstool, cx. 1.
These that would not have him to reign over them shall be brought forth and slain before him; (Luke xix. 27.) those that would not submit to his golden sceptre shall be broken to pieces by his iron rod
6. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre. 7. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

8. All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.

9. Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women: upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir.

We have here the royal Bridgroom filling his throne with judgment, and keeping his court with splendid ornament.

1. He here fills his throne with judgment. It is God the Father that says to the Son here, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; as appears Heb. i. 8, 9, where this is quoted to prove that he is God, and has a more excellent name than the angels. The Mediator is God, else he had neither been able to do the Mediator's work, nor fit to wear the Mediator's crown. Concerning his government, observe,

1. The eternity of it: it is for ever and ever. It shall continue on earth throughout all the ages of time, in despite of all the opposition of the gates of hell; and, in the blessed fruits and consequences of it, it shall last as long as the days of heaven, and run parallel with the line of eternity itself. Perhaps, even then the glory of the Redeemer, and the blessedness of the redeemed, shall be in a continual infinite progression; for it is promised, that not only of his government, but of the increase of his kingdom and peace, there shall be no end (Isa. ix. 7.) even then when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God, even the Father, (1 Cor. xv. 24.) the throne of the Redeemer will continue.

2. The equity of it; The sceptre of thy kingdom, the administration of thy government is right, exactly according to the eternal counsel and will of God, which is the eternal rule and reason of good and evil. Whatever Christ does, he does none of his own right; but what is his duty, that, he suffers wrong; He loves righteousness and hates wickedness, v. 7. He himself loves to do righteousness, and hates to do wickedness: and he loves those that do righteousness, and hates those that do wickedness: by the holiness of his life, the merit of his death, and the great design of his gospel, he has made it to appear that he loves righteousness, (for, by his example, his satisfaction, and his precepts, he has brought in an everlasting righteousness,) and that he hates wickedness, for never did God's hatred of sin appear so as it did in the sufferings of Christ.

3. The establishment and elevation of it; Therefore God, even thy God, (Christ, as Mediator, called God his God, (John xx. 17.) as commissioned by him, and the Head of those that are taken into covenant with him,) he has anointed thee with the oil of gladness; therefore, that is, (1.) in order to this righteous government of thine, God has given thee his Spirit, that divine unction, to qualify thee for thine undertaking," Isa. lxi. 1. The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me. What God called him to be fitted him for, Isa. xlii. 2. The Spirit is called the oil of gladness, because of the delight wherewith Christ was filled, in carrying on his undertaking. He was anointed with the Spirit above all his fellows, above all those that were anointed, whether priests or kings. (2.) In recompense of what thou hast done and suffered for the advancement of righteousness, and the destruc... robes woven with gold thread, or with a gold chain, and other ornaments of gold. This is the bride, the Lamb's wife, whose graces, which are her ornaments, are compared to fine linen, clean and white. (Rev. xix. 8.) for their purity; here to gold of Ophir, for their costliness; here to gold of Ophir, as a food to the satiated, as a drink to the glutted, as a drest up in the apparel of the Son of God. So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty; for he is thy Lord, and worship thou him. And the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour. The King's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold. She shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needle-work: the virgin companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the King's palace. Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth. I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations; therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

This latter part of the psalm is addressed to the royal bride, standing on the right hand of the royal Bridegroom, God, who said to the Son, Thou art become for ever and ever, says this to the church, whom, upon the account of her espousals to the Son, he here calls his daughter. He tells her of the duties expected from her, which ought to be considered by all those that come into relation to the Lord Jesus; "Hearken therefore, and consider this, and incline thine ear; submit to those conditions of thine espousals, and bring thy will to comply with them." For a method of profiting by the word of God; He that has ears, let him hear, let him hearken diligently; he that hearkens, let him consider and weigh it duly; he that considers, let him incline and yield to the force of what is laid before him. And what is that is here required? She must renounce all others; "Forget thine own people and thy father's house, according to the law of marriage. Retain not the affection thou hast had for them, nor covet to return to them again: banish all such remembrance, not only of thy people that were dear to thee, but of thy father's house that were dearer, as may incline thee to look back, as Lot's wife to Sodom. When Abraham, in obedience to God's call, had quitted his native soil, he was not so much as mindful of the country whence he came out. This shows, (1.) How necessary it was for those who were converted from Judaism or Paganism to the faith of Christ, wholly to cast out the old leaven, and not to bring into their Christian profession, either the Jewish ceremonies, or the heathen idolatries, for these would make such a mongrel religion in Christianity as the Samaritans had. (2.) How necessary it is for us all, when we give up our names to Jesus Christ, to hate father and mother, and all that is dear to us in this world, in comparison, to love them less than Christ and his honour, and our interest in him, Luke xiv. 26.

Here is good encouragement given to the royal bride, thus entirely to break off from her former alliances; So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty; which intimates that the mixing of her old rites and customs, whether Jewish or Gentile, with her religion, would blasmish her beauty, and would hazard her interest in the affections of the royal Bridegroom; but that if she entirely conform to his will, he would delight in her; the beauty of holiness, both of soul and body, of this particular believer, is, in the sight of Christ, of great price, and very amiable. Where that is, he says, This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell, for I have desired it. Among the golden candlesticks he walks with pleasure, Rev. ii. 1.

2. She must reverence him, must love, honour, and obey him: He is thy Lord, and worship thou him. The church is to be subject to Christ, as the wife to the husband, (Eph. v. 24,) to call him Lord, as Sarah called Abraham, as the apostle called Christ, as the church in iii. 6.) and so not only to submit to his government, but to give him divine honours; we must worship him as God, and our Lord; for this is the will of God, that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father; nay, in so doing, it is reckoned that they honour the Father; if we confess that Christ is Lord, and pay our homage to him accordingly, it is to the glory of God the Father, Phil. ii. 11.

II. He tells her of the honours designed for her. 1. Great court should be made to her, and rich presents brought her; (v. 12.) "The daughter of Tyre," a rich and splendid city, "the daughter of the King of Tyre shall be there with a gift; every royal family round about shall send a branch as a representative of the whole, to seek thy favour, and to make an interest in thee; even the rich among the people, whose wealth might be thought to discourage thee from the appearance of that beauty which shall entreat thy favour, for his sake, to whom thou art espoused, that by thee they may make him their Friend;" the Jews, the pretending Jews, who are rich to a proverb, (as rich as a Jew,) shall come and worship before the church's feet in the Philadelphian period, and shall know that Christ has loved her, Rev. iii. 9. When the Gentiles, being converted to the faith of Christ, join themselves to the church, they shall bring presents to Christ, as the Gospel commends them. 5. Rom. xiv. 16. When with themselves they devote all they have to the honour of Christ, and the service of his kingdom, they then come with a gift.

2. She shall be very splendid, and highly esteemed in the eyes of all, (1.) For her personal qualifications, the endowments of her mind, which every one shall admire; (v. 13.) The king's daughter is all glorious within. Note, The glory of the church is spiritual glory, and that is indeed all glory; it is the glory of the soul, and that is the man; it is glory in God's sight, and it is an earnest of eternal glory. The glory of the saints falls not within the view of a carnal eye; as their life, so their glory, is hid with Christ in God, neither can the natural man know it, for it is spiritually discerned; but those who do so discern it, highly value it. Let us see here what is that true glory which we should be ambitious of, that which makes a fair show in the flesh, but which is in the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, (1 Pet. iii. 4,) whose praise is not of men, but of God, Rom. ii. 29. (2.) For her rich apparel; though all her glory is within, that for which she is truly valuable, yet her clothing also is of wrought gold; the conversation of Christians, in which they appear in the world, must be enriched with good works, not gay and gaudy ones, like paint and flourish, but substantially good, like gold; and it must be accurate and exact, like wrought gold, which is worked with a great deal of care and caution.
3. Her nuptials shall be celebrated with a great deal of honour and joy; (v. 14, 15.) She shall be brought to the king, as the Lord God brought the woman to the man, (Gen. ii. 25.) to symbolize the mystic union of Christ and his church. None are brought to Christ, but whom the Father brings, and he has undertaken to do it; none besides are so brought to the king, (v. 14.) as to enter into the king's palace, v. 15. This intimates a two-fold bringing of the spouse to Christ. (1.) In the conversion of souls to Christ; then they are espoused to him, privately contracted, as chaste virgins, 2 Cor. xi. 2. Rom. vii. 4. (2.) In the completing of the mystical body, and the glorification of all the saints, at the end of time; then the bride, the Lamb's wife, shall be made completely ready, when all that belong to the election of grace shall be called in, and called home, and all gathered together to Christ, 2 Thess. ii. 1. Then is the marriage of the Lamb come, (Rev. xix. 7.—xxi. 2.) and the virgins go forth to meet the bridegroom, Matth. xxv. 1. Then they shall enter into the king's palace, into the heavenly mansions, to be ever with the Lord. In both these espousals, observe, to the honour of the royal bride. [1.] Her wedding-clothes: raiment of needle-work, the righteousness of Christ, the graces of the Spirit; both curiously wrought by divine wisdom. [2.] Her bride-maids; the virgins her companions, the wise virgins who have oil in their vessels as well as in their lamps, those who, being joined to the church, cleave to it and follow it, these shall go into the marriage. [3.] The mirth with which the nuptials will be celebrated; With gladness and rejoicings shall she be brought, when the prodigal is brought home to his father, it is meet that we should make merry and be glad; (Luke xv. 32.) and when the marriage of the Lamb is come, let us be glad and rejoice; (Rev. xix. 7.) for the day of his espousals is the day of the gladness of his heart, Cant. iii. 11. 4. The scene of this marriage shall be illustrious; (v. 16.) Instead of the fathers shall be thy children. Instead of the Old Testament church, the economy of which was waxen old, and ready to vanish away, (Heb. viii. 13.) as the fathers that are going off, there shall be a New Testament church, a Gentile church, that shall be grafted into the same olive, and partake of its root and fruitfulness; (Rom. xi. 17.) more and more eminent shall be the children of just deserts, than the children of the married wife, Isa. liv. 1. This is the Church of the New Testament; the same in truth, though in form different from that, (Isa. lxi. 10.) He shall see his seed; and these shall be made princes in all the earth, there shall be some of all nations brought into subjection to Christ, and so make princes, made to our God kings and priests, Rev. i. 6. Or it may intimate that there should be a much greater number of Christian kings than ever there was of Jewish kings; these in Canaan only, these in all the earth; making fathers of many nations, the chief of whom shall suck the breast of kings. They are princes of Christ's making; for by him kings reign, and princes decree justice.

5. The praise of this marriage shall be perpetual, in the praises of the royal Bridegroom; (v. 18.) I will make thy name to be remembered. His Father has given him a name above every name, and here promises to make it perpetual, by keeping up a succession of more names after him; he shall bear up his name; which shall thus endure for ever, (Isa. lxxi. 17.) by being remembered in all the generations of time; for the entail of Christianity shall not be cut off. "Therefore, because they shall remember thee in all generations, they shall praise thee for ever and ever." They that help to support the honour of Christ on earth, shall in heaven see his glory, and share in it, and be for ever praising him. We believe the hope of our everlasting happiness in the other world, let us always keep up the remembrance of Christ, as our only help, when we think on his suffering, in our generation; and, in assurance of the perpetuating of the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world, let us transmit the remembrance of him to succeeding generations, that his name may endure for ever, and be as the days of heaven.

PSALM XLVI.

This Psalm encourages us to hope and trust in God, and his power, and providence, and gracious presence, with his church, in the worst of times, and directs us to give him the glory of what he has done for us, and what he will do, probably, it was penned upon occasion of David's victories over the neighbouring nations, (2 Sam. xvii. 25.) and the rest which God gave him from all his enemies round about. We are here taught, I. To take comfort in God, when things look very black and threatening, v. 1.—4. II. To mention, to his praise, the great things he has wrought for his church against its enemies, v. 6.—9. III. To assure ourselves that God, who has glorified his own name, will glorify it yet again, and to comfort ourselves with that, v. 10, 11. We may, in singing it, apply it, either to our spiritual enemies, and the encouragement we have to hope, that, through Christ, we shall be more than conquerors over them, or to the public enemies of Christ's kingdom in the world, and their threatening their enemies' peace and happiness, and the security and serenity of mind, when they seem most formidable. It is said of Luther, that, when he heard any discouraging news, he would say, Come, let us sing the 46th Psalm.

To the chief musician for the sons of Korah. A song upon Alamoth.

1. God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble: 2. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; 3. Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah. 4. There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High. 5. God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early.

The Psalmist here teaches us, by his own example, 1. To triumph in God, and his relation to us, and presence with us, especially when we have had some fresh experiences of his appearing in our behalf; (v. 1.) God is our Refuge and Strength; we have found him so, he has engaged to be so, and he ever will be so. Are we pursued? God is our Refuge, to whom we may flee, and in whom we may be safe, and think ourselves so; secure in the good ground, Prov. xviii. 10. Are we oppressed by troubles? have we work to do, and enemies to grapple with? God is our Strength, to bear us up under our burthens, to fit us for all our services and sufferings; who will by his grace put strength into us, and in whom we may stay ourselves. Are we in distress? He is a Help, to do all that for us which we need, a present Help, the good word is, whom we have found to be so, a Help on which we may write Probatus est, as Christ is called a tried stone, Isa. xxviii. 16. Or, a Help at hand, one that we shall never have to seek for, but that is always near. Or, a Help sufficient, a Help accommodated to every case and exigence; whatever it is, he is a very present Help; we cannot desire a better Help, nor shall ever find the like in any creature.
II. Totriumph over the greatest dangers; God is our Strength and our Help, a God all-sufficient to us; therefore will we not fear. Those that with a holy reverence fear God, need not with any amazement to be afraid of the power of hell or earth. If God be for us, who can be against us, to do us any harm? It is our duty, it is our privilege, to be thus fearless; it is an evidence of a clear conscience, of an holy fear of God, for we have God to trust in, and his providence and promises; "We will not fear, though the earth be removed, though all our creature-con-" fidences fail us, and sink us; nay, though that which should support us threaten to swallow us up, as the earth did Korah," for whose sons this psalm was penned, and, some think, by them, yet, while we keep close to God, and have him for us, we will not fear, for we have no cause to fear;

—Si frater illusior orbis, Improv. on Hor.
—Let Jove's dread arm with thunder rend the spheres, Beneath the embers of worlds undaunted he appears.

Observe here,

1. How threatening the danger is. We will suppose the earth to be removed, and thrown into the sea, even the mountains, the strongest and finest parts of the earth, to be buried in the unfathom'd ocean; we will suppose the sea to roar and rage, and make a dreadful noise, and its fuming billows to insult the shore with so much violence as even to shake the mountains, v. 2. Though kingdoms and states be in confusion, embroiled in wars, tossed with tumults, and their governments in continual revolution; though their powers combine against the church and people of God, aim at no less than their ruin, and go very near to gain their point; yet will we not fear, knowing that all these troubles will end well for the church. See xcviii. 4. If the earth be removed, those that have laid up their treasures on earth, and set their hearts upon it; but not those who have laid up for themselves treasures in heaven, and who expect to be then most happy, when the earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. Let those be troubled at the troubling of the waters, who build their confidence on such a floating foundation, but not those who are led to the Rock that is higher than they, and find firm footing upon that Rock, and their God. The danger of this danger is, considering how well-guarded the church is, and that interest which we are concerned for. It is not any private particular concern of our own that we are in pain about; no, it is the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacle of the most High; it is the ark of God, for which our hearts tremble. But when we consider what God has provided for the comfort and safety of his church, we shall see reason to have our hearts fixed, and set above the fear of evil tidings. Here is,

(1.) Joy to the church, even in the most melancholy and sorrowful times; (v. 4.) There is a river, the streams wherein shall make it glad, even then when the waters of the sea roar, and threaten it. It alludes to the waters of Siloam, which went softly by Jerusalem; (Isa. viii. 6, 7.) though of no great depth or breadth, yet the waters of it were made sacred by the precepts of faith in God, and Hezekiah's time, Isa. xxxii. 10, 11. But this must be understood spiritually; the covenant of grace is the river, the promises of which are the streams, or, the Spirit of grace is the river, (John vii. 38, 39.) the comforts of which are the streams, that make glad the city of our God. God's word and ordinances are rivers and streams with which God makes his saints glad in cloudy and dark days. God himself is to his church a Place of broad rivers and streams, Isa. xxxviii. 21. The streams that make glad the city of God are not rapid, but gentle, like those of Siloam. Note, The spiritual comforts, which are conveyed to the saints by soft and silent whispers, and which come not with observation, are sufficient to balance the most loud and noisy threatenings of an angry and malicious world.

(2.) Establishment to the church, though heaven and earth are shaken, yet God is in the midst of her, she shall not be removed. God has assured his church of his special presence with her, and concern for her; his honour is embarrased in her, he has set up his tabernacle in her, and has undertaken the protection of it, and therefore she shall not be moved, that is, [1.] Not destroyed, nor removed, as the earth may be, v. 2. The church shall survive the world, and be in bliss when it is in ruins. It is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. [2.] Not disturbed, not much moved, with fears of the issue. If God be for us, if God be with us, we need not be moved at the most violent attempts made against us.

(3.) Deliverance to the church, though her dangers be very great; God shall help her; and who then can hurt her? He shall help her under her troubles, that she shall not sink; nay, that the more she is afflicted, the more she shallmultiply. God shall help her out of her troubles, and that right early, as Jove's anger, very speedily, for he is a present Help, (v. 1.) and very seasonably, then when things are brought to the last extremity, and when the relief will be most welcome. This may be applied by particular believers to themselves; if God be in our hearts, in the midst of us, by his word dwelling richly in us, we shall be established, we shall be helped; let us therefore trust and not be afraid; all is well, and will end well.

6. The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: he uttered his voice, the earth melted.

7. The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah. 8. Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he hath made in the earth. 9. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire. 10. Be still, and know that I am God; I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth. 11. The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

These verses give glory to God, both as King of nations, and as King of saints.

1. As King of nations, ruling the world by his power and providence, and over-ruling all the affairs of the children of men to his own glory; he does according to his will among the inhabitants of the earth, and none may say, What does thou?

1. He checks the rage, and breaks the power, of the nations that oppose him and his interests in the word; (v. 6.) The heathen raged at David's coming to the throne, and at the setting up of the kingdom of the Son of David; compare it. 1, 2. The kingdoms were moved with indignation, and rose in tumultuous, furious manner, to oppose it; but God uttered his voice, spoke to them in his wrath, and they were moved in another sense, they were struck into confusion and consternation, put into disorder, and all their measures broken; the earth itself melted under them, so that they found no firm footing, their earthly hearts failed them for fear, and dissolved like snow before the sun. Such a melting of the spirits of the enemies, is described, Judg. v. 4, 5, and see Luke xxii. 25, 26.
2. When he pleaseth to draw his sword, and give it commission, he can make great havoc among the nations, and lay all waste; (v. 8.) Come, behold the works of the Lord, they are to be observed, (lxvi. 5.) and to be sought out, cxxi. 2. All the operations of Providence must be considered as the works of the Lord, and his attributes and purposes must be taken notice of in them. Particularly, take note of the instruments he has used, the commission among the enemies of his church, who thought to have laid the land of Israel desolate. The destruction they designed to bring upon the church has been turned upon themselves. War is a tragedy which commonly destroys the stage it is acted on; David carried the war into the enemies' country; and Oh what desolations did it make there! Cities were burnt, countries laid waste, armies of men cut off and laid in heaps upon heaps. Come and see the effects of desolating judgments, and stand in awe of God; say, How terrible art thou in thy works? lxvi. 3. Let all that oppose him, see this with terror, and expect the same cup of trembling to be put into their hands; let all that fear him, and trust in him, see it with pleasure, and not be afraid of the most formidable powers armed against the church. Let them gird themselves, but they shall be broken to pieces.

3. When he pleases to sheathe his sword, he puts an end to the wars of the nations, and crowns them with peace, v. 9. War and peace depend on his word and will, as much as storms and calms at sea do, cvii. 25, 29. He makes wars to cease unto the end of the earth; sometimes in pity to the nations, that they may have a breathing time, when, by long wars with each other, they have run themselves out of breath. Both sides perhaps are weary of desolations he has visited on them; his expedients are found out for accommodation; martial princes are removed, and peace-makers set in their room; and then the bow is broken by consent, the spear cut asunder, and turned into a pruning-hook, the sword beaten into a plough-share, and the chariots of war burned, there being no more occasion for them; or rather it may be meant of what he does, at other times, in favour of his own people. He has no more need of them now, who were waged against them, and designed for their ruin. He breaks their enemies' bow that was drawn against them; No weapon formed against Zion shall prosper, Isa. liv. 17. The total destruction of Gog and Magog is propheticall described by the burning of their weapons of war; (Ezek. xxxix. 9, 10.) which intimates likewise the church's perfect security and assurance of lasting peace, which made it needless to lay up those weapons of war for their own service. The bringing of a long war to a good issue, is a work of the Lord, which we ought to behold with wonder and thankfulness.

II. As King of saints, and as such we must own that great and marvellous are his works, Rev. xv. 3.

He does, and will do, great things.

1. For his own glory; (v. 10.) Be still, and know that I am God. (1.) Let his enemies be still, and threaten no more, but know it to their terror, that he is God, one infinitely above them, and that certainly be too hard for them; let them rage no more, for it is all in vain, he that sits in heaven laughs at them; and, in spite of all their impotent malice against his name and honour, he will be exalted among the heathen, and not only among his own people, he will be exalted in the earth, and not only in the church; his name and glory will have their own way, and do their own will; but let them know that God will be exalted, he will have his way, will do his own will, will glorify his own name, and wherein they dealt boldly, he will be above them, and make them know that he is so. (2.) Let his own people be still; let them be calm and sedate, and tremble no more, but know, to their comfort, that the Lord is God, he is God alone, and will be exalted above the heathen; let him alone to maintain his honour, to fulfil his own counsels, and to support his own interest in the world. The field is desolated, yet let us not be dejected, for we are sure that God will still be exalted, and that may satisfy us; he will work for his great name, and then no matter what becomes of our little names. When we pray, Father, glorify thy name, we ought to act faith upon the answer given to that prayer, when Christ himself prayed it; I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again, Amen, Lord, so be it.

2. For his people's safety and protection. He triumphs in the former, I will be exalted; they triumph in this, (v. 7.) and again v. 11. It is the burthen of the song, "The Lord of hosts is with us; he is on our side, he takes our part, is present with us and President over us; The God of Jacob is a Refuge, to whom we may flee, and in whom we may confide, and be sure of safety." Let all believers triumph in this. (1.) They have the presence of a God of power, of all power; The Lord of hosts is with us, is the Lord of hosts, for he has all the creatures, which are called the hosts of heaven and earth, at his beck and command, and he makes what use he pleases of them, as the instruments either of his justice or of his mercy. This sovereign Lord is with us, sides with us, acts with us, and has promised he will never leave us. Hosts may be against us, but we need not fear them, if the Lord of hosts be with us. (2.) They are under the protection of God in covenant, who not only is able to help them, but is engaged in honour and faithfulness to help them. He is the God of Jacob, not only Jacob the person, but Jacob the people; nay, and of all praying people, the spiritual seed of wrestling Jacob; and he is our Refuge, by whom we are sheltered, and in whom we are satisfied, who by his providence secures our welfare, when there are no fighting, and who by his grace quiets our minds, and establishes them, when we are at war. The Lord of hosts, the God of Jacob, has been, is, and will be, with us; has been, is, and will be, our Refuge: the original includes all; and well may Selah be added to it; Mark this, and take the comfort of it, and say, If God be for us, who can be against us?

PSALM XLVII.

The scope of this psalm is to stir us up to praise God, to stir up all people to do it; and, I. We are directed in a manner to do it, publicly, cheerfully, and intelligently, v. 1, 6, 7, 11. We are furnished with matter for praise. 1. God's majesty, v. 2. His sovereign and universal dominion, v. 3. The great things he has done, and will do, for his people, v. 4, 5. I see a case, that this psalm was penned upon occasion of the bringing up of the ark to mount Zion, which v. 5. seems to refer to; God is gone up with a shout, but it looks further, to the execution of Christ into the heavenly Zion, after he had finished his undertaking on earth, and to the setting up of his kingdom in the world, to which the heathen should become willing subjects. In singing this psalm, we are to remember the time, and to consider in the heart, the joyful triumph in his exaltation, and to celebrate his praises, confessing that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

To the chief musician. A psalm for the sons of Korah.

O CLAP your hands, all ye people, shout unto God with the voice of triumph: 2. For the Lord most high is terrible; he is a great King over all the earth. 3. He shall subdue the people under us, and the nations under our feet. 4. He shall choose our inheritance for us, the excellency of Jacob, whom he loved. Selah.

The psalmist, having his own heart filled with great and good thoughts of God, endeavours to engage all our hearts to the best work of praise; as one convinced that God is worthy of all blessing and praise, and as one grieved at his own and others' backwardness to, and barrenness in, this work. Observe, in these verses,

I. Who are called upon to praise God; "all ye people, all ye people of Israel:" those were his own subjects, and under his charge, and therefore he will engage them to praise God, for on them he had a Divine claim; and influence. We never can choose, he and his house, he and his people, shall praise the Lord. Or, "all ye people and nations of the earth:" and so it may be taken as a prophecy of the conversion of the Gentiles, and the bringing of them into the church; see Rom. xv. 11.

II. What they are called upon to do; "O clap your hands, in token of your own joy and satisfaction in what God has done for you; of your approbation, and your admiration, of what God has done in his Church; and of your indignation against all the enemies of God's glory, Job xxxvii. 23. Clap your hands, as men transported with pleasure, that cannot contain themselves; shout unto God, not to make him hear, (his ear is not heavy,) but to make all about you hear, and take notice how much you are affected and filled with the works of God. Shout with the voice of triumph in him, and in his power and goodness, that others may join with you in the triumph." Note, Such expressions of praise and devout affection as to some may seem indecent and improper, ought not to be hastily censured and condemned, much less ridiculed, because, if they come from an upright heart, God will accept the strength of the affection, and excuse the weakness of the expressions of it.

III. What is suggested to us as matter for our praise.
1. That the God with whom we have to do, is a God of awful majesty; (v. 2.) The Lord most High is terrible. He is infinitely above the noblest creatures, higher than the highest; there are those perfections in him that are to be revered by all, and particularly that power, holiness, and justice, that are to be dreaded by all those that contend with him.

2. That he is a God of sovereign and universal dominion; he is a King that reigns alone, and with an absolute power; a King over all the earth; all the creatures, being made by him, are subject to him, and therefore he is a great King; the King of kings.

3. That he takes a particular care of his people, and their concerns, has done so, and ever will.

(1.) In giving them victory and success, (v. 3.) subduing the people and nations under them, both those that stood in their way, (xlv. 2.) and those that were enemies to them. This, God had done for them, witness the planting of them in Canaan, and their continuance there unto this day. This they doubted not but he would still do for them by his servant David, who prospered, which way soever he turned his victorious arms; but this looks forward to the kingdom of the Messiah, which was to be set over all the earth, and not confined to the Jewish nation only. Jesus Christ shall subdue the Gentiles; he shall subdue never others, but to the word signifies, not for slaughter, but for preservation. He shall subdue their afflictions, and make them a willing people in the day of his power; shall bring their thoughts into obedience to him, and reduce them, which had gone astray, under the guidance of the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, 1 Pet. ii. 25.

(2.) In giving them rest and settlement; (v. 4.) In short, choose our inheritance for us. He had chosen the land of Canaan to be an inheritance for Israel, it was the land which the Lord their God spied out for them; see Deut. xxxiii. 8. This justified their possession of that land, and gave them a good title; and this sweetened their enjoyment of it, and made it comfortable; they had reason to think it a happy lot, and to be satisfied in it, when it was that which Infinite Wisdom chose for them. And the setting up of God's sanctuary in it, made it the excellency of Jacob, (Amos iv. 8.) and he chose so good an inheritance for Jacob, because he loved him, Deut. vii. 8. Apply this spiritually, and it bespeaks, [1.] The happiness of the saints, that God himself has chosen their inheritance for them, and it is a godly heritage: he has chosen it, who knows the soul, and what will serve to make it happy; and he has chosen so well, that he himself has undertaken to be the Inheritance of his people, (Amos iv. 14.) and he has laid up for them in the other world an inheritance incorruptible, 1 Pet. i. 4. This will be indeed the excellency of Jacob, for whom, because he loved them, he prepared such a happiness as eye has not seen. [2.] The faith and submission of the saints to God. This is the language of every gracious soul, "God shall choose my inheritance for me; let him appoint me my lot, and I will acquiesce in the appointment. He knows what is best for me better than I do myself, and therefore I will have no will of my own but what is resolved into his."

3. God is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet. 6. Sing praises to God, sing praises; sing praises unto our King, sing praises. 7. For God is the King of all the earth: sing ye praises with understanding. 8. God reigneth over the heathen: God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness. 9. The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham: for the shields of the earth belong unto God: he is greatly exalted.

We are here most earnestly pressed to praise God, and to sing his praises; so backward are we to this duty, that God have need to be urged to it by precept upon precept, and line upon line; so we are here, (v. 6.) Sing praises to God, and again, Sing praises, Sing praises to our King, and again, Sing praises. This intimates that it is a very necessary and excellent duty, that it is a duty we ought to be frequent and abundant in; we may sing praises again and again in the same words, and it is no vain repetition, if it be done with an affection, and a spirit that disprop[r]ess the praise. This is the case with the praise of God, (Deut. viii. 1.) Should not subjects praise their king? God is our God, our King, and therefore we must praise him; we must sing his praises, as those that are pleased with them, and that are not ashamed of them. But here is a needful rule subjoined; (v. 7.) Sing ye praises with understanding, with Moschil. 1. "Intelligently: as those that do yourselves understand why and for what reasons you praise God, and what is the meaning of the service." This is the gospel rule, (1 Cor. xiv. 15.) To sing with the spirit, and with the understanding also; it is only with the heart that we make melody to the Lord, Eph. v. 19. It is not an acceptable service, if it be not a reasonable service. (2.) "Instructively: as those that desire to make others understand God's glorious perfections, and to teach them to praise him. Three things are mentioned in these verses as justifying their praises, and each of them will admit of a double sense:

I. We must praise God going up; (v. 5.) God is gone up with a shout; which may refer, 1. To the carying up of the ark to the hill of Zion, which was done with great solemnity, David himself dancing before it; the priests, it is likely, blowing the trumpets, and the people following with their loud huzzas. The ark being the instituted token of God's special presence with them, when that was brought up by warrant from him, he might be said to go up. The emerging of God's ordinances out of obscurity, in order to the more public and solemn administration of them, is a great favour to any people, which they have reason to rejoice in, and give thanks for. 2. To the ascension of our Lord Jesus into heaven, when he had finished his work on earth, Acts i. 9. Then God went up with a shout, the shout of a King, of a Conqueror, as one who, having spoiled principalities and powers, then led captivity captive, lxviii. 18. He went up as Mediator, typified by the ark, and the mercy-seat over it, and was brought as the ark was into the most holy place, into heaven itself; see Heb. ix. 24. We read not of a shout, or the sound of a trumpet, at the ascension of Christ, but they were the inhabitants of the upper world, those sons of God, that then shouted for joy, Job xxxviii. 7. He shall come again in the same manner as he went; (Acts i. 11.) and we are sure that he shall come again with a shout and the sound of a trumpet.

II. We must praise God reigning, v. 7, 8. God is not only our King, and therefore we owe our homage to him, but he is King of all the earth, (v. 7.) over all the kings of the earth, and therefore, in every place, the incentive of praise is to be chiefly directed to him. This may be understood in two senses:

1. Of the kingdom of providence. God, as Creator, and the God of nature, reigns over the heathens, disposes of them, and all their affairs, as he pleases, though they know him not, nor have any regard to him. He sits upon the throne of his holiness, which he has prepared in the heavens, and there he rules over all, even over the heathen, serving his own purposes by them and upon them. See here the excellence of them; all around his throne, all are submitted to his allegiance; even the heathen, that serve other gods, are ruled by the true God, our God, whether they will or no. See the equity of his government; it is a throne of holiness, on which he sits, whence he gives warrants, orders, and judgment, in which we are sure there is no iniquity. 2. Of the kingdom of the Messiah. Jesus Christ, who is God, and whose throne is for ever and ever, reigns over the heathen, as the most conspicuous branch of his administration of the providential kingdom, but he shall set up the kingdom of his grace in the Gentile world, and rule in the hearts of multitudes that were bred up in heathenism, Eph. ii. 12, 13. This the apostle speaks of as a great mystery, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, Eph. iii. 6. Christ sits upon the throne of his holiness, his throne in the heavens, where all the administrations of his government are exercised. It's holiness is intended to advance holiness among the children of men.

III. We must praise God as attended and honoured by the princes of the people, v. 9. This may be understood, 1. Of the congress or convention of the states of Israel, the heads and rulers of the several tribes, at the solemn feasts, or to dispatch the public business of the nation. It was the honour of Israel, that they were the people of the God of Abraham, as they were Abraham's seed, and taken into his covenant; and, thanks be to God, this blessing of Abraham is come upon the isles of the Gentiles, Gal. iii. 14. It was their happiness, that they had a settled government, princes of their people, who were the shields of their land; magistracy is the shield of a nation. And it is a great mercy to any people to have this shield; especially when their princes, their shields, belong unto the Lord, are devoted to his honour, and their power is employed in his service; for then he is greatly exalted. It is likewise the honour of God, that, in another sense, the shields of the earth do belong to him; magistracy is his institution, and he serves his own purposes by it in the government of the world, turning the hearts of kings, and the rulers, which way soever he pleases. It was well with Israel when the princes of their people were gathered together to consult for the public welfare. The unanimous agreement of the great ones of a nation in the things that belong to its peace, is a very happyomen, which proclaims abundance of blessings. 2. It may be applied to the calling of the Gentiles into the church of Christ, and taken as a prophecy, that, in the church, the kings of the earth and their people should join themselves to the church, and bring their glory and power into the New Jerusalem; that they should all become the people of the God of Abraham, to whom it was promised that he should be the father of many nations. The volunteers of the people, so it may be read; it is the same word that is used, (cx. 5.) Thy people shall be willing; for those that are gathered to Christ are not forced, but made freely willing, to be his. When the shields of the earth, the ensigns of royal dignity, (1 Kings xiv. 27, 28.) are surrendered to the Lord Jesus, as the keys of a city are presented to the conqueror or sovereign, when princes use their power for the advancement of the interests of religion, then Christ is greatly exalted.

PSALM XLVIII.

This psalm, as the two former, is a triumphant song; some think it was penned on occasion of Jehoshaphat's victory, 2 Chron. xx. xxvii. Others of Senecas arrival in Rome, and of the army laid siege to Jerusalem in Hezekiah's time; but, for aught I know, it might be penned by David, upon occasion of some eminent victory obtained in his time; yet not for that, but for this, that it might be applicable also to the glorious victories of the church, of which Jerusalem was a type, especially when it shall come to be a church triumphant, the heavenly Jerusalem, (Heb. xii. 22.) the Jerusalem which is above, Gal. iv. 26. Jerusalem is here praised, I. For its relation to God, v. 1, 2. II. For God's care of it, v. 3. III. For the terror it strikes upon its enemies, v. 4, 7. IV. For the pleasure it gives to its friends, who delight to think, 1. Of what God has done, does, and will, do, for it, v. 8. 2. Of the gracious discoveries he makes of himself, and for that holy city, v. 9, 10. 3. Of the effectual provision which is made for it, as for the church, v. 11, 12. I. We have here a view of the perpetuity of God's covenant with the children of Zion, v. 14. In singing this psalm, we must be affected with the privilege we have as members of the gospel-church, and must express and exult our sincere good-will to all its interests.

A song and psalm for the sons of Korah.

1. GREAT is the Lord, and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, in the mountain of his holiness. 2. Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is mount Zion; on the sides of the north, the city of the great King. God is known in her palaces for a refuge. 4. For, lo, the kings were assembled, they passed by together. 5. They saw it, and so they mar-
The situation must needs be every way agreeable, when Infinite Wisdom chose it for the place of the sanctuary; and that which made it beautiful, was, that it was the mountain of holiness, for there is a beauty in holiness. This earth is, by sin, covered with deformity, and therefore justly might that spot of ground, which was thus be adorned with holiness, be called the joy of the whole earth, that is, what the whole earth had reason to rejoice in, that God would thus in very deed dwell with man upon the earth.

Mount Zion was on the north side of Jerusalem, and so was a shelter to the city from the cold and bleak winds that blew from that quarter; or, if fair weather was expected out of the north, they were thus directed to look Zion-ward for it.

II. That the kings of the earth were afraid of it. That God was known in their palaces for a Refuge, they had had a late instance, and a very remarkable one. Whatever it was,

1. They had had but too much occasion to fear their enemies; For the kings were assembled, v. 4.

The neighbouring princes were confederate against Jerusalem, their heads and horns, their policies and powers, were combined for its ruin; they were as assembled with all their forces, they passed, advanced, and marched together, not doubting but they should soon make themselves masters of that city which should have been the joy, but was the envy, of the whole earth.

2. God made their enemies to fear them. The very sight of Jerusalem struck them into a consternation, and gave check to their fury; as the sight of the tents of Jacob frightened Balaam from his purpose to curse Israel, Numb. xxiv. 2. They saw it and marvelled, and basted away, v. 5. Not Veni, vidi, vici—I came, I saw, I conquered; but, on the contrary, Veni, vidi, victus sum— I came, I saw, I was defeated. Not that there was anything to be seen in Jerusalem that was so very formidable; but the sight of it brought to mind what they had heard concerning the special presence of God in that city, and the divine protection it was under, and God impressed such terrors on their minds thereby, as made them retire with precipitation. Though they were kings, though they were many, though they were mighty, yet, when they knew themselves an unequal match for Omnipo tence, and therefore fear came upon them, and pain, v. 6. Note, God can dispirit the stoutest of his church's enemies, and soon put them in pain that live at ease. The fright they were in upon the sight of Jerusalem is here compared to the threes of a woman in travail, which are sharp and grievous, which sometimes come suddenly, (1 Thess. v. 3.) which cannot be avoided, and which are effects of sin and the curse. The defeat hereby given to their designs upon Jerusalem is compared to the dreadful work made with a fleet of ships by a violent storm, when some are split, others shattered, all dispersed; (v. 7.) Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east-wind; effects at sea lie thus exposed. The terrors of God are compared to an east-wind; (Job xxviii. 20, 21.) these shall put them into confusion, and break all their measures. Who knows the power of God's anger?

3. As we have heard, so have we seen in the city of the Lord of hosts, in the city of our God: God will establish it for ever Selah. 9. We have thought of thy loving-kindness, O God, in the midst of thy temple.

10. According to thy name, O God, so is thy praise unto the ends of the earth: thy right hand is full of righteousness. 11. Let Zion rejoice, let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of thy judgments
12. Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof. 13. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following.

14. For this God is our God for ever and ever; he will be our guide even unto death.

We have here the good use and improvement which the people of God are taught to make of his late glorious and gracious appearances for them against their enemies, that they might work for their good.

I. Let our faith in the word of God be hereby confirmed. If we compare what God has done with what he has spoken, we shall find, that as we have heard, so have we seen, (v. 8.) and what we have seen, obliges us to believe what we have heard.

1. As we have heard done in former providences, in the days of old, so have we seen done in our own days. Note, God’s latter appearances for his people, against his and their enemies, are consonant to his former appearances, and should put us in mind of them. 2. As we have heard in the promise and prediction, so have we seen in the performance and accomplishment. We have heard that God is the Lord of hosts, and that Jerusalem is the city of our God, is dear to him, is his particular care; and now we have seen it, we have seen the power of our God, we have seen his goodness, we have seen his care and concern for us; that he is a Wall of fire round about Jerusalem, and the glory in the midst of her. Note, In the great things that God has done, and is doing, for his church, it is good to take notice of the fulfilling of the scriptures; and this would help us the better to understand both the providence itself, and the scripture that is fulfilled in it.

II. Let our hope of the stability and perpetuity of the church be hereby encouraged. "From what we have seen, compared with what we have heard, in the city of our God, we may conclude, that God will establish it for ever." This was not fulfilled in Jerusalem, that city was long since destroyed, and all its glory laid in the dust; but has its accomplishment in the gospel-church; we are sure that shall be finished for ever, it is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell cannot prevail against it. (Matt. xvi. 18.) God himself has undertaken the establishment of it; it is the Lord that has founded Zion, Isa. xiv. 32. And what we have seen, compared with what we have heard, may encourage us to hope in that promise of God, upon which the church is built.

III. Let our minds be hereby filled with good thoughts of God. "Fred with what we have heard, and with what we see, for we may as well expect to think much of God’s loving-kindness, whenever we meet in the midst of his temple," v. 9. All the streams of mercy that flow down to us, must be run up to the fountain of God’s loving-kindness. It is not owing to any merit of ours, but purely to his mercy, and the peculiar favour he bears to his people. This, therefore, we must think of with delight, think of frequently, and fixedly. What subject can we dwell upon more pleasant, more profitable? We must have God’s loving-kindness always before our eyes, (xxxvi. 3.) especially when we attend upon him in his temple. When we enjoy the benefit of public ordinances undisturbed, we meet in his temple, and there is none to make us afraid, we should take occasion thence to think of his loving-kindness.

IV. Let us give to God the glory of the great things which he has done for us, and mention them to his honour. (v. 10.) "According to thy name, O God, so is thy praise, not only in Jerusalem, but to the ends of the earth." But if we review the deliverance of Jerusalem, God had made himself a name; he had gloriously discovered his wisdom, power, and goodness, and made all the nations about sensible of it; and so was his praise; that is, some, in all parts, would be found giving glory to him accordingly. As far as his name goes, his praise will go, at least, it should go, and, at length, it shall go, when the ends of the world shall praise him, xxvii. 27. Rev. x. 11. Some, by his name, thought especially that glorious name of his, the Lord of hosts; according to that name, so is his praise; for all the creatures, even to the ends of the earth, are under his command. But his people must, in a special manner, acknowledge his justice in all he does for them; “Righteousness fills thy right hand; all the operations of thy power are consonant to the eternal rules of equity.

V. Let all the members of the church in particular, take to themselves the comfort of what God does for his church in general; (v. 11.) "Let mount Zion rejoice, the priests and Levites that attend the sanctuary, and then let all the daughters of Judah, the country-towns, and the inhabitants of them, be glad; let the women, in their songs and dances, as usual on occasion of public joys, celebrate with thankfulness this great salvation which God has wrought for them." Note, When we have given God the praise, we may then take the pleasure of the extraordinary deliverances of the church, and be glad because of God’s judgments, the operations of his providence, all which we may see wrought in wisdom, (therefore called judgments,) and working for the good of his church.

VI. Let us diligently observe the instances and evidences of the church’s beauty, strength, and safety, and faithfully transmit our observations to those that shall come after us; (v. 12, 13.) Walk about Zion. Some think this refers to the ceremonies of the triumph; let these who are employed in that solemnity, walk round the walls, as they did, (Neh. xii. 31.) singing, and praising God. In doing this, let them tell the towers, and mark well the bulwarks.

1. That they might magnify the late wonderful deliverance God had wrought for them. Let them observe, with wonder, that the towers and bulwarks of Zion, which are in all their strength, and none of them damaged; the palaces are in their beauty, and none of them blemished; there is not the least damage done to the city by the kings that were assembled against it; (v. 4.) "Tell this to the generation following, as a wonderful instance of God’s care of his holy city, that the enemies should not only not ruin or destroy it, but not so much as hurt or deface it. 2. That they might fortify themselves against the fear of the like threatening danger, another time. And so, (1.) that they may keep up their constancy in the strong-hold of Zion. Let the daughters of Judah see the towers and bulwarks of Zion, with pleasure, equal to the terror with which the kings, their enemies, saw them, v. 5. Jerusalem was generally looked upon as an impregnable place, as appears, Lam. iv. 12. All the inhabitants of the world would not have believed that an enemy should have entered the gates of Jerusalem; nor could they have imagined that a people so weak in number, could have set up their defence. Set your heart to her bulwarks. This intimates that the principal bulwarks of Zion were, not the objects of sense, which they might set their eye upon, but the objects of faith, which they must set their hearts upon; it was well enough fortified, indeed, both by nature and art; but its bulwarks, that were mostly to be relied upon, were the special presence of God in it, the beauty of holiness he had put upon it, and the promises he had made.
concerning it. "Consider Jerusalem's strength, and tell it to the generations to come, that they may do nothing to weaken it, and that, if at any time it be in distress, they may not basely surrender it to the enemy as not tenable." Calvin observes here, that when they are directed to transmit to posterity a particular account of the towers, and bulwarks, and palaces of Jerusalem, it is intimated, that, in proportion of time, these would and the world would remain no longer to be seen; for, otherwise, what need was there to preserve the description and history of them? When the disciples were admiring the buildings of the temple, their Master told them, that in a little time one stone of it should not be left upon another, Matt. xxiv. 1, 2. Therefore, (2.) This must certainly be applied to the gospel-church, that mount Zion, Hebr. xii. 22. If Consider the towers, and bulwarks, and palaces, of that, that you may be invited and encouraged to join yourselves to it, and embark in it. See it founded on Christ, the Rock fortified by the divine power, guarded by him that neither slumbers nor sleeps. See what precious ordinances are its palaces, what precious promises are its bulwarks; tell this to the generation following, that they may with purpose of heart espouse its interests, and cleave to it, Hebrews x. 18. God, in the assurances we have of his everlasting loving-kindness, v. 14. Tell this to the generation following, transmit this truth as a sacred deposit to your posterity, That this God, who has now done such great things for us, is our God for ever and ever; he is constant and unchangeable in his love to us and care for us. 1. If God be our God, he is ours for ever, not only through all the ages of time, but to eternity; for it is God's everlasting blessedness of glorified saints, that God himself should be with them, his Spirit, Rev. xxi. 3. 2. If he be our God, he will be our Guide, our faithful constant Guide, to show us our way, and to lead us in it; he will be so, even unto death, which will be the period of our way, and will bring us to our rest. He will lead and keep us, even to the last. He will be our Guide above death; so some. He will so guide us, as to set us above the reach of death, so that it shall not be able to have the mastery of us; but he will place us by our Guide beyond death; so others. He will conduct us safe to a happiness on the other side death, to a life in which there shall be no more death. If we take the Lord for our God, he will conduct and convey us safe to death, through death, and beyond death; down to death, and up again to glory.

PSALM XLIX.
This psalm is a sermon, and so is the next. In most of the psalms, we have the penman praying or praising; in these, we have him preaching, and it is our duty, in singing psalms, to teach and admonish each other one another. The scope and design of this discourse is, to convince the men of this world of their sin and folly in setting their hearts upon the things of this world, and so to persuade them to seek the treasures of a better world; as also comfort the people of God, in reference to their own troubles, and the grief that arises from the prosperity of the wicked. I. In the preface, he proposes to awaken world, to the conviction of the vanity of the world, and to comfort himself and other good people in a day of distress, v. 4, 5. II. In the rest of the psalm, 1. He endeavours to convince sinners of their folly in doing upon the wealth of the world, by showing them, (1.) That they cannot, with all their wealth, save their friends from death, v. 6, 9. (2.) They cannot save themselves from death, v. 10. (3.) They cannot secure themselves a happiness in this world, v. 11, 12. Much less, (4.) Can they secure to themselves the prosperity of the world, v. 14. 2. He endeavours to comfort himself and other good people, (1.) Against the fear of death, v. 15. (2.) Against the fear of the prospering power of wicked people, v. 16, 20. In singing this psalm, let us receive these instructions and be wise.

To the chief musician. A psalm for the sons of Korah.
1. H E A R this, all ye people; give ear, all ye inhabitants of the world: 2. Both low and high, rich and poor together. 3. My mouth shall speak of wisdom; and the meditation of my heart shall be of understanding. 4. I will incline mine ear to a parable; I will open my dark saying upon the harp. 5. Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about?

This is the psalmist's preface to his discourse concerning the vanity of the world, and its insufficiency to make us happy; and we seldom meet with an introduction more solemn than this; for there is no part of the divine word more highly weighed, in weight and importance, and the consideration of which will be of more advantage to us.

I. He demands the attention of others to that which he was about to say; (v. 1, 2.) Hear this, all ye people; hear it and heed it, hear it and consider it; what is spoken once, hear twice; Hear and give ear, lxxi. 9, 11. Not only, "Hear, all ye Israelites, and give ear all the inhabitants of Canaan," (v. 2.) but, "Hear, all ye people, and give ear, all inhabitants of the world; for this doctrine is not peculiar to those that are blessed with divine revelation, but even the light of nature witnesses to it. All men may know, and therefore let all men consider, that their riches will not profit them in the day of death. Both low and high, both rich and poor, must come together, to hear the word of God; let both, therefore, hear this with application. Let those that are high and rich in the world, hear of the vanity of their worldly possessions, and let them be proud of them, nor secure in the enjoyment of them, but lay them out in doing good, that with them they may make to themselves friends; let those that are poor and low, hear this, and be content with their little, and not envy those that have abundance. Poor people are as much in danger from an inordinate desire toward the wealth of the world, as rich people from an inordinate delight in it.

He gives good reasons why his discourse shall be regarded; (v. 3.) My mouth shall speak of wisdom; what he had to say, I. Was true and good. It is wisdom and understanding, it will make these wise and intelligent that receive it, and submit to it. It is not doubtful but certain, not trivial but weighty, not a matter of nice speculation, but of admirable use, to guide us in the right way to our great end. 2. It was what he had himself well-digested. What his mouth spake was the meditation of his heart; (v. xli. 14.—xlv.) it was wise God put into his mind, what he had himself seriously considered, and was fully apprized of the meaning of, and convinced of the truth of. That which ministers speak from their own hearts is most likely to reach the hearts of their hearers. II. He engages his own attention; (v. 4.) I will incline mine ear to a parable. It is called a parallel, not because it is figurative and obscure, but because it is a fair and direct discourse concerning the vanity of the world. It is the same word that is used concerning Solomon's proverbs. The psalmist will himself incline his ear to it. This intimates, 1. That he was taught by it the Spirit of God, and did not speak of himself. Those that undertake to teach others, must first learn themselves. 2. That he thought himself nearly concerned in it, and was resolved not to venture his own soul upon that bottom which he dashed others from venturing their upon. 3. That he would not expect others should attend to that which he himself did not attend to as a matter of the greatest importance. Where God gives the tongue of the learned, he first wakes the ear to hear as the learned, Isa. 1. 4.

III. He promises to make the matter as plain, and as affecting, as he could; I will open my dark saying upon the harp. What he learned for himself, he would not conceal or confine to himself, but would communicate, for the benefit of others. 1. Some understood it not, it was a riddle to them; tell them of the vanity of the things that are seen of the reality and weight of invisible things, and they say, Ah, Lord God, doth he not speak parables? For the sake of such, he would open this dark saying, and make it so plain, that he that runs might read it. 2. Others understood it well enough, but they were not removed by it, it never affected them, and, for their sake, he would open it upon the harp, and try that expedient to work upon them, to see if it might turn them. This verse may find him who a sermon flies. Herbert.

IV. He begins with the application of it to himself, and that is the right method in which to treat of divine things; we must first preach to ourselves, before we undertake to admonish or instruct others. Before he comes to set down the folly of carnal security, (v. 6.) he here lays down, from his own experience, the self-conceit and comfort of a holy gracious security, which they enjoy who trust in God, and not in their worldly wealth; Wherefore should I fear? he means, Wherefore should I fear their fear, (Isa. viii. 12.) the fears of worldly people? 1. "Wherefore should I be afraid of them? Wherefore should I fear in the days of trouble and persecution, when the indignity of my heels, or of my suppliants that endeavour to trip up my heels, shall come upon me, and they shall surround me with their mischievous attempts? Why should I be afraid of those, all whose power lies in their wealth, which will not enable them to redeem their friends? I will not fear their power, for it cannot enable them to ruin me." The great men of the world will not appear at all formidable, when we consider what little stead their wealth will stand them in. We need not fear their casting us down from our excellency, who cannot support themselves by their policy. "Wherefore should I be afraid like them?" The days of old age and death are the days of evil, Eccl. xii. 1. In the day of judgment, the indignity of our heels, or of our steps, our past sins, will compass us about, will be set in order before us. Every work will be brought into judgment, with every secret thing; and every one of us must give account of himself. In these days, worldly wicked people will be afraid; nothing more dreadful to them, that have set their hearts upon the world, than to think of leaving it; death to them is the king of terrors, because, after death, comes the judgment, when their sins will surround them as so many furies; but wherefore should a good man fear death, who has God with him? xxiii. 4. When his inequities compass him about, he sees them all pardoned, his conscience is purified and pacified, and then, even in the judgment-day, when the hearts of others fail them for fear, they can lift up their heads with joy, Luke xxi. 26, 28. Note, The children of God, though ever so poor, are in this truly happy, above the most prosperous of the children of this world, that they are well-guarded against the terrors of death, and the judgment to come.

6. They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches; 7. None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him; 8. (For the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever;) 9. That he should still live for ever, and not see corruption. 10. For he seeth that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, and leave their wealth to others. 11. Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling-places to all generations; they call their lands after their own names. 12. Nevertheless, man being in honour abideth not; he is like the beasts that perish. 13. This their way is their folly; yet their posterity approve their sayings. Selah. 14. Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling.

In these verses, we have,

I. A description of the spirit and way of worldly people, whose portion is in this life, xvii. 14. —xlix. 6. —xlix. 11. It is taken for granted that they have wealth, and a multitude of riches, (v. 6.) houses and lands of inheritance, which they call their own. iv. 11. God often gives abundance of the good things of this world to bad men, who live in contempt of him, and rebellion against him—by which it appears, that they are not the best things in themselves, for then God would give most of them to his best friends; and that they are not the best things for us, for then they would not have so much of them, who, being marks of his displeasure, are to be repined for by their prosperity, Prov. xxxi. 3. A man may have abundance of the wealth of this world, and be made better by it, may thereby have his heart enlarged in love, and thankfulness, and obedience, and may do that good with it which will be fruit abounding to his account; and therefore it is not men's having riches that denominates them worldly, but their setting their hearts upon them as the best things; and such worldly people are here described;

1. They repose confidence in their riches; They trust in their wealth, (v. 6.) they depend upon it as their portion and happiness, and expect that it will secure them from all evil, and supply them with all good, and that they need nothing else, neither God himself. Their gold is their hope, (Job xxxiv. 24.) and so it becomes their god. Thus our Saviour explains the difficulty of the salvation of rich people, (Mark x. 24.) How hard it is for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God! See 1 Tim. vi. 17.

2. They take a pride in their riches; They boast themselves in the multitude of them, as if they were sure tokens of God's favour, and certain proofs of their own ingenuity and industry. My might, and the power of my hand, have gotten me this wealth; as if they made them truly great and happy, and more happily excelt their neighbours. They boast that they have all they would have, (x. 3.) and can set all the world at defiance; I sit as a queen, and shall be a lady for ever; therefore they call their lands after their own names, hoping thereby to perpetuate their memory; and, if their lands do retain the names by which they called them, it is but a poor honour; but they often change their names when they change their owners.

3. They flatter themselves with an expectation of the perpetuity of their worldly possessions; (v. 11.) Their inward thought is, that their houses shall con-time for ever, and with this thought they please themselves. Are not all thoughts inward? Yes; but it intimates, (v. 10.) that this thought is only rooted in their minds, is rolled and revolved there, and carefully lodged in the innermost recesses of their hearts.
A godly man has thoughts of the world, but they are his outward thoughts; his inward thought is reserved for God and heavenly things; but a worldly man has only some foreign floating thoughts of the things of the world, while his fixed thought, his inward thought, is about the world; that lies nearest his heart, and is upon the throne there. (3.) There is ugly-ciously concealed; they cannot, for shame, say that they expect their houses to continue for ever, but, inwardly, they think so. If they cannot persuade themselves that they shall continue for ever, yet they are so foolish as to think their houses shall, and their dwelling-places—suppose they should, what good will that do them, when they shall be no longer theirs? But they will not; for the world passes away, and the fashion of it: all things are decreed by the teeth of time.

II. A demonstration of their folly herein. In general, (v. 13.) This their way is their folly. Note, The way of worldliness is a very foolish way: they that lay up their treasure on earth, and set their affections on things below, act contrary both to right reason and to their true interest. God himself pronounced him a fool that thought his goods were laid up for many years. (1.) For as much as they have a portion for his soul, Luke xii. 19, 20. And yet their posterity approve their sayings, agree with them in the same sentiments, say as they say, and do as they do, and tread in the steps of their worldliness. Note, The love of the world is a disease that runs in the blood; men have it by kind, till the grace of God cures it.

To prove the folly of carnal worldlings, he shows, 1. That, with all their wealth, they cannot save the friend that they have in the world, nor purchase a reprieve for him when he is under the arrest of death; (v. 7-9.) None of them can by any means redeem his brother; his brotherworldling, who would give him counter-security out of his own estate, if he would but bai] for him: and gladly he would, in hopes that he might do the same kindness for him another time. But their words will not be taken one for another, nor one for the ransom of another man's life. God does not value it, it is of no account with him; and the true value of things is as they stand in his books. His justice will not accept it by way of commutation or equivalent. The Lord of our brother's life is the Lord of our estate, and may take both, if he please, without either difficulty to himself or wrong to us; and therefore one cannot be ransom for another. We cannot bribe death, that our debt to it we should live, much less that he should live for ever, in this world, nor bribe the grave, that he should not see corruption; for we must needs die, and return to the dust, and there is no discharge from that war. What folly is it to trust to that, and boast of that, which will not enable us so much as for one hour to respite the execution of the sentence of death upon a parent, a child, or a friend that is to us our own soul? It is certainly a most unprofitable purchase, a foolish and wasteful expence; and, if purchased, is only precious, and creaseth for ever; life, when it is going, cannot be arrested, and when it is gone, it cannot be recalled, by any human art, or worldly price. But this looks further, to the eternal redemption which was to be wrought out by the Messiah, whom the Old Testament saints had an eye to as the Redemer. Immortality is a jewel of too great a va-value to be purchased by the wealth of this world.

We are not redeemed with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, 1 Pet. i. 18, 19. The learned

Dr. Hammond applies the 8th and 9th verses expressly to Christ: "The redemption of the soul shall be precious, shall be high-priced, it shall cost very dear; but, being once wrought, it shall cease for ever, it shall never need to be redeemed," Heb. i. 25, 26.—x. 12. And he, the Redeemer, shall yet live for ever, and shall not see corruption; he shall rise again before he sees corruption, and they shall live for evermore," Rev. i. 18. Christ did that for us which, all the riches of the world could never purchase; he gave his life for us: therefore rather he is dearer to us than any worldly things. Christ did that for us which a brother, a friend, could not do for us, no not one of the best estate or interest; and therefore those that love father or brother more than him, are not worthy of him. This likewise shows the folly of worldly people, who sell their souls for that which would never buy them.

2. That, with all their wealth, they cannot secure themselves from the stroke of death. The worldliness see, and it vexes him to see it, that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, v. 10. Therefore he cannot but expect that it will, at length, come to his own turn; he cannot find any encouragement to hope that he himself shall continue for ever, and therefore foolishly comforts himself with this, that, though he shall not, his house shall. Some rich people are wise, they are poli-cially, but they cannot out-wit death, nor evade his stroke, with all their treasures. (1.) They are fools and brutish, (Fortuna favet fatuis—Fools are fortune's favourites,) these, though they do no good, yet perhaps do no great hurt, in the world: but that shall not excuse them, they shall perish, and be taken away by death, as well as the wise that did mischief with their craft. Or by the wise and the foolish we may understand the godly and the wicked; the godly die, and their death is their deliverance; the wicked perish, their death is their destruction; but, however, they leave their wealth to others. (1.) They cannot continue with it, nor will it serve to procure them a reprieve. That is a frivolous plea, though once it served a turn; (Jer. xlii. 8.) Say us not, for we have treasures in the field. (2.) They cannot carry it away with them, but must leave it behind them. (3.) They cannot foresee who will enjoy it when they have left it; (Jer. xi. 15.) let not him that thinketh himself wise confound himself, that no one knows what is to be. (4.) They know not, perhaps to a fool, (Ecc. ii. 19,) perhaps to an enemy.

And as men's wealth will stand them in no stead in a dying hour, so neither will their honour; (v. 12.) Man, being in honour, abides not. We will suppose a man advanced to the highest pinnacle of preferment, as great and happy as the world can make him; man in splendour, man at his best estate, surrounded and supported with all the advantages he can desire; yet then he abides not, his honour does not continue, that is a fleeting shadow, he himself does not. He carries not all night; this world is an inn, in which his stay is so short, that he can scarcely be said to get a night's lodging in it; so little rest is there in these things; he has but a bauling-time; He is like the beasts that perish; he must as certainly die as the beasts, and his death will be as final a period as theirs. (2.) Men's estates are as in the hand of the body likewise will putrify as theirs do; and (as Dr. Hammond observes) frequently the greatest honours and wealth, unjustly gotten by the parent, descend not to any one of his posterity, (as the beasts, when they die, leave nothing behind them to their young ones, but the wide world to feed in,) but fall into other hands immediately, for which he never designed to gather them. Then their condition on the other side death will be very miserable. The world they dote upon, will not only not save them from death, but will sin.

them so much the lower into hell; (v. 14.) Like sheep they are laid in the grave. Their prosperity did but feed them like sheep for the slaughter, (Hos. iv. 16.) and then death comes and shuts them up in the grave, like fat sheep in a fold, to be brought forth to the day of wrath, Job xxi. 30. Multitudes of them, like flocks of sheep dead of some disease, are thrown into the grave, and there death shall feed on them, the second death, the worm that dies not, Job xxix. 40. Their own guilty corpses were not, as usual, consumed by various vultures, shall come down continually preying upon them, with, Son, remember, Luke xvi. 25. Death insults and triumphs over them, as it is represented in the fall of the king of Babylon, at which hell from beneath is moved, Isa. xiv. 9, &c. While a saint can ask proud Death, Where is thy sting? Death will ask the proud sinner, Where is thy wealth, thy portion? and the more he was fattened with prosperity, the more sweetly will death feed on him. And in the morning of the resurrection, when all that sleep in the dust shall awake, (Dan. xii. 2.) the upright shall have dominion over them; shall not only be advanced to the highest dignity and honour, when they are filled with everlasting shame and contempt, elevated to the highest heavens, when they are sunk to the lowest hell; but they shall be assessors with Christ in passing judgment upon them, and shall applaud the justice of God in their ruin. When the rich man in hell begged that Lazarus might bring him a drop of water to cool his tongue, he owned that that upright man had dominion over him, as the foolish virgins also owned the dominion of the wise, and that they lay much at their mercy, when they begged, Give us of your oil. Let this comfort us, in reference to the oppressions which the upright are now often groaning under, and the dominion which they feel have over them, and we shall not be astonished, when the tables are turned, (Esther i. 1.) and the upright will have the dominion. Let us now judge of things, as they will appear at that day. But what will become of all the beauty of the wicked? Alas! that shall all be consumed in the grave from their dwelling; all that upon which they valued themselves, and for which others earossed and admired them, was all adventitious and borrowed, and they found it to be vanity and vexation of spirit, in their own native deformity. The beauty of holiness is that which the grave, that consumes all other beauty, cannot touch, or do any damage to. Their beauty shall consume, the grave, or hell, being a habitation to every one of them; and what beauty can be there where there is nothing but the blackness of darkness for ever?

15. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave; for he shall receive me. Selah. 16. Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased: 17. For, when he dieth, he shall carry nothing away; his glory shall not descend after him; 18. Though, while he lived, he blessed his soul; (and men will praise thee when thou dost well to thyself;) 19. He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light. 20. Man, that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish.

Good reason is here given to good people, why they should not be afraid of death. There is no cause for that fear, if they have such a comforatable prospect as David here has of a happy state on the other side death, v. 15. He had showed (v. 14.) how miserable the dead are that die in their sins; here he shows how blessed the dead are that die in the Lord. The distinction of men's outward condition, how great a difference soever it makes in life, makes none at death; rich and poor meet in the grave: but the distinction of men's spiritual state, though, in this life, it makes a small difference, where all things come alike to all, yet, at and after death, it makes a very great one; Now he is comforted, and thou art comforted. The righteous has hope in his death, so he has not been concerned with his soul. Note, The believing hopes of the soul's redemption from the grave, and reception to glory, are the great support and joy of the children of God in a dying hour. They hope, 1. That God will redeem their souls from the power of the grave; which includes, (1.) The preserving of the soul from going to the grave with the body. The grave has a power over the body, by virtue of the sentence, (Gen. iii. 19.) and it is cruel enough in executing that power, (Cant. viii. 6.) but it has no such power over the soul; it has power to silence, and imprison, and consume, the body; but the soul then moves, and acts, and converses, more freely than ever; (Rev. vi. 9, 10.) it is immortal and immortal. When death breaks the dark-lantern, yet it does not extinguish the candle that was pent up in it. (2.) The re-uniting of the soul, the body, and the grave, which is often put for the life; that indeed falls under the power of the grave for a time, but it shall, at length, be redeemed from it, when mortality shall be swallowed up of life. The God of life, that was its Creator at first, can and will be its Redeemer at last. (3.) The salvation of the soul from eternal ruin; "God shall redeem my soul from the sheol of hell, the wrath to come, that pit of destruction into which the wicked descend." It is a great comfort to dying saints, that they shall not be hurt by the second death, (Revel. ii. 11.) and therefore the first death has no sting, and the grave no victory. 2. That he will receive them to himself. He redeems their souls, that he may receive them, (xxxii. 3.) Into thy hands I commit my spirit, for thou hast redeemed it. He will receive them into his favour, will admit them into his kingdom, into the mansions prepared for them, (John xiv. 2, 3.) those everlasting habitations, Luke xvi. 19. II. Why they should not be afraid of the prosperity and power of wicked people in this world, which, as it is their pride and joy, has often been the envy, and grief, and terror, of the righteous; which yet, all things considered, there is no reason for. 1. He supposes they will be under a strong temptation to envy the prosperity of sinners, and to be afraid that they will carry all before them with a high hand, that with their wealth and interest they will run down religion and religious people, and that they will be found the truly happy people: for he supposes, (1.) That they are made rich, and so are enabled to give law to all about them, and have every thing at command; Pecunia obiedunt omnibus et omnino—Every person and every thing obeys the commanding influence of money. (2.) That the glory of their house, from very small beginnings, as it increased and grew, makes men haughty, insolent, and imperious, v. 16. Thus they seem to be the favourites of Heaven, and therefore formidable. (3.) That they are very easy and secure in themselves and in their own minds; (v. 18.) In his life-time, he blessed his soul; he thought himself a very happy man, such an one as he would be, because he was prosperous in the world. He blessed his soul, as that rich fool who said to his soul, "Soul, take thine ease, and be not disturbed either with cares and fears about the world, or with wicked fathers, whose sayings he approved, and whose steps he trod in, his fathers who would not hearken to the word of God, Zech. vi. 4. He shall go to be there where they are that shall never see light, shall never have the least glimpse of comfort or joy, but shall dwell in utter darkness. Be not afraid then of the pomp and the power, the wealth and the property, the glory, the honour, the pleasure, the profits of wicked people; for the end of the man that is in honour, if he be not wise and good, will be miserable; if he understand not, he is to be pitied rather than envied.
A fool, a wicked man, in honour, is really as despi-cable an animal as any under the sun; he is like the beasts that perish; (v. 20.) nay, it is better to be a beast, than to be a man that makes himself like a beast. In men in honour, that understand, that know right, and can do the right thing, and that do good to those who are under them, like good gods, and as children of the Most High. But men in honour, that understand not, that are proud, and sensual, and oppressive, are as beasts, and they shall perish, like the beasts, ingloriously as to this world, though not, like the beasts, indemnified as to another world. Let prosperous sinners therefore be afraid for themselves, but let not even suffering saints be afraid of them.

PSALM L.

This psalm, as the former, is a psalm of instruction, not of prayer or praise; it is a psalm of reproof and admonition, in singing which, we are to teach and admonish one another. In this psalm we are to bring our minds to right feeling and thinking, and to guard our souls against all sin, and for this purpose the psalmist brings home the words of God. He begins (v. 1.) by putting the rebukes and admonitions of conscience. All is well, and will be well for ever." Note, [1.] It is of great consequence to consider what that is in which we bless our souls, upon the score of which we think well of ourselves. Believers bless themselves in the God of truth, (Isa. lxv. 16.) and think themselves happy, if he be theirs; carnal people beg for the rewards of the world, and think themselves happy if they have abundance of that. [2.] There are many whose precious souls lie under God's curse, and yet they do themselves bless; they applaud that in themselves which God condemns, and speak peace to themselves, when God denounces war against them. Yet this is not all. (4.) They are in good reputation among their neighbours; "Men and women may see thee up, as having done well for thyself in raising such an estate and family." This is the sentiment of all the children of this world, that those do best for themselves that do most for their bodies, by heaping up riches, though, at the same time, nothing is done for the soul, nothing for eternity; and accordingly they bless the covetous, whom the Lord abhorreth, x. 3. If men were to be our judges, it were our wisdom thus to recommend ourselves to their good opinion, that we might be pitied rather than envied of men, if God condemn us? Dr. Hammond understands this of the good man here spoken to, for it is the second person, not of the wicked man spoken of; "He, in his life-time, blessed his soul, but shalt he be praised for doing well unto thyself.
The worldling magnified himself; but thou that dost not, like him, speak well of thyself, but dost well for thyself, in securing thy eternal welfare, thou shalt be praised, if not of men, yet of God, which will be thing everlastingly glorious.
2. He suggests that which is sufficient to take off the strength of the temptation, by directing us to look forward to the end of prosperous sinners; (Lxxiii. 17.) "Think what they will be, in the other world, and you will see no cause to envy them what they are, and have, in this world." (1.) In the other world, they will be far better for the all the wealth and prosperity; they will have nothing in common with which, will not last so long as they must; (v. 17.) When he dies, it is taken for granted that he goes into another world himself, but he shall carry nothing away with him of all that which he has been so long heaping up.
The greatest and wealthiest cannot therefore be the happiest, because they are never the better for their living in this world; as they came naked into it, they shall go naked out of it. But those have something to show in the other world, for their living in this world, who can say, through grace, that though they came corrupt, and sinful, and spiritually naked, into it, they go renewed, and sanctified; and well-clothed with the righteousness of Christ, out of it. They that are rich in the graces and comforts of the Spirit, have something which, when they die, they shall carry away with them, something which death cannot strip them of, nay, which death will be an improvement on; but as the worldly possessions, as we brought nothing into the world, (what we have we had from others,) so it is certain that we shall carry nothing out, but leave it to others, 1 Tim. vi. 7. They shall descend, but their glory, that which they called and counted their glory, and gloried in, shall not descend after them, to lessen the disgrace of death and the grave, to bring them off in the judgment, or abate the terminations of it. The glory that will descend with us, is not earthly glory will descend after us.
(2.) In the other world, they will be infinitely the worse for all their abuses of the wealth and prosperity they enjoyed in this world, (v. 19.) The soul shall go to the generation of his fathers, his worldly

It is probable that Asaph was not only the chief musician, who was put to a tune to this psalm, but that he was himself the penman of it; for we read that in Hezekiah's time they praised God in the words of David, and of Asaph the seer, 2 Chron. xxxii. 30.

Here is,

I. The court called, in the name of the King of kings; (v. 1.) The mighty God, even the Lord, hath spoken by His anointed, His servant David, in the words of judgment, power, justice, and mercy, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. God is the Judge, the Son of God came for judgment into the world, and the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of judgment. All the earth is called to attend, not only because the controversy God had with his people Israel, for their hypocrisy and ingratitude, might safely be referred to any man of reason; nay, let the house of Israel itself judge between God and his vineyard; (Isa. v. 1.) But because, when the kingdom of the Messiah should be set up, all should be instructed in the evangelical worship, and invited to join in it, (see Mal. i. 11. Acts x. 33.) and because, in the day of final judgment, all nations shall be gathered together, to receive their doom, and every man shall give an account of himself to God.

II. The judgment set, and the Judge taking his seat. As, when God gave the law to Israel in the wilderness, it is said, He came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir, and shined forth from mount Paran, and came with ten thousands of his saints, and then from his right hand went a fiery law; (Deut. xxxiii. 2.) so, with allusion to that, when God comes to prove them for their hypocrisy, and to send forth his gospel to supersede the legal institutions, it is said, Who shall come from Seir, and Gilead shall be sought out, and then from the top of Sinai, v. 2. Because in Zion his oracle was now fixed, thence his judgments upon that provoking people were denounced, and thence the oracles issued for the execution of them; (Jer. vii. 1.) Blow us the trumpet in Zion. Sometimes there are more than ordinary appearances of God's presence and power working with and by his word and ordinances, for the convincing of men's consciences, and the forming and refining of his church; and then God, v. 3, whose dwellings are in Zion, may be said to shine out of Zion. Moreover, he may be said to shine out of Zion, because the gospel, which is spiritual worship, was to go forth from mount Zion, (Isa. ii. 3. Mic. iv. 2.) and the preachers of it were to begin at Jerusalem, (Luke xxiv. 47.) and Christians are said to come unto mount Zion, to receive their instructions, H. b. xii. 22, 28. Zion is here called the perfection of beauty, because it was the holy hill; and holiness is indeed the perfection of beauty. 2. Tha he shall come, and not keep silence, shall no longer seem to wink at the sins of men, as he had done, (v. 21.) but shall show his displeasure at them, and shall also cause that mystery to be published to the world by his holy apostles, which had long lain hid, that the Gentiles should be fellowheirs, (Eph. iii. 5, 6.) and that the partition-wall of the ceremonial law should be taken down; this shall now no longer be done; the law shall go forth from mount Zion, God shall come, and shall not keep silence, but shall make those to hear his judgment that would not hearken to his law. 3. That his appearance should be very majestic and terrible: a fire shall devour before him. The fire of his judgments shall make way for the rebukes of his word, in order to the awakening of the hypocritical nation of the Jews, that the sinners in Zion, being afraid of that devouring fire, (Isa. xxx. 3.) be mightily startled out of their sins. When his gospel-kingdom was to be set up, Christ came to send fire on the earth, Luke xiii. 49. The Spirit was given in cloven tongues as fire, introduced by a rushing mighty wind, which was very tempestuous, Acts ii. 3. And in the last judgment, Christ shall come in flaming fire, 2 Thess. i. 8. See Dan. vii. 9. Heb. x. 27. 4. That as on mount Sinai he came with ten thousands of his saints, so he shall now call to the heavens from above, to take notice of this solemn process, (v. 4.) as Moses often called heaven and earth to witness against Israel, (Deut. iv. 26. — xxxvii. 28. — xxxviii. 1.) and God himself, Isa. liii. And the judgment of the great day will be attested and applauded by heaven and earth, by saints and angels, even all the holy myriads.

III. The parties summoned; (v. 5.) Gather my saints unto me This may be understood, either, 1. Of saints indeed; "Let them be gathered to God through Christ; let the few pious Israelites be set by themselves," for to them the following denunciations of hypocrit, and wicked do not belong; rebukes to hypocrites ought not to be terrors to the upright. When God will reject the services of those that only offered sacrifice, resting in the outside of the performance, he will graciously accept those who, in sacrificing, make a covenant with him, and so attend to, and answer, the end of the institution of sacrifices. The design of the preaching of the gospel, and his setting up of Christ's kingdom, was, to gather together in one body, the children of God, John xi. 22. And, at the second coming of Jesus Christ, all the saints shall be gathered together unto him, (2 Thess. ii. 1.) in his assessors with him in the judgment, for the saints shall judge the world, 1 Cor. vi. 2. Now it is here given as a character of the saints, that they have made a covenant with God by sacrifice. Note, (1.) Those only shall be gathered to God as his saints, who have, in sincerity, covenanted with him, who have taken him to be their God, and given up themselves to be to him his people, and thus have joined themselves unto the Lord. (2.) It is only by sacrifice, by Christ the great Sacrifice, (from whom all the legal sacrifices derived what value they had,) that we poor sinners can covenant with God, so as to be accepted of him. There must be an atonement made for the breach of the first covenant, before we can be admitted again into covenant. Or, 2. It may be understood of saints in profession, such as the people of God, who are called a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation, 1 Pet. ii. 9. They were, as a body politic, taken into covenant with God, the covenant of peculiarity, and it was done with great solemnity by sacrifice, Exod. xxiv. 4. "Let them come and hear what God has to say to them; let them receive the reproofs God sends them now by his prophets, and the gospel he will, in due time, send them by his Son; which shall supersede the ceremonial. If these be slighted, let them expect to hear from God and his Son, and to be judged by that word which they will not be ruled by."

IV. The issue of this solemn trial foretold; (v. 6.) The heavens shall declare his righteousness; those heavens that were called to be witnesses to the trial; (v. 4.) the people in heaven shall say, Hallelujah. True and righteous are his judgments, Rev. xiv. 1. 2. The righteousness of God, in all the rebukes of his judgments. In the breach, in the establishment of his gospel, (which brings righteousness, and in which the righteousness of God is revealed,) and especially in the judgment of the great day, is what the heavens will declare. 1. It will be universally known, and proclaimed to all the world. As the heavens declare the glory, the wisdom, and power, of God the Creator, (xix. 1.) so they shall no longer openly declare the glory, the justice, and righteousness, of God the Judge; and so God doth hereby proclaim both, that there is no speech nor tongue where their voice is not heard, as it follows...
2. It will be incontestably owned and proved; who can deny what the heavens declare? Even sinners’ own consciences will subscribe to it, and hell as well as heaven will be forced to acknowledge the righteousness of God. The reason given, is, for God is Judge himself, and therefore, (1.) He will be just; for it is impossible he should do any wrong to any of his creatures, he never did, nor ever will. When men are employed to judge for him, they may do unjustly: but when he is Judge himself, there can be no injustice done. (2.) Is God righteous, who takes vengeance? The apostle, for this reason, startles at the thought of it; God forbid! for then how should God judge the world? Rom. iii. 5. 6.

7. Hear, O my people, and I will speak; O Israel, and I will testify against thee: I am God, even thy God. 8. I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices, or thy burnt-offerings, to have been continually before me. 9. I will take no bullock out of thy house, nor he-goats out of thy folds: 10. For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. 11. I know all the fowls of the mountains; and the wild beasts of the field are mine. 12. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof. 13. Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? 14. Offer unto God thanksgiving; and pay thy vows unto the Most High: 15. And call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.

III. He respects to the best sacrifices of prayer and praise, to those which, under the law, were preferred before all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, and on which then the greatest stress was laid, and which now, under the gospel, come in the room of those carnal ordinances which were imposed until the times of reformation. He shows us here, (v. 14, 15.) what is good, and what the Lord our God requires of us, and will accept, when sacrifices are slighted and superseded. 1. We must make a pertinent acknowledgment of our sins; offer to God confession; so some read it, and understand it of the confession of sin, in order to our giving glory to God, and taking shame to ourselves, that we may never return to it. A broken and contrite heart is such a heart which God will not despise, li. 17. If the sin was not abandoned, the sin-offering was not accepted.

2. We must give God thanks for his mercies to us; Ofer to God thanksgiving, every day, often every day, (Seven times a day will I praise thee,) and upon special occasions; and this shall please the Lord, if it come from a humble thankful heart, full of love to him, and joy in him, better than an ox or bee. which that has horns and hoofs, lxx. 30, 31.

3. We must make conscience of performing our covenants with him; Pay thy vows to the Most High, forsake thy sins, and do thy duty better, pursuant to the solemn promises thou hast made to him to that purport. When we give God thanks for any mercy we have received, we must be sure to pay the vows we made to him when we were in pursuit of the mercy, else our thanksgivings will not be accepted. Dr. Hammond applies this to the great goodness of God to the church, in which we are to give thanks to God for his great love in sending his Son to save us, and to pay our vows of love and duty to him, and to give alms. Instead of all the Old Testament types of a Christ to come, we have that blessed memorial of a Christ already come. 4. In the day of distress, we must apply ourselves to God by faithful and fervent prayer; (v. 15.) Call upon me in the day of trouble, and not upon any other; Our troubles, though we see them coming from God's hand, must drive us to him, and not drive us from him. We must thus acknowledge him in all our ways, depend upon his wisdom, power, and goodness, and refer ourselves entirely to him, and so give him glory. This is a cheaper, easier, readier, way of seeking his favour, than by a peace-offering; and yet more acceptable. 5. When he, in answer to our prayers, delivers us, as he has promised to do in such a way and time as he shall think fit, we must glorify him, not only by a grateful mention of his favour, but by living to his praise. Thus must we keep up our communion with God; meeting with him our prayers when he afflicts us, and with our praises when he delivers us.

16. But unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldest take my covenant in thy mouth? 17. Seeing thou hastest instruction, and castest my words behind thee. 18. When thou savest a thief, then thou consentedst with him, and hast been partaker with adulterers. 19. Thou giveth thy mouth to evil, and thy tongueframeth deceit. 20. Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother; thou slanderer thine own mother's son. 21. These things hast thou done, and I kept silence; thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself; but I will reproue thee, and set them in order before thine eyes. 22. Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver. 23. Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me: and to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I show the salvation of God.

God, by the psalmist, having instructed his people in the right way of worshipping him, and keeping up their communion with him, here directs his speech to the wicked, to hypocrites, whether they were such as professed the Jewish or the Christian religion: hypocrisy is wickedness, for which God will judge. Observe

1. The charge drawn up against them.

1. They are charged with invading and usurping the honours and privileges of religion; (v. 16.) What hast thou to do, O wicked man, to declare my statutes? This is a challenge to those that are really profane, but seemingly godly, to show what title they have to the cloak of religion, and by what authority they wear it, when they use it only to cover and conceal the abominable impulses of their hearts and lives. Let them make out their claim to it if they can. Some think it points prophetically at the Scribes and Pharisees, that were the teachers and leaders of the Jewish church, at the time when the kingdom of the Messiah, and that evangelical way of worship spoken of in the foregoing verses, were to be set up. They violently opposed that great re- volution, and used all the power and interest which they had by sitting in Moses's seat to hinder it; but the account which our blessed Saviour gives of them, (Matth. xxiii.) and St. Paul, (Rom. ii. 21, 22,) makes this expostulation here agree very well to them. They took on them to declare God's statutes, but they hated Christ's instruction; and therefore what had they to do, to expound the law, who rejected the gospel? But it is applicable to all those that are practisers of iniquity, and yet professors of piety, especially if withal they be peculiarly guilty of it. Note, It is very absurd in itself, and a great affront to the God of heaven, for those that are wicked and ungodly, to declare his statutes, and to take his covenant in their mouths. It is very possible, and too common, for those that declare God's statutes to others, to live in disobedience to them themselves; and for those that take God's covenant in their mouths, in their hearts to continue their covenant with sin and unbelief; but they are guilty of an usurpation, they take to themselves an honour which they have no title to, and there is a day coming, when they will be thrust out as intruders, Friend, how camest thou in hither? 2. They are charged with transgressing and violating the laws and precepts of religion.

(1.) They are charged with a daring contempt of the word of God; (v. 17.) Thou hastest instruction. They loved to give instruction, and to tell others what they understood, for they fed their pride, and made them look great, and by way of cutting up those who did not live in the same clothing; but they hated to receive instruction from God himself, for that would be a check upon them, and a mortification to them; "Thou hastest discipline, the reproofs of the word, and the rebukes of Providence." No wonder that these who hate to be reformed hate the means of reformation; Thou castest my words behind thee. They seemed to set at naught the word of God, even when they sat in Moses's seat, and undertook to teach others out of them; (Rom. ii. 19,) but in their conversations they cast God's Word behind them, and did not care for seeing that rule which they were resolved not to be ruled by. This is despising the commandment of the Lord. (2.) A close confederacy with the worst of sinners; (v. 18.) When thou savest a thief, instead of reproving him and witnessing against him, as thou shouldst have done, when thou knowest his statutes, thou consentedst with him, didst approve of his practices, and desire to be a partner with him, and to share in the profits of his cursed trade; and thou hast been partaker with adulterers, hast done as they did, and encouraged them to go on in their wicked courses; hast done these things, and hast had pleasure in them that do them;" Rom. i. 32. (3.) A constant persisting in the worst of tongue-sins; (v. 19.) Thou givest thy mouth to evil; not only allowest thyself in, but diddest thyself wholly to, all manner of evil speakings.
[1.] Lying; Thy tongue frames deceits, which denotes contrivance and deliberation in lying. It knits or links deceit; so some.
One lie begets another, and one fraud requires another to cover it.
[2.] Slaughtering; (v. 20.) "Thou sithest, and speakest against thy brother, dost basely abuse and misrepresent him, magisterially judge and censure him, and pass sentence upon him, as though his heart, and all that must stand or fall, whereas he is thy brother, as good as thou art, and upon the level with thee, for he is thine own mother's son.
He is thy near relation, whom thou oughtest to love, to vindicate, and stand up for, if others abused him; yet thou dost thyself abuse him, whose faults thou oughtest to cover and make the best of; if really he had done amiss, yet thou dost more falsely and unjustly charge him with that which is indeed, and that in which he knows, thou hast done.
The acts of sinners will be proved upon them, beyond contradiction, in the judgment of the great day; "I will reprove thee, or convince thee, so that thou shalt have not one word to say for thyself." The day is coming when impenitent sinners will have their mouths for ever stopped, and be struck speechless. What confusion will they be filled with, when God shall set their sins in order before their eyes? They would not see their sins to their face, but hide them by deceit, and cover them, and endeavoured to forget them, nor would they suffer their own consciences to put them in mind of them; but the day is coming when God will make them see their sins to their everlasting shame and terror; he will set them in order, original sin, actual sins, sins against the law, sins against the gospel, against the first table, against the second table, sins of childhood and youth, of riper age, and old age. He will set them in order, and call them out in order, against the criminal, and asked what they have to say against him.

III. The Judge's patience, and the sinner's abuse of that patience; "I kept silence, did not give thee any disturbance in thy sinful way, but let thee alone to take thy course; sentence against thine evil works was respited, and not executed speedily." Note, The patience of God is very great toward provoking sinners. He sees their sins, and hates them; it would be neither difficulty nor damage to him, to punish them, and yet he waits to be gracious, and gives them space to repent, that he may render them inexcusable if they repent not. His patience is the more wonderful, because the sinner makes such an ill use of it; "Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself, as weak and forgetful as thyself, as false to my word as thyself, nay, as much a friend to sin as thyself." Sinners take God's silence for content, and, by that delay, as they have, and therefore think they are reproved, the more are their hearts hardened; but, if they turn not, they shall be made to see their error when it is too late, and that the God that provokes is just, and holy,
and terrible, and not such a one as themselves.

IV. The fair warning given of the dreadful doom of hypocrites; (v. 22.) "Now consider this, ye that forget God; consider that God knows, and keeps accounts of, all your sins; that he will call you to an account for them; that patience, abused, will turn into the greater wrath; that though you forget God, your duty to him, he will not forget you, and your rebellions against him: consider this in time, before it be too late; for if these things be not considered, and the consideration of them improved, he will tear you in pieces, and there will be none to deliver." It is the doom of hypocrites to be cut in sunder, Matt. xxv. 31. Note, 1. Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked. They do not fear God. 2. They do not yet do obey him, do certainly forget him. 3. The God forget themselves; and it will never be right with them, till they consider, and so recover themselves. Consideration is the first step toward conversion. 4. Those that will not consider the warnings of God's word will certainly be torn in pieces by the executions of his wrath. 4. When God comes to tear sinners in pieces, there is no delivering them cut of his hand. They cannot deliver themselves, nor can any friend they have in the world deliver them.
V. Full instructions given to us all, how to prevent this fearful doom. Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter; we have it, v. 23, which directs us what to do, that we may attain our chief end.

1. Man's chief end is to glorify God, and we are here told, that whom offers praise glorifies him, whether he be Jew or Gentile, those spiritual sacrifices shall be accepted from him. We must praise God for his glory, and for his name sake, as he himself was pleased, as every sacrifice was directed; put it into the hands of the Priest, our Lord Jesus, who is also the Altar; see that it be made by fire, sacred fire, that it be kindled with the flame of holy and devout affection;
we must be fervent in spirit, praising the Lord.
This he is pleased, in infinite condescension, to interpret as glorifying him. Hereby we give him the glory due to his name, and do what we can to advance the interests of his kingdom among men.
2. Man's chief end, in connection with that, to enjoy God; and we are here told that those who order their conversation aright shall see his salvation. (1.) It is not enough for us to offer praise, but we must withal order our conversation aright.
Thanksgiving is good, but thanks-living is better.
(2.) Those that would have their conversation right must take care and pains to order it; to dispose it according to rule; to understand their way, and to direct it, that the conversation may make sure their salvation: them God will make to see his salvation; for it is a salvation ready to be revealed; he will make them to see it and enjoy it, to see it, and to see themselves happy for ever in it. Note, The right ordering of the conversation is the only way, and it is a sure way, to obtain the great salvation.

PSALM LI.

Though David penned this psalm upon a very particular occasion, yet it is of as general use as any of David's psalms; it is the most eminent of the penitential psalms, and most expressive of the several passages of penitential singing. And truly indeed, that in our devout addresses to God, we should have anything else to do than to praise God, for that is the work of heaven; but we make other work for ourselves, by our own sins and follies; we must come to the throne of grace in the posture of penitent men, to confess our sins, and sue for the grace of God; and if therein we would take with us words, we can no where find any more apposite than in this psalm, which is the record of David's penitent frame; it is as expressive of David's penitence as the story of the repentance of Uriah, which was the greatest blishment upon his character; all the rest of his faults were nothing to this; it is said of him, (1 Kings xv. 5.) That he turned not aside from the commandment of the Lord's servant, saith the samesmith in the matter of Uriah the Hittite. In this psalm, 1. He confesses his sin, v. 3. 8. 5. He prays earnestly for the pardon of his sin, v. 1, 2, 7, 9. 3. For peace of	conscience, v. 8, 10. 4. For grace to go and sin no more, v. 10, 11, 14. V. For liberty of access to God, v.
15. He promises to do what he could for the good of the souls of others, (v. 13.) and for the glory of God, v. 16, 17, 19. And lastly, concludes with a prayer for Zion and Jerusalem, v. 18. Those whose consciences charge them with any gross sin should, with a believing regard to Jesus Christ, the Mediator, again and again pray over this psalm; nay, though we have not been guilty of adultery and murder, or any like enormous crime, yet, in singing it, and praying over it, we may very sensibly apply it to all our souls, and thus do with suitable affections, we shall, through Christ, find mercy to pardon, and grace for seasonable help.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in to Bathsheba.

1. HAVE mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving-kindness; according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions. 2. Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. 3. For I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin is ever before me. 4. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight; that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest. 5. Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me. 6. Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts; and in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom.

The title has reference to a very sad story, that of David's fall. But, though he fell, he was not utterly cast down, for God graciously upheld him, and raised him up. 1. The sin which, in this psalm, he laments, was, the folly and wickedness he committed with his neighbour's wife; a sin not to be spoken of, or thought of, without detestation. His debauching of Bathsheba was the inlet to the all the other sins that followed; it was as the letting forth of water. This sin of David's is recorded for warning to all. He who would not take heed lest he fall. 2. The repentance which, in this psalm, he expresses, he was brought to by the ministry of Nathan, who was sent of God to convince him of his sin, after he had continued above nine months (for ought that appears) without any particular expressions of remorse and sorrow for it. But though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, and to lie a great while in it, yet he will, by some means or other, recover them to repentance, bring them to himself, and to their right mind, again. Herein, generally, he uses the ministry of the word, which yet he is not tied to. But those that have been overtaken in any fault, ought to reckon a faithful reproof the greatest kindness that can be done them, and a wise reprover their best friend. Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be excellent oil. 3. David, being convinced of his sin, poured out his soul to God in prayer for mercy and grace. Whither should backsliding children return, but to the Lord their God, from whom they have backslidden, and who alone can heal their backslidings? 4. He drew up, by divine inspiration, the workings of his heart toward God, upon this occasion, into a psalm, that it might be often repeated, and long after reviewed; and this he committed to the chief musician, to be sung in the public service of the church, when he would be of use to the public, is the repentance, which he would have to be generally taken notice of; his sin having been notorious, that the psalter might be as wide as the wound. Those that truly repent of their sins shall not be ashamed to own their repentance; but, having lost the honour of innocents, will rather covet the honour of penitents. 2. As a pattern to others, both to bring them to repentance by his example, and to instruct them, in their repentance, what to do, and what to say. Being converted himself, he thus strengthens his brethren; (Luke xxii. 32.) and, for this cause he obtained mercy, 1 Tim. i. 10.

In these verses, he pleads his case and reasons his case. 1. David's humble petition, v. 1, 2. His prayer is much the same with that which our Saviour puts into the mouth of his penitent publican in the parable; God be merciful to me a sinner! Luke xviii. 13. David was, upon many accounts, a man of great merit; he had not only done much, but suffered much, in the cause of God; and yet, when he is convinced of sin, he does not only balance his other deeds with his good deeds, nor can he think that his services will alone be for his offences; but he goes to God's infinite mercy, and depends upon that only for pardon and peace; Have mercy upon me, O God. He owns himself obnoxious to God's justice, and therefore casts himself upon his mercy, and it is certain that the best man in the world is undone, if God be not merciful to him. Observe, 1. What his plea is for this mercy; "Have mercy upon me, O God, not according to the dignity of my birth, as descended from the royal race of Judah, of the tribe of Judah, not according to my public services as Israel's champion, or my public honours as Israel's king;" his plea is not, Lord, remember David and all his afflictions, how he vowed to build a place for the ark; (cxxxii. 1, 2.) a true penitent will make no mention of any such thing; but, "Have mercy upon me for thy mercy's sake." I have nothing to plead with thee, but, (1.) The freeness of thy mercy, according to thy loving-kindness, thy clemency, the goodness of thy nature, which inclines thee to pity the miserable. (2.) The fulness of thy mercy. There is in thee not only loving-kindness and tender mercies, but abundance of it, a multitude of tender mercies for the forgiveness of many sinners, of many sins, to multiply pardons as we multiply transgressions. 2. What is the particular mercy that he begs; the pardon of sin. Bint out my transgressions, as a debt is blotted or crossed out of the book, when either the debtor has paid it, or the creditor has remitted it; "Wipe out my transgressions, that they may not appear to demand judgment against me, nor stare me in the face, to my confusion and terror." The blood of Christ, sprinkled upon the conscience, to purify and pacify that, blots out the transgression, and, having reconciled us to God, will reconcile us to ourselves, v. 2. "Wash me through and through from mine iniquity; wash my soul from the guilt and stain of my sin by thy mercy and grace; for it is only from a ceremonial pollution that the water of separation will avail to cleanse me. Multiply to wash me; the stain is deep, for I have lain long soaking in the guilt, so that it will not easily be got out. Oh wash me much, wash me throughly; cleanse me from my sin." Sin defiles us, renders us abominable in the sight of the holy God, and uneasy to ourselves; it unites us for communions with God, in grace or glory. When God pardons sin, he cleanses us from it, so that we become acceptable to him, easy to ourselves, and have liberty of access to him. Nathan had assured David, upon his first profession of repentance, that his sin was pardoned, The Lord has taken away thy sin, thou shalt not die; (2 Sam. xii. 13.) yet he prays, Wash me, clean me from my sin, and blot out my iniquity for God will be sought unto, even for that which he abhorreth; and those whose sins are pardoned must pray that the pardon may be more and more cleared up to them. God had forgiven him, but he could not forgive himself; and therefore he is thus importu-nate for pardon, as one that thought himself unworth-

4. It is ever against me; (so some) “I see it before me as an enemy, accusing and threatening me.” David was, upon all occasions, put in mind of his sin, and was willing to be so, for his further abasement. He never walked on the roof of his house without a penitent reflection on his unhappy walk there, when from thence he saw Bathsheba; never lay down to sleep, without a sorrowful thought of the bed of his uncleanness; never sat down to meat, never sent his servant on an errand, or took his pen in hand, but it put him in mind of his mak-

5. He was, and yet, having sinned, he willingly accommodates himself to the place and posture of a penitent. The best men, if they sin, should give the best example of repentance.

6. It is good to be particular in the confession of sin, that we may be the more express in praying for pardon, and so may have the more comfort in it. We ought to reflect upon the particular heads of our sins of iniquity, and the particular circumstances of our gross sins.

7. He aggravates the sin which he confesses, and lays a lord upon himself for it; Against thee, and in thy sight. Hence our Saviour seems to bow down the confession which he puts into the mouth of the returning prodigal; I have sinned against Heaven, and before thee, Luke xv. 18.

8. This is what we call original sin, because it is as ancient as our original, and because it is the original of all our actual transgressions. This is that foolishness which is bound in the heart of a child, the proneness to evil, and backwardness to good, which is the burden of the regenerate, and the ruin of the unregenerate; it is a bent to backslide from God.
III. David's acknowledgment of the grace of God: (v. 6.) both his good-will toward us, (Thou desirest truth in the inward parts,) "Thou wouldest have us all honest and sincere, and true to our profession;" and his good work in us, "In the hidden part thou hast made," or shalt make, "me to know wisdom." Note, 1. Truth and wisdom will greatly tend toward making me a good man. A clear head and a sound heart (prudence and sincerity) bespeak the man of God perfect. 2. What God requires of us, he himself works in us, and he works it in the regular way, enlightening the mind, and so gaining the will. But how does this come in here? (1.) God is hereby justly and cleared; "Lord, thou wast not the Author of my sin; there is no blame to be laid upon thee; but I alone made it, for this, hast, many a time admonished me to be sincere, and hast made me to know that, which, if I had duly considered it, would have prevented my falling into this sin; had I improved the grace thou hast given me, I had kept mine integrity." (2.) The sin is hereby aggravated; "Lord, thou dostest truth; but where was it when I dissembled with Uriah? Thou hast made me to know wisdom; but I have not lived up to what I have known." (3.) He is hereby encouraged, in his repentance, to repent more. If God would graciously accept of him; for, [1.] God had made him sincere in his resolutions never to return to folly again; Thou desirest truth in the inward part; this is that which God has an eye to, in a returning sinner, that in his spirit there be no guile, xxxii. 2. David was conscious to himself of the uprightness of his heart toward God, in his repentance, and therefore doubted not but God would accept him. [2.] He hoped that God would enable him to make good his resolutions, that, in the hidden part, in the new man, which is called the hidden man of the heart, (1 Pet. iii. 4.) he would make him to know wisdom, so as to discern and avoid the designs of the tempter, another time. Some read it as a prayer; "Lord, in this instance, I have done foolishly; for the future, make me to know wisdom. Where there is truth, God will give wisdom; those that sincerely endeavour to do their duty, shall be taught their duty."

7. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow. 3. Make me to hear joy and gladness; that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. 9. Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities. 10. Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me. 11. Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy Holy Spirit from me. 12. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free Spirit. 13. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee.

See here, 1. What David prays for; many excellent petitions he here puts up; to which, if we do but add, for Christ's sake, they are as evangelical as any other. 2. He prays that God would cleanse him from his sins, and the defilement he had contracted by them; (v. 7.) "Purge me with hyssop; pardon my sins, and let me know that they are pardoned, that I may be restored to those privileges which by sin I have forfeited and lost." The expression here alludes to a ceremonial distinction, that of cleansing the leper, or those that were unclean by the touch of a body, by sprinkling water, or blood, or both, upon them, with a bunch of hyssop, by which they were, at length, discharged from the restraints they were laid under by their pollution. "Lord, let me be as well assured of my restoration to thy favour; and to the privilege of communion with thee, as the Jews thereby assured of their re-admission to their former privileges. Cleansed by gospel-grace; Purge me with hyssop, with the blood of Christ applied to my soul by a lively faith, as water of purification was sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop. It is the blood of Christ, which is therefore called the blood of sprinkling, (Heb. xii. 24.) that purges the conscience from dead works, from that guilt of sin, and dread of God, which shut us out of communion with him, as the touch of a dead body, under the law, shut a man out from the courts of God's house. If this blood of Christ, which cleanses from all sin, cleanse us from our sin, then we shall be clean indeed, Heb. x. 2. If we be washed in this fountain opened, we shall be whiter than snow; not only acquitted, but accepted; so those are, that are justified; (Isa. i. 18.) Though your sins have been as scarlet, they shall be white as snow.

2. He prays that, his sins being pardoned, he might have the comfort of that pardon. He asks not to be comforted, till first he is cleansed; but if sin, the bitter root of sorrow, be taken away, he can pray in faith, "Make me to hear joy and gladness;" (v. 8.) let me have a well-grounded peace, of thy creating, thy speaking, so that the bones which thou hast broken by convictions and threatenings, may rejoice, may not only be set again, and cleansed from the pain, but may be sensibly comforted, and, as the prophet speaks, may flourish, as a plant, or as an herb." Note, (1.) The pain of an heart truly broken for sin, may well be compared to that of a broken bone; and it is the same Spirit who, as a Spirit of bondage, smites and wounds, and, as a Spirit of adoption, heals and binds up. (2.) The comfort and joy that arise from a sealed pardon to a penitent sinner, are as refreshing as perfect ease from the most exquisite pain. (3.) It is God's work, not only to cleanse, but to speak this joy to our hearts, and to make us hear it, and take the comfort of it. He earnestly desires that God would lift up the light of his countenance upon him, and so put gladness into his heart; that he would not only be reconciled to him, but, which is a further act of grace, let him know that he was so.

3. He prays for a complete and effectual pardon. This is that which he is most earnest for, as the foundation of his comfort; (v. 9.) "Hide thy face from my sins; be not provoked by them to deal with me as I deserve; they are more before me, let them be cast behind thy back; blot out all mine iniquities out of the book of thine account; blot them out, as a cloud is blotted out and dispelled by the beams of the sun," Isa. xlv. 22.

4. He prays for sanctifying grace; and this every true penitent is as earnest for, as for pardon and peace, v. 10. He does not pray, "Lord, preserve me my reputation," as Soul, I have sinned, yet honour me before this people. No, his great concern is, to get his corrupt nature changed; the sin he had been guilty of, was, (1.) An evidence of its impurity, and therefore he prays, Create in me a clean heart, O God. He now saw, more than ever, what an unclean heart he had, and sadly laments it, but sees it is not in his own power to change it, and it is these very beggs of God, (whose prevenient grace it is to create,) that he prays, that he may have a clean heart. He only that made the heart, can new make it; and to his power nothing is impossible. He created the world by the word of his power, as the God of nature, and it is by the word of his power as the God of grace that we are clean, (John xv. 3.) that we are sanctified, John xvii. 17. (2.) It was the cause of its disorder, and undid much of the good work that had been wrought in him; and therefore, if you, my Lord, shew a right spirit within me; repair the defile of spirit's strength, which this sin has been the cause of, and set me to rights again. Renew a constant spirit within me; so some. He had, in this matter, discovered much inconsistency and inconsistency with himself, and therefore prays, “Lord, fix me for the time to come, that I may never in like manner depart from thee.”

And prays for the continuance of God’s goodwill toward him, and the progress of his good work in him, v. 11. (1.) That he might never be shut out from God’s favour; “Cast me not away from thy presence, as one whom thou abhorrest, and cast not endure to look upon.” He prays, that he might not be thrown out of God’s protection, but that, wherever he went, he might have the divine presence with him, might be under the guidance of his wisdom, and in the custody of his power, and that he might not be forbidden communion with God; “Let me not be banished thy courts, but always have liberty of access to thee by prayer.” He does not deprecate the temporal judgments which God by Nathan had threatened to bring upon him; “God’s will be done;” but, “Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath. If the sword come into my house never to depart from it, yet let me have a God to go to in my distresses, and all shall be well.” (2.) That he might never be deprived of God’s grace; “Take not thy holy Spirit from me.” He knew he had by his sin grieved the Spirit, and provoked him to withdraw; and that, because he also was flesh, God might justly have said that his Spirit should no more move with him, or work upon him, Gen. vi. 3. This he dreads, more than any thing; we are undone, if God take his holy Spirit from us. Saul was a sad instance of this. How exceeding sinful, how exceeding miserable, was he, when the Spirit of the Lord was departed from him! David knew it, and therefore begs thus earnestly; “Lord, whatsoever thou take from me, my children, my crown, my life, yet take not thy holy Spirit from me,” (see 2 Sam. vii. 15.) “but continue thy holy Spirit with me, to perfect the work of my repentance, to prevent my relapse into sin, and to enable me to discharge my duty both as a prince, and as a psalmist.”

6. He prays for the restoration of divine comforts, and the perpetual communications of divine grace, v. 12. David finds two ill effects of his sin; (1.) It had made him sad, and therefore he prays, Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation. A child of God knows no true nor solid joy, but the joy of God’s salvation, joy in God his Saviour, and in the hope of eternal life. By wilful sin we forfeit this joy, and deprive ourselves of it; our evidences cannot last when our得罪s against God. And so again, when we give ourselves so much cause to doubt of our interest in the salvation, how can we expect the joy of it? But when we truly repent, we may pray and hope that God will restore to us those joys. They that sow in penitential tears, shall reap in the joys of God’s salvation, when the times of refreshing shall come. (2.) It had made him weak, and therefore he prays, Uphold me with thy free Spirit; I am ready to fall. Uphold me, my Lord, sustain me; my own spirit” (though the spirit of a man will go far toward the sustaining his infirmity) “is not sufficient, if I be left to myself, I shall certainly sink; therefore uphold me with thy Spirit, let him counter-work the evil spirit that would cast me down from mine excellency. Thy Spirit is a free spirit, a free agent himself, working freely,” (and that makes those free, whom he works upon, for where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty;) “thy ingenious princely Spirit.” He was conscious to himself of having acted, in the matter of Uriah, very disingenuously, and unlike a prince; this behaviour was base and paltry: “Lord, says he, “let thy Spirit inspire my soul, not with base and generous principles, that I may always act as becomes me.” A free spirit will be a firm and fixed spirit, and will uphold us. The more cheerful we are in our duty, the more constant we shall be to it.

II. See what David here promises, v. 13. Observe, 1. What good work he promises God; “I will teach transgressors thy ways.” David had been himself a transgressor, and therefore could speak experimentally to transgressors, and resolves, finding himself found mercy with God in the way of repentance, to teach others God’s ways; (1.) Our way to God by repentance; he would teach others that had sinned, to take the same course that he had taken, to humble themselves, to confess their sins, and seek God’s face; and, (2.) God’s way to wards us in pardoning mercy; how ready he is to receive those that return to him. He taught the former by his own example, for the direction of sinners in repenting; he taught the latter by his own experience, for their encouragement. By this psalm he is, and will be to the world’s end, teaching transgressors, telling them what God had done for his soul. Note, Penitents should be preachers; Solomon was so, and blessed Paul. 2. What good effect he promises himself from this doing this; “Sinners shall be converted unto thee, and shall neither persist in their wanderings from thee, nor despair of finding mercy in their returns to thee.” The great thing to be aimed at in teaching transgressors, is, their conversion to God; that is a happy point gained, and happy they that are instrumental to contribute towards it, Jam. v. 20.

14. Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation; and my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness. 15. O Lord, open thou my lips; and my mouth shall show forth thy praise. 16. For thou desirlest not sacrifice, else would I give it: thou delightest not in burnt-offering. 17. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. 18. Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion: build thou the walls of Jerusalem. 19. Then shall thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, with burnt-offering, and whole burnt-offering: then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar.

1. David prays against the guilt of sin, and prays for the grace of God, enforcing both petitions from a plea taken from the glory of God, which he promises with thankfulness to show forth. 2. He prays against the guilt of sin, that he might be delivered from that, and promises that then he would praise God, v. 14. The particular sin he prays against, is, blood-guiltiness, which was no less guilty of, having slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Hitherto, perhaps, he had stopped the mouths of conscience with that frivolous excuse, that he did not kill him himself; but now he was convinced that he was the murderer, and, hearing the blood cry to God for vengeance, he cries to God for mercy, “Deliver from blood-guiltiness, let me not lie under the guilt of the kind I have contracted, but let it be pardoned to me, and let me never be left to myself to contract the like guilt again." Notre, It is certain to us that when man is cleansed of the guilt of blood. In this prayer, he eyes God as the God of salvation. Note, Those to whom God is the God of salvation, he will deliver from guilt; for the salvation he is the God of, is, salvation from sin. We may therefore plead this with him, "Lord, thou art the God of my salvation, therefore deliver me from the dominion of sin." He promises, that, if God would deliver him, his tongue should sing aloud of his righteousness; God should have the glory both of pardoning mercy, and of preventing grace. God's righteousness is often put for his grace, especially in the great business of justification and sanctification. This he would confess himself in, and therefore sing of; and this he would endeavour both to acquaint and to affect others with; he would sing aloud of it. This all these should do that have had the benefit of it, and owe their all to it. (2.) He prays for the grace of God, and promises to improve to that grace to his glory; (v. 15.) "O Lord, open thou my lips, not only that I may teach and instruct sinners," (which the best preacher cannot do to any purpose, unless God give him the opening of the mouth, and the tongue of the learned,) "but that my mouth may show forth thy praise; not only that I may have abundant matter for praise, but a heart enlarged in praise." Guilt had closed his lips, had gone near to stop the mouth of prayer; he could not for shame, he could not for fear, come into the presence of that God whom he knew he had offended, much less speak to him; his heart condemned him, and therefore he had little confidence toward God: it cast a damp particularly upon his prayers; when he had lost the joys of his salvation, his heart was hung upon the willow-trees; therefore he prays, "O Lord, open my lips, put not my heart in time for praise again." Those that are tongue-tied by reason of guilt, the assurance of the forgiveness of their sins says effectually, "Ephphatha—Be opened;} and when the lips are opened, what should they speak but the praises of God, as Zuckarias did? Luke i. 64. II. David offers the sacrifice of a penitent, contrite, heart, as that which he knew God would be pleased to accept. He knew well that the sacrificing of beasts was, in itself, of no account with God; (v. 16.) Thou desirest not sacrifice, (else would I give it with all my heart to obtain pardon and peace,) thou delightest not in burnt-offering. Here see how glad David would have been to give thousands of rams, to make atonement for sin. Those that are thoroughly convinced of their misery and danger, by reason of sin, would spare no cost to obtain the remission of it. Misc. 6, 7. But is it true that so little God valued this? As trials of obedience, and types of Christ; he did, indeed require sacrifices to be offered; but he had no delight in them for any intrinsic worth or value they had; Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not. As they cannot make satisfaction for sin, so God cannot take any satisfaction in them, any otherwise than as the offering of them is expressively of love and delight to him. He knew also how acceptable true repentance is to God; (v. 17.) The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit. See here, (1.) What the good work is, that is wrought in every true penitent; a broken spirit, a broken and a contrite heart. It is a work wrought upon the heart; that is it that God looks at, and requires, in all religious exercises, particularly in the exercises of repentance. It is a sharp wound there, no less than the breaking of the heart; not in despair, (as we say, when a man is undone, His heart is broken,) but a necessary humiliation, and sorrow, for sin. It is a heart breaking with itself, and breaking from its sin; it is a heart pliable to the word of God, and patient under the word of God; it is a heart public and private, broken into obedience; it is a heart that is tender, like Josiah's, and trembles at God's word. Oh that there were such a heart in us! (2.) How graciously God is pleased to accept of this; it is the sacrifices of God; not one, but many, it is instead of all burnt-offering and sacrifice. The breaking of Christ's body for sin, is the only sacrifice of atonement, for no sacrifice but that could take away sin; but the breaking of the hearts of sinners is a sacrifice of acknowledgment, a sacrifice of God, for to him it is offered up; he requires it, he prepares it, (he provides this lamb for a burnt-offering,) and he will accept of it. That which pleased God, was, not the feeding of a beast, and making much of it, but killing it; so it is not the pumperning of our flesh, but the mortifying of it, that God will accept. The sacrifice was bound, was bled, was burnt; so the penitent heart is bound by convictions, bleeds in contrition, and then burns in holy and solemn zeal for and for God. The sacrifice was offered upon the altar that sanctified the gift; so the broken heart is acceptable to God only through Jesus Christ; there is no true repentance without faith in him; and this is the sacrifice which he will not despise. Men despise that which is broken, but God will not. He despised the sacrifice of torn and broken beasts, but he will not despise that of a torn and broken heart. He will not overlook it, he will not reject or it; though it make God no satisfaction for the wrong done him by sin, yet he does not despise it. The proud Pharisee despised the broken-hearted publican; and he thought very meanly of himself, but God did not despise him. More is implied than is expressed; the great God overlooks heaven and earth, to look with favour upon a broken and contrite heart. Isa. lixi. 1, 2.—lvi. 15. III. David intercedes for Zion and Jerusalem, with an eye to the heathen of God. See what concern he had, 1. For the good of the church of God; (v. 18.) Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion, that is, (1.) "To all the particular worshippers in Zion, to all that love and fear thy name; keep them from falling into such wounding, wasting, sins as these of mine; defend and succour all that fear thy name." Those that have been in spiritual troubles themselves, know how to pity and pray for those that are in like manner afflicted. Or, (2.) To the public interests of Israel. David was sensible of the wrong he had done to Judah and Jerusalem by his sin; how it had weakened the hands, and saddened the hearts, of good people, and opened the mouths of their adversaries; he was likewise afraid lest he, being a public person, his sin should bring judgments upon the city and kingdom, and therefore he prays to God to secure and deliver those that were spoiling his land, and that had damaged and endangered. He prays, that God would prevent those national judgments which his sin had deserved, that he would continue those blessings, and carry on that good work, which it had threatened to retard and put a stop to. He prays, not only that God would do good to Zion, as he did to other places, by his providence, but that he would do it in his good pleasure, with the peculiar favour he bore to Zion, and the love he bore to David; that he would put his name there; that the walls of Jerusalem, which perhaps were now in the building, might be built up, and that good work finished. Note, [1.] When we have most business of our own, and greatest importance at the throne of grace, yet then we must not forget to pray for the church of God; nor, our Master has taught us in our daily prayers to...
PSALMS, LII.

David, no doubt, was in very great grief, when he said to Abiathar, (1 Sam. xxii. 22.) I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house, which were put to death by David's malicious information; to give some vent to that grief, and to gain some relief to his mind under it, he penned this psalm, wherein, as a prophet, and therefore with as good an authority as if he had been now a prince upon the throne, I. He arraigns Doeg for what he had done, v. 1. II. He accuses him, con- victs him, and aggravates his crimes, v. 2. 4. III. He passes sentence upon him, v. 5. IV. He foretells the triumphs of the righteous in the execution of the sentence, v. 6, 7. V. He comforts himself in the mercy of God, and the assurance he had that he should yet praise him, v. 8, 9. In singing this psalm, we should conceive a detestation of the sin of lying, foresee the ruin of those that persist in it, and please ourselves with the assurance of the preservation of God's church and people, in spite of all the malicious designs of the children of Satan, that father of lies.

To the chief musician, Maschil. A psalm of Da- vid, when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, and said unto him, David is come to the house of Ahimelech.

1. WHY boastest thou thyself in mis- chief, O mighty man? the goodness of God endureth continually. 2. Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs, like a sharp razor, working deceitfully. 3. Thou lovest evil more than good, and lying rather than to speak righteousness. Selah. 4. Thou lovest all-deceiving words, O thou deceitful tongue. 5. God shall likewise destroy thee for ever: he shall take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwelling-place, and root thee out of the land of the living. Selah.

The title is a brief account of the story which the psalm refers to. David now at length, saw it nece- ssary to quit the court, and shift for his own safety; for fear of Saul, who had once and again attempted to murder him. Being unprovided with arms and victuals, he, by a wife, got Ahimelech the priest to furnish him with both; Doeg an Edomite happened to be there; and he went and informed Saul against Ahimelech, representing him as confederate with a traitor; upon which accusation, Saul grounded a very bloody warrant, to kill all the priests; and Doeg, the preacher, was the executioner, 1 Sam. xxii. 9, &c.

In these verses, David avails the case fairly with this proud and mighty man, v. 1. Doeg, it is probable, was mighty in respect of bodily strength; but, if he was, he gained no reputation by his easy victory over the unarmed priests of the Lord: it is no honour for these that wear a sword, to hector these that wear an ephod. However, he was, by his office, a mighty man, for he was set over the servants of Saul, chamberlain of the household. This was that he could not only do an injury to the person, but he was, in effect, to do mischief, but in the mischief he did. Note, It is bad to do ill, but it is worse to boast of it, and glory in it, when we have done; not only not to be ashamed of a wicked action, but to justify it; not only to justify it, but to magnify it, and value ourselves upon it. They that glory in their sin, glory in their shame; and then it becomes yet more shameful; mighty men are often mischievous men, and boast of their heart's desire, v. 3. It is uncertain how the following words come. The goodness of God endures continually. Some make it the wicked man's answer to this question. The patience and forbearance of God (the great proofs of his goodness) are abused by sinners, to the hardening of their hearts in their wicked ways; because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily; nay, because God is continually doing them good, therefore they boast in mischief; as if their prosperity in their wickedness was an evidence that there is no harm in it. But it is rather to be taken as an argument against him, to show, 1. The sinfulness of his sin; "God is continually doing good, and those that therein are like him, have reason to glory in their being so: but thou art continually doing mischief, and therein art utterly unlike him, and contrary to him, and yet gloriest in being so." 2. The folly of it: "Thou thinkest, with the mischief which thou dost, that thou art wise (as some fool art), and wastis thyself, and wast proud over the wickedness of his tongue, (that unruly evil full of deadly poison,) and the wickedness of his heart, which was an evidence of. Four things he charges him with. 1. Malice; his tongue does mischief, not only prickling like a needle, but cutting like a sharp razor. Scornful bantering words would not content him: he loved devouring words, words that would ruin the priests of the Lord whom he hated. He was particularly engrossed in this deception: he knew that he did this mischief with; (v. 4.) he loved lying, (v. 3.) and this sharp razor did work deceitfully, (v. 2.) that is, before he had this occasion given him to discover his malice against the priests, he had acted very plainly toward them; though he was an Edomite, he attended the altars, and brought his offerings; and paid his res- pects to the priests, as decently as any Israelite; wherein he put force, (cf. 1 Sam. xix. 24. "You shall be the Lord's") but thus he gained an opportunity of doing them so much the greater mis- chief. Or, it may refer to the information itself, which he gave in against Ahimelech; for the matter of fact was, in substance, true, yet it was misrepresented, and false colours put upon it; and therefore he might well be said to love lying, and to have a deceitful tongue. He told the truth, but not all the truth, as a witness ought to do; had he told that David made Amnon believe he was then going upon Saul's errand, the kindness he showed him would have appeared to be not only not traitorous, but contradictory to his respect for him. It will not save us from the guilt of lying, to be able to say, "There was some truth in what we said," if we pervert it, and make it to appear otherwise than it was. 3. Subtlety in sin: "Thy tongue devises mischief; it speaks the mischief which thy heart devises." The more there is of craft and contrivance in any wickedness, the more there is of the Devil in it. 4. Affection to sin: "Thou lovest evil more than good; that which is evil thou delightest in, and hast no delight but that which is good; thou takest delight in lying, and makest no conscience of doing right. Thou wouldest rather please Saul, by telling a lie, than please God, by speaking truth." Those are of Doeg's spirit, who, instead of being pleased (as we ought all to be) with an opportunity of doing a man a kindness in his body, estate, or good name, are glad when they have a fair occasion to do a man a mischief, and readily close with an opportunity of that kind; that is lowly in the sight of God. It is bad to speak devouring words, but it is worse to love them, either in others or in ourselves. III. He reads his dooms, and denounces the judgments of God against him for his wickedness; (v. 5.) "Thou hast destroyed the priests of the Lord, and cut them off, and therefore God shall likewise destroy thee for ever." Sons of perdition actively, shall be sons of perdition passively, as Judas and that multitude of sin, destroyed by God shall be destroyed; those especially that hate, and persecute, and destroy, the priests of the Lord, his ministers, and people, who are made to our God priests, a royal priesthood, shall be taken away with a swift and everlasting destruction. Doeg is here condemned: 1. To be driven out of the church; He shall pluck thee out of the tabernacle, not thy dwelling-place, but God's; so it is most probably understood. 2. To be cut off from the favour of God, and his presence, and all communion with him, and shall have no benefit either by oracle or offering. Justly was he deprived of all the privileges of God's house, who had been so mischievous to his servants; he had come sometimes to God's tabernacle, and attended in his courts, but he was detained there, he was weary of his service, and sought an opportunity to deface his family; it was very fit, therefore, that he should be taken away, and plucked out thence; we should forbid one of our house, that should serve us so. Note, We forfeit the benefit of ordinances, if we make an ill use of them. 2. To be driven out of the world; "He shall root thee out of the land of the living, in which thou thoughtst thyself so deeply rooted." When good men die, they are transplanted from the land of the living on earth, the nursery of the plants of righteousness, to that in heaven, the garden of the Lord, where they shall abide; but when wicked men, they are rooted out of the land of the living, to perish for ever; as fuel to the fire of divine wrath. This will be the portion of those that contend with God.

3. The righteous also shall see, and fear, and shall laugh at him: 7. Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength; but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness. 8. But I am like a green olive-tree in the house of God: I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever. 9. I will praise thee for ever, because thou hast done it: and I will wait on thy name; for it is good for thy saints.

David was at this time in great distress, the mischief Doeg had done him was but the beginning of his sorrows; and yet here we have him triumphing, and that is more than rejoicing, in tribulation. Blessed Paul, in the midst of his troubles, is in the midst of his triumphs. (1 Cor. ii. 14.) David here triumphs, I. In the fall of Doeg. Yet this should look like personal revenge, he does not speak of it as his own act, but the language of other righteous persons. They shall observe God's judgments on Doeg, and speak of them; 1. To the glory of God; They shall see and fear; (v. 6.) they shall reverence the justice of God, and stand in awe of him, as a God of almighty power, before whom the proud sinners cannot stand, and before whom, therefore, we ought every one of us to humble ourselves. Note, God's judgments on the wicked should strike an awe upon the righteous, and make them afraid of offending God, and incurring his displeasure, exix. 120. Rev. xiv. 3, 4. 2. To the shame of Doeg. They shall laugh at him, not with a ludicrous, but a rational, serious, laughter, as he that sits in heaven shall laugh at him, ii. 4. He shall appear ridiculous, and worthy to be laughed at. We are told how they shall apprehend God's just judgments on him; (v. 7.) Lo, this is the man that made not God his Strength. The fall and ruin of a wealthy mighty man, cannot but be generally taken notice of, and every one is apt to make his remarks upon it; now this is the remark which the righteous should make upon Doeg's fall, that no better could come of it, since he took the wrong method of establishing himself in his wealth and power. If a newly-erected fabric falls down, every one immediately inquires, where was the fault in the building of it? Now, that which ruined Doeg's prosperity, was, (1.) That he did not build it upon a rock; He made not God his Strength, he did not think that the continuance of his prosperity depended upon the favour of God, and therefore took no care to make sure that favour, nor to keep himself in God's love, made no conscience of his duty to him, nor sought him for the least. These wretchedly deceived themselves, that they could do it themselves in their power and wealth without God and his Strength. (2.) That he did build it upon the sand. He thought his wealth would support itself; He trusted in the abundance of his riches, which, he imagined, were laid up for many years; nay, he thought his wickedness would help to support it; he was resolved to stick at nothing, for the securing and advancing of his honour and power; right or wrong, he would get what he could, and keep what he had, and be the ruin of any one that stood in his way; and this, he thought, would strengthen him; they may have any thing that will make conscience of nothing. But now see what it comes to; see what untempered mortar he built his house with, now that it is fallen, and himself buried in the ruins of it. II. In his own stability; (v. 8, 9.) "This mighty man is plucked up by the roots; but I am like a green olive-tree, planted and flourished; he is turned out of God's favour, but I am established in it, not detained, as Doeg, by any thing but the abundant satisfaction I meet with there." Note, Those that by faith and love dwell in the house of God, shall be like green olive-trees there; the wicked are said to flourish like a green bay-tree, (xxxvii. 35.) which bears no useful fruit, though it have abundance of large leaves; but the righteous flourish like a green olive-tree, which is fat as well as flourishing, (xcli. 14.) and with its fatness honours God and man, (Judg. ix. 9.) deriving its root and fatness from the good Olive, Rom. xi. 17.
PSALMS, LIII.

To the chief musician upon Mahalath, Maschil. A psalm of David.

1. THE fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. Corrupt are they, and have done abominable iniquity: there is none that doeth good. 2. God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek God. 3. Everyone of them is gone back; they are altogether become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no, not one. 4. Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread: they have not called upon God. 5. There were they in great fear where no fear was; for God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee: thou hast put them to shame, because God hath despised them. 6. Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

This psalm was opened before, and therefore we shall here only observe, in short, some things concerning sin, in order to the increasing of our scowr for it and hatred of it.

1. The fact of sin; is that proved? Can the charge be made out? Yes, God is a Witness to it, an unexceptionable witness: from the place of his holiness he looks on the children of men, and sees how little good there is among them, v. 2. All the sinfulness of their hearts and lives is naked and open before him.

2. The fault of sin; is there any harm in it? Yes, it is iniquity, (v. 1. 4.) it is an unrighteous thing; it is that which has no good in it, (v. 1. 3.) it is an evil thing; it is the worst of evils, it is that which breaketh through and through such an evil world as it is; it is going back from God, v. 3.

3. The fountain of sin; how comes it that men are so bad? Surely, it is because there is no fear of God before their eyes: they say in their hearts, "There is no God at all to call us to an account, none that we need to stand in awe of." Men's bad practices flow from their bad principles; if they pretend to know God, yet in works, because in thoughts, they dishonour him.

4. The folly of sin; he is a fool, (in the account of God, whose judgment we are sure is right,) that harbours such corrupt thoughts; atheists, whether in opinion or practice, are the greatest fools in the world. They that do not seek God, do not understand, they are like brute beasts that have no understanding; for man is distinguished from the brutes, not so much by the powers of reason, as by a capacity for religion. The workers of iniquity, whatever they pretend to, have no knowledge; those may truly be said to know nothing, that do not know God, v. 4.

5. The filthiness of sin; sinners are corrupt, (v. 1.) their nature is vitiated and spoiled, and the more noble the nature is, the more vile it is when it is degraded; as that of the angels, Corrupto optimo est hessemo,—Nothing, when corrupted, is so bad as the best. They that are the baddest, are such as look upon the holy God, and it renders them so; whereas otherwise he hates nothing that he has made. It makes men filthy, altogether filthy; wilful sinners are offensive in the nostrils of the God of heaven and of the holy angels. What decency soever prais sinners pretend to, it is certain that wickedness is the greatest delusion in the world. Come to what a degree of barbarity it brings men at last; when men's hearts are hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, see their cruelty to their brethren, that are born of their bone—because they will not run with them to the same excess of riot, they eat them up, as they eat bread; as if they were not only become beasts, but beasts of prey. And see their contempt of God at the same time; they have not called upon him, but seem to be beholden to none but themselves.

7. The fear and shame that attend sin; (1.) There were they in great fear, who had made God their Enemy; their own guilty consciences frightened them, and filled them with horror, though otherwise there was no apparent cause of fear; the wicked flees when none pursues. See the ground of this fear; it is because God has formerly scattered the bones of those that encumbered against his people; not only broken their power, and dispersed their forces, but slain them, and reduced their bodies to dry bones, like those scattered at the grave's mouth, clxi. 7. Such will be the fate of those that lie siege to the camp of the saints, and the beloved city, Rev. xx. 9. The apprehensions of this cannot but put those into frights that eat up God's people. This enables the virgin, the daughter of Zion, to put them to shame, and expose them, because God has despised them; to laugh at them, because he that sits in heaven laughs at them. We need not look upon those enemies with fear, whom God looks upon with contempt. If he despises them, we may.

Lastly, The faith of the saints, and their hope and power touching the cure of this great evil; (v. 6.) There will come a Saviour, a great salvation, a salvation from sin. Oh that it might be hastened! for it will bring in glorious and joyful times. There were those in the Old Testament times, that looked and hoped, that prayed and waited, for this redemption. (1.) God will, in due time, save his church from the sinful malice of its enemies, which would bring joy to Jacob and Israel, that had long been in a mournful melancholy state. Such salvations were often wrought, and all typical of the everlasting triumphs of the glorious church. (2.) He will save all believers from their own iniquities, that they may not be led captive by them, which will be everlasting-betrayed! David to Saul, by informing him where he was, and putting him in a way how to seize him. This they did twice; (1 Sam. xxii. 19—xxvi. 1) and it is upon, to their everlasting infamy. The psalm is sweet; the former half thereof, was meditated while he was in his distress, and put into writing when the danger was over, with the addition of the two last verses, which speak his thankfulness for the deliverance, which yet looked forward, even to the end of his days, in the midst of his fright. Here, I. He complains to God of the malice of his enemies, and prays for help against them, v. 1..3. II. He comforts himself with an assurance of the divine favour towards him, the workmen, was mediated; and, in due season, his enemies would be confounded, and he delivered, v. 4.—7. What time we are in distress, we may comfortably sing this psalm.

To the chief musician on Neginoth, Maschil. A psalm of David, when the Ziphims came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us? of my mouth. 3. For strangers are risen up against me, and oppressors seek after my soul: they have not set God before them. Selah.

We may observe here,

1. The great distress that David was now in, which the title gives an account of. The Ziphims came of their own accord, and informed Saul where David was, with a promise to deliver him into his hand. One would have thought, when David was retired into the country, he should not have been pursued; into a desert country, he should not have been discovered; and into his own country, he should not have been betrayed; and yet it seems he was. Never let a good man expect to be safe and easy, till he comes to heaven. How treacherous, how officious, were these Ziphims! It is well that God is faithful, for men are not to be trusted, Mic. vii. 5.

2. His prayer to God for succour and deliverance, v. 1, 2. He appeals to God's strength, by which he was able to help him, and to his name, by which he was engaged to help him; and begs he would save him from his enemies, and judge him, plead his cause, and judge for him. David has no other plea to depend upon than God's name, no other power to depend upon than God's strength, and those he makes his refuge and confidence. This would be sufficient for the off curve of his enemy, whether it was Saul or Saul, for even in his flight, when he had not opportunity for a solemn address to God, he was ever and anon lifting up to heaven; Hear my prayer, which comes from my heart, and give ear to the words of my mouth.

3. His plea, which is taken from the character of his enemies, v. 3. (1.) They are strangers; such were the Ziphims, unworthy the name of Israelites; (2.) They have used me more basely and barbarously than the Philistines themselves would have done. The worst treatment may be expected from those who, having broken through the bonds of relation and alliance, make themselves strangers. (2.) They are oppressors; such was Saul, who, as a king, should have used his power for the protection of all his good subjects, but abused it for their destruction.

Nothing is so grievous as oppression in the seat of judgment, Ex. xii. 16. Paul's greatest perils were for his own countrymen, and by false brethren; (2 Cor. xi. 26.) and so were David's. (3.) They were very formidable and threatening; they not only hated him and wished him ill, but they rose up against him in a body, joining their power to do him a mischief. (4.) They were very spiteful and malicious; They seek after my soul; they hunt for the precious life, no less will satisfy them. We may, in faith, pray that God would not by his providence give success, lest it should look like giving countenance to such cruel bloody men. (5.) They were very preposterous and atheistical, and, for this reason, he thought God was concerned in honour to appear against them; They have not set God before them; they have quite cast off the thoughts of God, they do not consider that his eye is upon them, that, in fighting against his people, they fight against him, nor have they any dread of the certain fatal consequences of such an unequal engagement. Note, God's people have nothing to do but to trust in him, and be sure that his judgment is to be expected; nay, what wickedness will not such men be guilty of? What bonds of nature, or friendship, or gratitude, or covenant, will hold those that have broken through the fear of God? Selah; Mark this. Let us all be sure to set God before us at all times: If we do not, we are in danger of becoming desperate.

4. Behold, God is my helper: the Lord is with them that uphold my soul. 5. He shall reward evil unto mine enemies: cut them off in thy truth. 6. I will freely sacrifice unto thee; I will praise thy name, O Lord, for it is good. 7. For he hath delivered me out of all trouble; and mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies.

We have here the lively actions of David's faith in his prayer, by which he was assured the issue would be comfortable, though the attempt upon him was formidable.

1. He was sure that he had God on his side; that God took his part; (v. 4) he speaks it with an air of triumph and exultation, "Behold, God is my Help," he would say; and if he be for us, we shall have such help in him, that we need not fear any power engaged against us. Though men and devils aim to be our destroyers, they shall not prevail while God is our Helper; "The Lord is with them that uphold my soul," (Ps. cxviii. 7.) "The Lord taketh my part with them that help me." There are some that uphold me, and God is one of them; he is the principal one; none of them could help me, but he would help them. Every creature is friendly to us (and no more) that God makes it to be. He means, "The Lord is he that upholds my soul, and keeps me from tiring in my work, and sinking under my burthen." He that by his providence upholds all things, by his grace upholds the souls of his people. God, who will, in due time, save his people, does, in the mean time, sustain them, and bear them up, so that the spirit he has made shall not fail before him.

2. God, taking part with him, he doubted not but his enemies should both fall and fall before him; (v. 5.) "He shall reward evil unto mine enemies that observe me, seeking an opportunity to do me a mischief. The evil they designed against me, the righteous God will return upon their own heads." David would not render evil to them, but he knew God would; "I am a deaf man heard not, for thou wilt hear. The enemies we forgive, if they repent not, God will judge: and, for this reason, we must not avenge ourselves, because God has said, Vengeance is mine. But he prays, Cut them off in thy truth. This is not a prayer of malice, but a prayer of faith, for it has an eye to the word of God, and only desires the performance of that. There is truth in God's threatenings, as well as in his promises, and sinners that repent not will find it so to their cost.

3. He promises more: he thanks God for all the experience he had of his goodness to him; (v. 6.) "I will sacrifice unto thee. Though sacrifices were expensive, yet, when God required that his worshippers should in that way praise him, David would not only offer them, but offer them freely, and without grudging. All our spiritual sacrifices must, in this sense, be free-will offerings, for God loves a cheerful giver. Yet he will not only bring his sacrifice, which was but the shadow, the curse may; he will mind the substance. I will praise thy name. A thankful heart, and the calves of our lips giving thanks to his name, are the sacrifices God will accept; "I will praise thy name, for it is good. Thy name is not only great but good, and therefore to be praised; to praise thy name is not only what we are bound to, but it is good, it is pleasant, it is profitable; it is good for us, (xcli. 1.) therefore I will praise thy name." 4. He speaks of his deliverance as a thing done; (v. 7.) I will praise thy name, and say, "He has delivered me; this shall be my song then." That which he rejews in, is, a complete deliverance; He has delivered me from all trouble; and a deliverance to his heart's content; Mine eye has seen its desire upon mine enemies; not seen them cut off and ruini

ed, but forced to retreat; tidings brought to Saul that the Philistines were upon him, (1 Sam. xxxii. 27, 28.) All David desired, was, to be himself safe; when he saw Saul draw off his forces, he saw his desire; He has delivered me from all trouble. Either, (1.) With this thought David comforted himself when he was in distress, "He has delivered me from all trouble hitherto, and many a time I have gained my point, and seen my desire on mine enemies; therefore he will deliver me out of this trouble." We should thus, in our greatest straits, encourage ourselves with our past experiences. Or, (2.) With this thought he magnified his present deliverance, and the triumphs over, that it was the earnest of his further deliverance. He speaks of the completing of his deliverance as a thing done, though he had as yet many troubles before him; because, having God's promise for it, he was as sure of it as if it was done already. "He that has begun to deliver me from this trouble, shall deliver me from all troubles, and shall, at length, give me to see my desire upon mine enemies." This may, perhaps, point at Christ, of whom David was a type; God would deliver him out of all the troubles of his state of humiliation, and he was perfectly sure of it; and all things are said to be put under his feet; for though we see not yet all things put under him, yet we are sure he shall reign till all his enemies be made his footstool, and he shall see his desire upon them. However, it is an encouragement to all believers to make that use of their particular deliverances which St. Paul does, (like David here) vers. 17, 18. He that delivered me from the mouth of the lion shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me to his heavenly kingdom.

PSALM LV.

It is the conjecture of many expositors, that David penned this psalm upon occasion of Absalom's rebellion, and that the particular enemy he here speaks of, that dealt treacherously with him, was Ahithophel; and some will therefore make David's troubles here typical of Christ's suffering, and Ahithophel's treachery a figure of Judas's, because they both hanged themselves. But there is nothing in it that is particularly applied to Christ in the New Testament. David himself often penned this psalm. 1. He prays that God would manifest his favour to him, and pleads his own sorrow and fear, v. 1. 2. He prays that God would manifest his disposal of his enemies, against whom he was already ravaged by the hand of Ahithophel; v. 9. 3. He prays that God would be magnified in his hands, that he might bear all the heat of the great wickedness and treachery, (v. 9.) and again, v. 20, 21. 4. He assures himself that God would, in due time, appear for him against his enemies, comforts himself with the sure hope of God's protection; v. 19. 5. He prays for God's favor, and trust in God, (v. 16., 19.) and again, v. 22, 23. In singing this psalm, we may, if there be occasion, apply it to our own troubles; if not, we may sympathize with those to whose case it comes nearest, foreseeing that there will be, at last, indignation and wrath to the persecutors, a salvation and joy to the persecuted.

To the chief musician on Neginoth, Maschil. A psalm of David.

1. GIVE ear to my prayer, O God; and hide not thyself from my supplication. 2. Attend unto me, and hear me: I mourn in my complaint, and make a noise; 3. Because of the voice of the enemy, because of the oppression of the wicked: for they cast iniquity upon me, and in wrath they hate me. 4. My heart is sore pained within me; and the tears of death are fallen upon me. 5. Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me, and horror hath overwhelmed me. 6. And I said, Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would fli away, and be at rest. 7. Lo then would I wander far off, and remain in the wilderness.

Selah. 8. I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest.

In these verses, we have,
I. David praying. Prayer is a salve for every sore, and a relief to the spirit under every burden;
Give ear to my prayer, O God, v. 1, 2. He does not set down the petitions he offered up to God in his distress, but begs that God would hear the prayers which, at every period, his heart lifted up to God, and grant an answer of peace to them; Attend to me, hear me, Saul.
Saul would not hear his petitions, his other enemies regarded not his pleas, but, "Lord, be thou pleased to hearst to me. Hide not thyself from my supplication; either as one unconcerned, and not regarding it, nor seeming to take any notice of it, or as one displeased, angry at me, and therefore at my prayer." If we, in our prayers, sincerely lay open ourselves, our case, our hearts, to God, we have reason to hope that he will not hide himself, his favours, his comforts, from us.

II. David weeping; for in this he was a type of Christ, that he was a man of sorrows, and often in tears; (v. 2.) "I mourn in my complaint," (or, in my meditation, my melancholy musings,) "and I make a noise; I cannot forbear such sighs and groans, and other expressions of grief, as discover it to those about me." Great griefs are sometimes noisy and clamorous, and thus are, in some measure, lessened, while those increase that are stified, and have no vent given them. But what was the matter? v. 3. It is because of the voice of the enemy, the menaces and insulks of Absalom's party, that swelled, and hectarced, and stirred up the people to cry out against David, and shout him out of his palace and capital city, as afterwards the chief priests stirred up the mob to cry out against the Son of David, Away with him, crucify him. Yet it was not the voice of the enemy only that fetched tears from David's eyes, but their oppression, and the hardship he was under through them; They made my heart sad. They could not justly charge David with any maladministration in his government, could not prove any act of oppression or injustice upon him, but they加载ed him with calumnies. Though they found no iniquity in him, relating to his trust as a king, yet they cast all manner of iniquity upon him, and represented him to the people as a tyrant fit to be expelled. Immencity itself is no security against violent and lying tongues. They hated him themselves, nay, in wrath they hated him; there was in their enmity both the heat and violence of anger, or sudden passion, and the implacableness of hatred and rooted malice; and therefore they studied to make him odious, that others also might hate him.

This made him mourn, and the more, because he could remember the time when he was the darling of the people, and answered to his name, David, a beloved one.

III. David trembling, and in great consternation. We may well suppose him to be so, upon the breaking out of Absalom's conspiracy, and the general defection of the people, even those that he had little reason to suspect.

1. See what fear seized him. David was a man of great boldness, and in some very eminent instances he had signalized his courage, and yet, when the danger was reduced, and in the attitude of his heart he failed him; let not the stout man therefore glory in his courage, any more than the strong man in strength. Now that David's heart is sore-pained within him, the terror of death are fallen upon him, v. 4. Fearfulness of mind and trembling of body came upon him, and horror covered and overwhelmed him; (v. 5.) when without are fightings, no marvel that within are fears; and, if it was upon the ocean of Absalom's rebellion, we may suppose that the remembrance of his sin in the matter of Uriah, which God was now reckoning with him for, added as much more to the fright. Sometimes David's faith made him, in a manner, fearless, and he could boldly say, when surrounded with enemies, I will not be afraid what man can do unto me. But at other times his fears prevail and tyrannize; for the best men are not always alike strong in faith.

2. See how desirous he was, in this fright, to retire into a desert, any whither to be far enough from hearing the voice of the enemy, and seeing their oppressions. He said, (v. 6.) said it to God in prayer, said it to himself in meditation, said it to his friends in complaint, Oh that I had wings like a dove! Much as he had been sometimes in love with Jerusalem, now that it was become a rebellions city, he longed to get clear of it, and, like the prophet, wishes he had in the wilderness a lodging place of way-faring men, that he might leave his freagle, and go from them, for they were an assembly of treacherous men, Jer. ix. 2.

3. This agrees very well with David's resolution upon the breaking out of that plot, Arise, let us flee, and make speed to depart, 2 Sam. xv. 14.

Observe (1.) How he would make his escape; he was so surrounded with enemies, that he saw not how he could escape but upon the wing, and therefore he wished, Oh that I had wings, not like a hawk that flies strongly, but like a dove that flies swiftly; he wishes for wings, not to fly upon the prey, but to fly from the birds of prey, for such his enemies were. The wings of a dove were most agreeable to him who was of a dove-like spirit, and therefore the wings of a eagle would not become him. The dove flies low, and takes shelter as soon as she can, and thus would David fly.

(2.) What he would make his escape from; from the wind, storm, and tempest, the tumult and ferment that the city was now in, and the danger to which he was exposed. Herein he was like a dove that cannot endure noise.

(3.) What he aimed at, in making this escape; not victory, but flight; "I would fly away, and be at rest, v. 6. I would fly any whither, if it were to a barren frightful wilderness, ever so far off, so I might be quiet," v. 7. Note, Peace and quietness, in silence and solitude, are what the wisest and best of men have most earnestly coveted, and the more when they have been vexed and wearied with the noise and clamour of those about them. Gracious souls wish to retire from the hurry and bustle of this world, that they may sweetly enjoy God and themselves; and, if there be not in their own persons a piece of side heaven, it is they that enjoy it in those retirements. This makes death desirable to a child of God, that it is a final escape from all the storms and tempests of this world, to perfect and everlasting rest.

9. Destroy, 0 Lord, and divide their tongues: for I have seen violence and strife in the city. 10. Day and night they go about it upon the walls thereof; mischief also and sorrow are in the midst of it. 11. Wickedness is in the midst thereof; deceit and guile depart not from her streets. 12. For it was not an enemy that reproached me: then could I have borne it; neither was it he that hated me that did magnify himself against me; then I would have hid myself.
13. But it was thou, a man mine equal, my guide, and mine acquaintance.

14. We took sweet counsel together, and walked unto the house of God in company.

15. Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell; for wickedness is in their dwellings, and among them.

David here complains of his enemies, whose wicked plots had brought him, though not to his faith's end, yet to his wit's end, and prays against them by the spirit of prophecy.

Observe here,

1. The character he gives of the enemies he feared. They were of the worst sort of men, and his description of them agrees very well with Absalom and his accomplices.

2. He complains of the city Jerusalem, which strangely fell in with Absalom and fell off from David, so that he had none there, but his own guards and servants, that he could reprove any confidence in. How is that faithful city become a harlot! David did not take the representation of it from others; but with his own eyes, and with a sad heart, did himself see nothing but violence and strife in the city; (v. 9.) for, when they grew disaffected and disloyal to David, the people mischief one to another. If he walked the rounds upon the walls of the city, he saw that violence and strife went about it day and night, and mounted its guards, v. 10. All the arts and methods which the rebels used for the fortifying of the city, were made up of violence and strife, and there were no remains of honesty or love among them. If he looked into the heart of the city, mischief and injury, mutual wrong and vexation, were in the midst of all. Wickedness, all manner of wickedness, is in the midst thereof; Jusqu' a datun sceleri - Wickedness was legalized. Deceit and guile, and all manner of treacherous dealing, departed not from her streets, v. 11. It may be meant of their base and barbarous usage of David's friends, and such as they knew were firm and faithful to him; they did them all the mischief they could, by fraud or force. Is this the character of Jerusalem, the royal city, and which is the heart of the house of Israel? Unhappy Jerusalem, soon after the thrones of judgment and the testimony of Israel were both placed there! Is this the city that men call the perfection of beauty? Lam. ii. 15. Is Jerusalem, the head quarters of God's priests, so ill taught? Can Jerusalem be ungrateful to David himself, its own illustrious founder, so that he cannot reside in it? Let us not be surprized at the corruptions and disorders of this church on earth, but long to see the New Jerusalem, where there is no violence or strife, no mischief or guile, and into which no unclean thing shall enter, nor any thing that disquiets.

2. He complains of one of the ring-leaders of the conspiracy, that had been very industrious to foment jealousies, to misrepresent him and his government, and to incense the city against him; it was one that reproached him, as if he either abused his power, or neglected the use of it, for that was Absalom's malicious suggestion: There is no man deft of the king to hear thee; 2 Sam. xv. 3. That and similar accusations were industriously spread among the people; and who was most active in it? "Not a sworn enemy, not Shimei, or any of the nonjurors; then I could have borne it, for I should not have expected better from them;" (and we find how patiently he did bear Shimei's curses.) "not one that professed to hate me, then I should have stood by my guard against him, would have hid myself and my counsels from him, so that it would not have been in his power to betray me; but it was thou, a man mine equal," v. 13. The Chaldee-paraphrase names Ahithophel as the person here meant, and nothing in that plot seems to have discouraged David so much as to hear that Ahithophel was among the conspirators with Absalom, (2 Sam. xv. 31.) for he was the king's counsellor, 1 Chron. xxvii. 35. "It was thou, a man, mine equal, one whom I esteemed as myself, a friend as mine own soul, to whom I had communicated all my secrets, and who knew my heart as I knew his, as the very right hand of my flesh, with whom I advised, and by whom I was directed in all my affairs, whom I made president of the council, and prime-minister of state; my intimate acquaintance and familiar friend; this is the man that now abuses me. I have been kind to him, but I find him thus basely ungrateful; I have put a trust in him, but I find him thus basely treacherous, nay, and he could not have done me the one half of the mischief he does; I had not showed him so much honor. All this must needs be very grievous to an ingenuous mind, and yet this was not all; this traitor had seemed a saint, else he had never been David's bosom friend; (v. 14.) "We took counsel together, spent many an hour together, with a great deal of pleasure in religious discourse;" or, as Dr. Hammond reads it, "We joined ourselves together to the assembly; I gave him the right-hand of fellowship in holy ordinances, and then we walked to the house of God in the day-time, together." Note, (1.) There always has been, and always will be, a mixture of good and bad, sound and unsound, in the visible church, between whom, perhaps, for a long time, we can discern no difference; but the Searcher of hearts does. David, who went to the house of God in his sincerity, had Ahithophel in company with him, who went in his hypocrisy. The Pharisee and the Publican went together to the temple, the one imprudent, and the other hypocritical. They that are perfect, and they that are not, will be made manifest. (2.) Carnal policy may carry men on very far, and very long, in a profession of religion, while it is in fashion, and will serve a turn. In the court of pious David, none was more devout than Ahithophel, and yet his heart was not right in the sight of God. (3.) We must not wonder, if we be badly deceived in some that have made great pretensions to religion, and have given us much reason to have confidence in them. David, himself, though a very wise man, was thus imposed upon, which may make similar disappointments the more tolerable to us.

II. His prayers against them, which we are both to stand in awe of, and to comfort ourselves in; as prophecies, but not to copy into our prayers against any particular enemies of our own. He prays,

1. That God would dispose them, as he did the Babel-builders; (v. 9.) "Destray, O Lord, and divide their tongues; blast their counsels, by making them to disagree among themselves, and clash with one another. Send an evil spirit among them, that they may not understand one another, but be envious and jealous one of another." This prayer was answered in the turning of Ahithophel's counsel into foolishness, by setting up the counsel of Hushai against it. God often destroys the church's enemies by dividing them; nor is there a surer way to the destruction of any people than their division. A kingdom, an interest, divided against itself, cannot long stand.

2. That God would destroy them, as he did Da than and Abiram, and their associates, who were confederates against Moses, whose throat being an open sepulchre, the earth therefore opened, and swallowed them up. This was then a new thing, and it would have stood to show God's power; but he prays that it might now be repeated, or something equivalent; (v. 15.) "Let death seize upon them by divine warrant, and let them go down quick into hell; let them be dead, and buried, and so, utterly destroyed, in a moment; for wickedness is wherever it are, it is in the midst of them. "The souls of the impenitent sinners go down quick, or alive, into hell, for they have a perfect sense of their miseries, and shall therefore live still, that they may be still miserable. This prayer is a prophecy of the utter, the final, the everlasting, ruin of all those who, whether secretly or openly, oppose and rebel against the Lord’s Messiah.

16. As for me, I will call upon God; and the Lord shall save me. 17. Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud; and he shall hear my voice. 18. He hath delivered my soul in peace from the battle that was against me: for there were many with me. 19. God shall hear and afflict them, even he that abideth of old. Selah. Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God. 20. He hath put forth his hands against such as be at peace with him; he hath broken his covenant. 21. The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords. 22. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee: he shall never suffer the righteous to be moved. 23. But thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction: bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days; but I will trust in thee.

In these verses, I. David perseveres in his resolution to call upon God, being well assured that he should not seek him in vain; (v. 16.) "As for me, let them take what course they please to secure themselves, let violence and strife be their guards, prayer shall be mine: this I have found comfort in, and therefore this will I abide by; I will call upon God, and, contrary to what most men do, I will trust the Lord and be saved." Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, in a right manner, shall be saved, Rom. x. 13. He resolves to be both fervent, and frequent, in this duty. 1. He will pray fervently; I will pray and cry aloud. "I will meditate," (so the former word signifies,) "I will speak with my own heart, and the prayer shall come thence." Then we pray aright, when we pray with all that is within us; think first, and then pray over our thoughts; for the true nature of prayer is, lifting up the heart to God. Having meditated, he will cry, he will cry aloud: the fervour of his spirit in prayer shall be expressed, and yet more excited, by the intenseness and earnestness of his voice. 2. He will pray frequently, every day, and three times a day, evening, and morning, and at noon. It is probable that this had been his constant practice, and he resolves to continue it. No doubt he was in his distress. Then we may come the more boldly to the throne of grace in trouble, when we do not then first begin to seek acquaintance with God, but it is what we have constantly practised, and the trouble finds the wheels of prayer going. They that think three meals a day little enough for the body, ought much more to think three solemn prayers a day little enough for the soul, and to count it a pleasure, not a task. As it is fit that in the morning we pray with the day, with God, and in the evening close it with him, so it is fit that in the midst of the day we should exercise a while to converse with him. It was Daniel’s practice to pray three times a day; (Dan. vi. 10.) and noon was one of Peter’s hours of prayer, Acts x. 9. Let not us be weary of praying often, for God is not weary of hearing; "He shall hear my voice, and not blame me for coming too often, but the oftener the better, the more welcome." II. He assures himself that God would, in due time, give an answer of peace to his prayers. 1. That he himself should be delivered, and all the foes he fears will have; those fears with which he was much disordered, (v. 4, 5.) by the exercise of faith were now silenced, and he begins to rejoice in hope; (v. 18.) God has delivered my soul in peace, that is, he will deliver it; David is as sure of the deliverance as if it were already wrought. His enemies were at war with him, and the battle was against him, but God delivered him in peace, brought him off with as much comfort as if he had never been in danger. If he did not deliver him in victory, yet he delivered him in peace, inward peace, he delivered his soul in peace; by patience and holy joy in God he kept possession of that; these are safe and easy whose hearts and minds are kept by that peace of God which passes all understanding, Phil. iv. 7. David, in his fright thought all were against him; but now he sees there were many with him, more than he imagined, his interest was advanced both when he expected, and this he gives to God the glory of; for it is he that raises us up friends when we need them, and makes them faithful to us. There were many with him, for though his subjects deserted him, and went over to Absalom, yet God was with him, and the good angels. With an eye of faith he now sees himself surrounded, as Elisha was, with chariots of fire, and horses of fire, and therefore triumphs thus, There are many with me, more with me than against me, 2 Kings vi. 16, 17. 2. That his enemies should be reckoned with, and brought down. They had frightened him with their menaces, (v. 3.) but here he says enough to frighten them, and make them tremble with more reason, and no remedy, for they could not ease themselves of their fears, as David could, by faith in God.

[1.] They are impious and profane, and stand in no aw of God, of his authority or wrath; (v. 19.) "Because they have no changes, no afflictions, no interruption to the constant course of their prosperity, no crosses to empty them from vessel to vessel, therefore they fear not God, they live in a constant neglect and contempt of God and religion, which is the cause of all their other wickedness, and by which they are certainly marked for destruction.

[2.] They are treacherous and false, and will not be held by the most sacred and solemn engagements; (v. 20.) "He has put forth his hand against such as he at peace with him, that never provoked him, nor gave him any cause to quarrel with them; nay to whom he had given all possible encouragement to the contrary; he has put forth his hand against those whom he had given his hand to, and has broken his covenant, both with God and man, has perfidiously violated his engagement to both," than which nothing makes men riper for ruin.

[3.] They are base and hypocritical, pretending friendship while they design mischief; (v. 21.) "The words of his mouth" (probably he means Ahab’s) particularly; "were smoother than butter, and softer than oil, so courteous was he and obliging, so free in his professions of respect and kindness, and the proffers of his service; yet, at the same time, war was in his heart, and all this courtes"y was but a stratagem of war, and those very words had such a mischievous design in them, that they never did draw and could design to stab them. They smile in a man's face, and cut him through at the same time, as Job, that kissed and killed. Satan is such an enemy; he flatters men into their ruin; when he speaks fair, believe him not.

[1.] God shall afflict them, and bring them into straits and frights, and recompense tribulation to them that have troubled his people, and this, in answer to the upbraidings of his enemies. I will be still hard and afflict them, hear the cries of the oppressed, and speak terror to their oppressors, even he that abides of old, who is God from everlasting, and without end, and who sits Judge from the beginning of time, and has always presided in the affairs of the children of men. Mortal men, though ever so high and strong, will easily be crushed by an eternal God, and are a very unequal match for him. The saints have comforted themselves with, in reference to the three saving powers of the church's enemies; (Hab. i. 12.) An enemy not from everlasting, O Lord?

[2.] God shall bring them down, not only to the dust, but to the pit of destruction; (v. 23.) to the bottomless pit, which is called destruction, Job xxxvi. 6. He afflicted them, (v. 19.) to see if that would humble and reform them; but they not being wrought upon by that, he shall, at last, bring them to ruin. Those that are not reclaimed by the threatenings of affliction, will certainly be brought down into the pit of destruction. They are bloody and deceitful men, the worst of men, and therefore shall not live out half their days, not half so long as men ordinarily live, and as they might have lived in a course of nature, and as they themselves expected to live. They shall live as long as the Lord of life, the righteous Judge, has appointed, with whom the number of our months is; but he has determined to cut them off, by an untimely death, in the midst of their days. They were bloody men, and cut others off, and therefore God will justly cut them off: they were deceitful men, and defrauded others of the one half perhaps of what was their due; and now God will cut them short, though not of that which was their due, yet of that which they counted upon.

III. He encourages himself, and all good people, to confidence in God and with confidence in him. He himself resolves to do so; (v. 23.) I will trust in thee, in thy providence, and power, and mercy, and not in my own prudence, strength, or merit; when bloody and deceitful men are cut off in the midst of their days, I shall still live by faith in thee. And this he will have others to do; (v. 22.) Cast thy burden upon the Lord, whoever thou art, that art burdened, and whatever the burden is. Cast thy grief upon the Lord, as some read it; Whereupon God has promised, (Psa. 55.) that he will comfort them that are afflicted, who endeavor to enjoy, commit them all to his custody, and particularly commit the keeping of thy soul to him. Or, "Whatever it is that thou desirest God should give thee, leave it to him to give it thee in his own way and time." Cast thy care upon the Lord, so the LXX, to which the apostle refers, 1 Pet. v. 7. Care is a burden, it makes the heart stoop; (Prov. xlix.) and we must cast it upon God by faith and prayer, commit it to his hands, and he will do as seems him good, and we will be satisfied. To cast our burden upon God, is, to stay ourselves on his providence and promise, and to be very easy in the assurance that all shall work for good. If we do so, it is promised, 1. That he will sustain us, both support and supply us; will himself carry us in the arms of his power, as the nurse carries the sucking-child, will strengthen our spirits so by his Spirit, as that they shall sustain the infirmity. He has not promised to free us immediately from that trouble which gives rise to our cares and fears; but he will provide that we be not tempted above what we are able, and that we shall be able to bear as we are tempted. 2. That he will never suffer the righteous to be moved, to be so shaken by any troubles, as to quit either their duty to God, or their comfort in him. However, he will not suffer them to be moved for ever; (as some read it;) though they fall, they shall not be utterly cast down.

PSALM LVI.

It seems by this, and many other psalms, that, even in times of the greatest trouble and distress, David never hung his harp upon the willow-trees, never unstrung it, or laid it by; but that, when his dangers and fears were greatest, he was still in tune for singing God's praises. He was so confident in God, being assured that he took his part, comforting himself with this, that therefore he was safe, and should be victorious, and that, while he lived, he should praise God, v. 3, 4, 8-13. How pleasantly may a good Christian, in singing this psalm, praise God, and adore him for what he will do, as well as for what he has done.

To the chief musician upon Jonath-elem-rechokim, Michtani of David, when the Philistines took him in Gath.

1. Be merciful unto me, O God; for man would swallow me up: he fighting daily oppresseth me. 2. Mine enemies would daily swallow me up: for they be many that fight against me, O thou Most High. 3. What time I am afraid I will trust in thee. 4. In God I will praise his word; in God I have put my trust: I will not fear what flesh can do unto me. 5. Every day they wrest my words: all their thoughts are against me for evil. 6. They gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps, when they wait for my soul. 7. Shall they escape by iniquity? in thine anger cast down the people, O God.

David, in this psalm, by his faith throws himself into the hands of God, then when he had by his fear and folly thrown himself into the hands of the Philistines; it was when they took him in Gath, whither he fled for fear of Saul, forgetting the quarrel they had with him for killing Goliath; but they soon put him in mind of it, 1 Sam. xxi. 10, 11. Upon that occasion he changed his behaviour, but God, who would not suffer his people to fall into the snare of his enemies, penned both this psalm and the 54th. This is called Michtam—A golden psalm. So some other psalms are entitled, but this has something peculiar in the title; it is upon Jonath-elem-rechokim, which signifies, The silent dove afar off. Some apply that to David himself, who wished for the wings of a dove on which to fly away. He was innocent and inoffensive, mild and patient, as a dove, as was at this time driven from his nest, from the sanctuary, (xxviii. 3.) He was forced to wander afar off, to seek for shelter in distant countries, there he was like the doves of the valleys, mourning and melancholy; but silent, neither murmuring against God, nor railing at the instruments of his trouble; herein a type of Christ, who was as a sheep, dumb before the shearsers, and a pattern to Christians, who, wherever they are, and whatever injuries are done them, ought to be as silent doves.

In this part of the psalm, He complains to God of the malice and wickedness of his enemies, to show what reason he had to fear them, and what cause, what need, there was, that God should appear against them; (v. 1) Be merciful unto me, O God. That petition includes all the good we come to the throne of grace for; if we obtain mercy there, we obtain all we can desire; and need no more to make us happy. It implies likewise our best plea, not our merit, but God's mercy, in which we can boast; He might have found mercy with God, for with men he could find no mercy. When he fled from the cruel hands of Saul, he fell into the cruel hands of the Philistines; "Lord," (says he,) "be thou merciful to me now, or I am undone." The mercy of God is what we may flee to, and trust to, and in faith pray for, when we are surrounded on all sides with difficulties and dangers.

He complains,

1. That his enemies were very numerous; (v. 2) "They be many that fight against me, and think to overpower me with numbers; take notice of this, O thou most High, and make it to appear that, wherein they deal proudly, thou art above them. It is a point of honour to come into the help of one against many. And if God be on our side, how many soever they are that fight against us, we may, upon good grounds, boast, that there are more with us, for (as that great general said) "How many do we reckon for him?"

2. That they were very barbarous; they would swallow him up, (v. 1) and again, v. 2. They sought to devour him; no less would serve, they came upon him with the utmost fury, like beasts of prey, to eat up his flesh, xxxii. 2. Man would swallow him up, those of his own kind, from whom he might have expected humanity. The ravenous beasts prey not upon those of their own species; yet a bad man would devour a good man, if he could. "They are men, weak and frail; make them to know that they are so," ix. 20.

3. That they were very unanimous; (v. 6) They gather themselves together; though they were many, and of different interests among themselves, yet they united and combined against David, as Herod and Pilate against the Son of David. That they were very powerful; quite too hard for him, if God did not help him; "They fight against me;" (v. 2) They oppress me; (v. 1) I am almost overcome and borne down by them, but still reduced to the last extremity.

4. That they were very subtle and crafty; (v. 6) "They hide themselves; they industriously cover their designs, that they may the more effectually prosecute and pursue them. They hide themselves as in their den, that they may mark my steps; they observe every thing I say and do, with a critical eye, that they may have something to accuse me of." Thus Christ's enemies watched him, Luke xx. 20. Or, "They have an eye upon all my motions, that they may gain an opportunity to do me a mischief, and may lay their snares for me.

5. That they were very spiteful and malicious; they put invidious constructions upon every thing he said, and did, however honestly meant, and profoundly expressed; (v. 5) "They writhe; they wrote the word, put them upon the rack, to extort that out of them which was never in them;" and so they made him an offender for a word, (Isa. xxix. 21.) misrepresenting it to Saul, and aggravating it, to incense him yet more against him. They made it their whole business to ruin David, all their thoughts were against him for evil, which put evil interpretations upon all his words.

7. That they were very restless and unwearied, they continually waited for his soul, it was the life, the precious life, they hunted for; it was his death they longed for, v. 6. They fought daily against him, (v. 1.) and would daily swallow him up, (v. 2.) and every day they wrested his words, v. 5. Their malice would not admit the least external symptoms, or the acts of hostility, but they were continually pressing at him. Such as this, is the enmity of Satan and his agents against the Kingdom of Christ and the interests of his holy religion, which if we cordially espouse, we must not think it strange to meet with such treatment as this, as though some strange thing happened to us. Our betters have been thus used; worse may be expected of us.

II. He encourages himself in God, and in his promises, power, and providence, v. 3, 4. In the midst of his complaints, and before he has said what he has to say of his enemies, he triumphs in the divine protection. 1. He resolves to make God his Confidence, then when dangers were most threatening, and all other confidences failed; "What time I am afraid, in the day of my fear, when I am most terrified from without, and most timorous within, then will I trust in thee, and thou shalt silence. Note, There are some times which are, in a special manner, times of fear with God's people; in these times, it is their duty and interest to trust in God as their God, and to know whom they have trusted. This will fix the heart, and keep it in peace. 2. He resolves to make God's promises the matter of his praises, and so we have reason to make them; (v. 3) "In God I will praise, not only his work which he has done, but his word which he has spoken; I will give him thanks for a promise, though not yet performed; in God, in his strength, and by his assistance, I will both glory in his word, and give him the glory of it." Some understand, by his word, his providences, every event that he orders and appoints; "When I speak well of God, with him I will speak well of every thing that he does." 3. Thus supported, he will bid defiance to all adverse powers; "When in God I have put my trust, I am safe, I am easy, and I will not fear what flesh can do unto me; it is but flesh, and cannot do much; nay, it can do nothing but by divine permission." As we must not trust to an arm of flesh, when it is engaged for us, so we must not be afraid of an arm of flesh when it is stretched out against us.

III. He foresees, and foretells, the full effects of those that fight against him, and of all others that think to establish themselves in and by any wicked practices; (v. 7.) Shall they escape by iniquity? They hope to escape God's judgments, as they escape men's, by violence and fraud, and the arts of injustice and treachery; but shall they escape? No, they certainly shall not; the sin of sinners will never be their security, nor will either their impudence or their hypocrisy bring them off at God's bar; God will, in his anger, cast down, and cast out, such people, Heb. ii. 6-8. "Nose derision raised so high, or settled so firmly, but that the justice of God cannot bring them down, both from their dignities, and from their confidences; Who knows the power of God's anger; how high it can reach, and how forcibly it can strike?"
12. Thy vows are upon me, O God: I will render praises unto thee. 13. For thou hast delivered my soul from death; wilt not thou deliver my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of the living?

I. That God took particular notice of all his grievances and all his griefs, v. 8. 1. Of all the inconveniences of his state; Thouittest my wanderings, my fittings, so the old translation. David was now but a young man, (under thirty,) and yet he had had many removes, from his father’s house to the court, thence to the enemies, and now driven out of everything where he had even a place to rest any where; hunted like a partridge upon the mountains; continual terrors and toils attended him; but this comforted him, that God kept a particular account of all his motions, and numbered all the weary steps he took, by night or by day. Note, God takes cognizance of all the afflictions of his people; and he does not cast out from his care and love those whom he has cast out from the comfort of the world, and where he would fain find a place, but not allowed to rest any where; (v. 2.) Put thy tears into thy bottle, to be preserved and looked upon; nay, I know they are in thy book, the book of thy remembrance. God has a bottle and a book for his people’s tears, both those for their sins, and those for their afflictions. This intimates, (1.) That he observes them with compassion and tender concern; he is afflicted in their afflictions, and knows their souls in adversity. As the blood of his saints, and their deaths, are precious in the sight of the Lord, so are their tears, not one of them shall fall to the ground. I have seen thy tears, 2 Kings 5. 1. I have heard Ephraim bemoaning himself, Jer. xxxii. 18. (2.) That he will remember them, and review them, as we do the accounts we have booked. Paul was mindful of Timothy’s tears, (2 Tim. i. 4.) and God will not forget the sorrows of his people. The tears of God’s persecuted people are bottled up, and sealed among God’s treasures; and when these books come to be opened, they will be found vials of wrath which will be poured out upon their persecutors, whom God will surely reckon with for all the tears they have forced from his people’s eyes; and they will be breasts of consolation to God’s mourners, whose sackcloth will be turned into garments of praise. God will comfort his people according to the time wherein he has afflicted them, and give to them to reap in joy, who sowed in tears. What was sown a tear, will come up a pearl.

II. That his prayers would be powerful for the defeat and discomfiture of his enemies, as well as for his own support and encouragement; (v. 9.) When I cry unto thee, then shall my enemies turn back; I need no other weapon than prayers and tears; this I know, for God is for me, to plead my cause, to protect and deliver me; and if God be for me, who can be against me so as to prevail? The sions have God for them; they may know it; and to him they must cry when they are surrounded with enemies; which, if they do in faith, they shall find a divine power exerted and engaged for them; their enemies shall be made to turn back; their spiritual enemies, against whom we fight best upon our knees, Eph. vi. 12.

III. That his faith in God would set him above the fear of man, v. 10, 11. Here he repeats, with a strong pathos, what he had said; (v. 4.) In God will I praise his word: I will firmly depend upon the promise, for the sake of him that made it, who is true and faithful, and has wisdom, power, and goodness, enough to make it good.” When we give credit to a man’s bill, we honour him that drew it; so when we do, and suffer, for God, in a dependence upon his promise, not staggering at it, we give glory to God, we praise his word, and so give praise to him. And, if ever, this has put himself out of himself, and then I will not fear what man shall do unto me; for he has no power but what he has given him from above.

IV. That he was in bonds to God; (v. 12.) Thy vows are upon me, O God; not upon me as a burden which I am loaded with, but as a badge which I glory in, as that by which I am known to be thy menial servant; not upon me as fetters that hamper me, and such (superstitions vows,) but upon me as a bridle that restrains me, and directs me in the way of duty. Thy vows are upon me, the vows I have made to thee, to which thou art not only a Witness, but a Party, and which thou hast commanded and encouraged me to make.” It is probable that he means especially these vows which he had made to God in the day of his trouble and distress, which he would retain the remembrance of, and acknowledge the obligation of, when his bright was over. Note, It ought to be the matter of our consideration and joy, that the vows of God are upon us; our baptismal vows, renewed at the Lord’s table, our occasional vows under convictions, under corruptions, by these we are bound to live to God.

V. That he should still have more and more occasion to praise him; I will render praises unto thee. This is part of the performance of his vows; for vows of thankfulness properly accompany prayers for mercy, and, when the mercy is received, must be made good. When we study what we shall render, this is the least we can resolve upon, to render praises to God. Poor returns for rich receivings! Two things he will praise God for; 1. For what he had done for him; (v. 13.) Thou hast delivered my soul, my life, from death, which was just ready to seize me. If God has delivered us from sin, either from the consideration of it by preventing grace, or from the punishment of it by prolonging mercy, we have reason to own that he has thereby delivered our souls from death, which is the wages of sin. If we, who were by nature dead in sin, are quickened together with Christ, and are made spiritually alive, we have reason to own that God has delivered our souls from death. 2. For what he would do for him; Thou hast delivered me from death, and hast given me a new life, and thereby hast given me an earnest of further mercy, that thou wilt deliver my feet from falling: thou hast done the greater, and therefore thou wilt do the lesser; thou hast begun a good work, and therefore thou wilt carry it on, and perfect it.” This may be taken either as the matter of his prayer, pleading his experience, or as the matter of his faith, raising his expectations; and this is that know how to praise in faith, will give God thanks for mercies in promise and prospect, as well as in possession. See here, (1.) What David hopes for, that God would deliver his feet from falling either into sin, which would wound his conscience, or into the appearance of sin, from which his enemies would take occasion to wound his good name.
PSALMS, LVI.

This psalm is very like that which goes next before it; it was penned upon a like occasion, when David was both in danger of trouble, and in temptation to sin; it begins as that did, Be merciful to me; the method also is the same; 1. He begins with prayer and complaint, yet not without some assurance of speedy in his request; 1. 2. He concludes with joy and praise, v. 7-11. So that hence we may take direction and encouragement, both in our supplications, and in our thanksgivings, and may offer both to God in singing this psalm.

To the chief musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David, when he fled from Saul in the cave.

1. Be merciful unto me, O God, be merciful unto me: for my soul trusteth in thee: yea, in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast. 2. I will cry unto God most high; unto God that performeth all things for me. 3. He shall send from heaven, and save me from the reproach of him that would swallow me up. Selah. God shall send forth his mercy and his truth. 4. My soul is among lions; and I lie even among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword. 5. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; let thy glory be above all the earth. 6. They have prepared a net for my steps; my soul is bowed down: they have digged a pit before me, into the midst whereof they are fallen themselves. Selah.

The title of this psalm has one word new in it, Al-taschith—Destroy not. Some make it to be only some known tune to which this psalm was set, others apply it to the occasion and matter of the psalm; Destroy not; that is, David would not let Saul be destroyed, when now in the cave there was a fair opportunity of doing it, and his servants would fain have done it; No, says David, destroy him not, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4, 6. Or rather, God would not let David be destroyed by Saul; he suffered him to per-

3. That all his expectation is from God; (v. 3.) He shall send from heaven, and save me. They that make God their only Refuge, and fly to him by faith and prayer, may be sure of salvation, in his way and his time, and according to his will. Whatever he expects the salvation; from heaven. Look which way he will, on this earth, refuge fails, no help appears: but he looks for it from heaven; that they lift up their hearts to things above, may from thence expect all good. (2.) What the salvation is that he expects; he trusts that God will save him from the reproach of those that would swallow him up, that aimed to ruin him, and, in the mean time, did all they could to vex him. Some read it, He shall send from heaven to save me, for he designed in himself to shame that would swallow me up; he has disappointed their designs against me hitherto, and therefore he will perfect my deliverance. (3.) What he will ascribe his salvation to; God shall send forth his mercy and truth. God is good in himself, and faithful to every word that he has spoken, and so he makes it appear when he works deliverance for his people. We need no more to make us happy, than to have the benefit of the mercy and truth of God, xxv. 10.

11. He represents the power and malignity of his enemies; (v. 4.) My soul is among lions; so fierce and furious was Saul, and those about him, against David, that he might have been as safe in a den of lions, as among such men, who were continually roaring against him, and ready to make a prey of him. They are set on fire, and breathe nothing but flame; they set on fire the course of nature, infusing one another against David, and they were themselves set on fire of hell, Jam. iii. 6. They were sons of men, from whom one might have expected something of the reason and compulsion of a man; but they were beasts of prey in the shape of men; their teeth, which they grasped upon him, and with which they hoped to tear him to pieces, and to eat him up, were spears and arrows fitted for mischief and murders; and their tongue, with which they cursed him, and wounded his reputation, was as a sharp sword to cut and kill; see xlii. 10. A spiteful tongue is a dangerous weapon, wherewith Satan's instruments fight against God's people. He describes their malicious projects against him, (v. 6.) and shows the issue of them; They have prepared a net for my steps, in which to take me, that I might not again escape out of their hands; they have digged a pit before me, that I might, ere I was aware, run headlong into it. See the policies of the church's enemies; see the pains they take to do mischief. But let us see what comes of it. 1. It is indeed some disturbance to David; My soul is bowed down. It made him droop, and hung the head, to think that there should be those that bore him so much ill-will. But, 2. It was destruction to themselves; they digged a pit for David, into the midst whereof they are fallen. The more they digged against David, returned it against them, and swallowed them that were the authors of their counsels; then when Saul was pursuing David, the Philistines were invading him; nay, in the cave, when Saul thought David should fall into his hands, he fell into the hands of David, and lay at his mercy.

III. He prays to God to glorify himself and his own great name; (v. 5.) Whatever comes of me and my interest, be thou exalted, O God, above all heavens, be thou praised by the holy angels, the four creatures, the seraphim, and the cherubim; and let thy glory be above, or over all the earth, let all the inhabitants of this earth be brought to know and praise thee. Thus God's glory should lie nearer our hearts, and we should be more concerned for it, than for any particular interests of our own. When David was in the greatest distress and dis-
3. How he pleases himself, and (as I may say) even prides himself, in the work of praise; so far is he from being ashamed to own his obligations to God, and dependence upon him, that he resolves to praise him among the people, and to sing unto him among the nations, v. 9. This intimates, (1.) That his own heart was much affected and enlarged in praising God; he would even make the earth ring with his sacred songs, that all might take notice how much the heavens and the earth are filled with the glory of God; (2.) That he desired to bring others in to join with him in praising God; he will publish God's praises among the people, that the knowledge and fear and love of God might be spread, and the ends of the earth might see his salvation. When David was driven out into heathen lands, he would not only not worship their gods, but he would openly avow his veneration for the God of Israel, would take his religion along with him, and ever he went, would endeavour to bring others in love with it, and leave the sweet savour of it behind him. David, in his psalms, which fill the universal church, and will to the end of time, may be said to be still praising God among the people, and singing to him among the nations; for all good people make use of his words in praising God. Thus St. John, in his writings, is said to prophesy again before many people, Rev. x. 4.

4. He begins his prayer with matter for praise, v. 10. That which was the matter of his hope and comfort, (God shall send forth his mercy and his truth, v. 3.) is here the matter of his thanksgiving. Thy mercy is great unto the heavens, great beyond conception and expression; and thy truth unto the clouds, great beyond discovery, for what eye can reach that which is wrapped up in the clouds? God's mercy and truth reach to the heavens, for they will fill all the earth as a sea will spread and fill all the sea; and God will raise in their hearts and build their hopes upon them. God's mercy and truth are praised even to the heavens, that is, by all the bright and blessed inhabitants of the upper world, who are continually exalting God's praises to the highest, while David on earth is endeavouring to spread his praises to the furthest, v. 9.

5. How he leaves it at last to God to glorify his own name; (v. 11.) Be thou exalted, O God. The same words which he had used, (v. 3.) to sum up his prayers in, he here uses again, (and no vain repetition,) to sum up his praises in; "Lord, I desire to exalt thy name, and that all the creatures may exalt it; but what can the best of us do towards it? Lord, take the work into thine own hands; do thyself, be thou exalted, O God. In the praises of the church triumphant, thou art exalted to the heavens, and in the praises of the church militant, thy glory is throughout all the earth; but thou art above all the blessing and praise of both, (Neh. ix. 5.) and therefore, Lord, exalt thyself above the heavens, and above all the earth: Father, glorify thine own name: Thou hast glorified it, glorify it yet again."

PSALM LVIII.

It is the probable conjunction of some (amraulous particularly,) that before Saul began to persecute David by force of arms, he would beben to humble him, he formed a process against him by course of law, upon which he was condemned, unheard, and attained as a traitor by the great council, or supreme court of judicature, and was to be put out of the land an outlawed wolf, whom any man might kill, and no man might protect. The elders, in order to curry favour with Saul, having passed this bill of attainder, it is supposed that David penned this psalm on the occasion. He describes their sin, and aggravates that; v. 1. 2. He imprecates and foretell their ruin, and the judgments which the righteous God would bring upon them for their injustice, v. 6. 9. Which would redound, 1. To the comfort of the saints, v. 10. 2. To the glory of God, v. 11. Sin appears here both exceeding sinful and exceeding dangerous, and God a just Avenger of wrong, with which we should be affected in singing this psalm.

To the chief musician, Al-taschith, Michamh of Da· vid.

1. Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation? do ye judge uprightly

O ye sons of men? 2. Yea, in heart you work wickedness; you weigh the violence of your hands in the earth. 3. The wicked are estranged from the womb; they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies. 4. Their poison is like the poison of a serpent; they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; 5. Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely.

We have reason to think that this psalm refers to the malice of Saul and his janizaries against David, because it bears the same inscription (Al-taschith, and Michamch of David) with that which goes before and that which follows, both which appear, by the title, to have been penned with reference to that persecution through which God preserved him, (Al-taschith David's purpose,) and therefore the psalms he then penned were precious to him, Michamch, David's jewel, as Dr. Hammond translates it.

In these verses, David, not as a king, for he was not yet come to the throne, but as a prophet, in God's name arraigns and convicts his judges, with more authority and justice than they showed in prosecuting him. Two things he charges them with; 1. The corruption of their government. They were a congregation, a bench of justices, nay, perhaps, a congress or convention of the states, from whence one might have expected fair dealing, for they were men learned in the laws, had been brought up in the study of these statutes and judgments, which were so righteous, that those of other nations were not to be compared with them. One would not have thought a congregation of such could be bribed and biased with pensions, and yet, it seems, they were, because the son of Kish could do that for which the king of Judah was reproved by God; xxii. 7. He had vineyards, and fields, and preferments, to give them, and therefore, to please him, they would do any thing, right or wrong. Of all the melancholy views which Solomon took of this earth and its grievances, nothing vexed him so much as to see, that, in the place of judgment, wickedness was there, Eccl. iii. 16. So it was in Saul's time.

1. The judges would not do right, would not protect or vindicate oppressed innocence; (v. 1.) "Do ye indeed speak righteousness, or judge uprightly? No, you are far from it, your own consciences cannot but tell you that you do not discharge the trust reposed in you as magistrates, by which you are obliged to be a terror to evil-doers, and a praise to them that do well. Is this the justice you pretend to administer? Is this the patronage, this the countenance, which an honest man, and an honest cause, can expect? Are your hands raised up to God against men, mortal and dying, and that you stand upon the same level, before God, with the meanest of these you trample upon, and must yourselves be called to an account and judged. You are sons of men, and therefore we may appeal to yourselves, and to that law of nature which is written in every man's heart, Do ye indeed speak righteousness? And will not your second thoughts correct what you have done?" Note, It is good for us often to reflect upon what we say, with this serious question, Do we indeed speak righteousness? that we may unsay what we have spoken amiss, and may proceed no further in it.

2. They did a great deal of wrong; they used their power for the support of injury and oppression; (v. 5.) In heart you work wickedness. It intimates that they wrought with a great deal of plot and management, not by surprise; but with premeditation, and with a view of constituting both it, and resolution it. The more there is of the heart, in any act of wickedness, the worse it is, Eccl. viii. 11. And what was their wickedness? It follows, "You weigh the violence of your hands in the earth," (or in the land,) "the peace of which you are appointed to be the conservators of." They did all the violence and injury they could, either to enrich, or avenge, themselves, and they weighed it, the way they did it, not with a growl of craft and caution; "You frame it by rule and lines," (so the word signifies,) "that it may effectually answer your mischievous intentions; such masters are you of the art of oppression." (2.) They did it under colour of justice. "They held the balances (the emblem of justice) in their hands, as if they designed to do right, and right is expected from them, but the result is violence and oppression, which are perfectly gross, effectually from hand to heart, and being practised under the pretext of law and right.

II. The corruption of their nature. This was the root of bitterness from which that gall and wormwood sprang; (v. 3.) The wicked, who, in heart, work wickedness, are estranged from the womb, estranged from God and all good, alienated from the divine life, and its principles, powers, and pleasures, Eph. iv. 18. A sinful state is a state of estrangement from the acquaintance with God, and service of him, which we were made for. Let none wonder that these wicked men dare do such things, for wickedness is bred in the bone with them, they brought it into the world with them, they have in their natures a strong inclination to it, they learned it from their wicked parents, and have been trained up in it by a bad education; they are called, and not miscalled, transgressors from the womb, one can therefore expect no other than that they will deal very treacherously; see Isa. xlviii. 8. They go astray from God and their duty as soon as they be born, as soon as possibly they can; the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts, appears with the first operations of reason; as the wheat springs up, the tares spring up with it. Three instances are here given of the corruption of nature.

1. Falsehood. They soon learn to speak lies, and bend their tongues, like their brows, for that purpose, Jer. ix. 3. How soon will little children tell a lie, to excuse a fault, or in their own commendation! No sooner can they speak than they speak to God's dishonour; tongue-sins are some of the first of our actual transgressions.

2. Malice. Their poison (their ill-will, and the spite they bore to goodness and all good men, particularly to David) was like the poison of a serpent, invisible, venomous, and very mischiefous, from which their malice and rage derived. We pity a dog that is poisoned by accident, but hate a serpent that is poisonous by nature. Such was the cursed enmity in the serpent's brood, against the Lord and his anointed.

3. Untractableness. They are malicious, and nothing will work upon them, no reason, no kind-ness, to mollify them, and bring them to a better temper. Their teeth are like teeth of a lion, and their ears like the ears of a bear, v. 4, 5. The psalmist, having compared these wicked men, whom he here complains of, to serpents, for their poisonous malice, takes occasion thence, upon another account, to compare them to the deaf adder or viper, concerning which there was then this vulgar tradition, that, whereas by music, or some other art, they had a way of charm-ing serpents, so as either to destroy them, or, at least, disable them to do mischief, this deaf adder would lay one ear to the ground, and step the other with her tail, so that she could not hear the voice of the enchantment, and so defeated the intention of it, and secured herself. The using of this combination need not vitiate the story, nor, if it were true, justify the use of this enchantment; for it is only an illusion to the report of such a thing, to illustrate the obstinacy of sinners in a sinful way. God's design, in his word and providence, is, to cure serpents of their malignity; to this end, how wise, how powerful, how well-chosen, are the charms! How restless the right words? But all in vain, with most men; and what is the reason? It is, they are hard-hearted they will not hearken. None so bad as those that will not hear; we have piped unto men, and they have not danced; how should they, when they have stopped their ears?

6. Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth; break out the great teeth of the young lions, O Lord. 7. Let them melt away as waters which run continually: when he bendeth his bow to shoot his arrows, let them be as cut in pieces. 8. As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away; like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun. 9. Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath. 10. The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance: he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked. 11. So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

In these verses, we have,

1. David's prayers against his enemies, and all such enemies of God's church and people; for it is as enemies of the latter that he looks upon them, so that he was actuated by a public spirit, in praying against them, and not by any private revenge.

2. He prays that they might be disabled to do any further mischief; (v. 6.) Break their teeth, O God. Not so much that they might not feel themselves, as that they might not be able to make prey of others, iii. 7. He does not say, "Break their necks," (no, let them live to repent, slay them not, lest my people forget,) but, "Break their teeth, for they are lions, they are young lions, that live by rapine."

3. That they might be disappointed in the plots they had already laid, and might not gain their point. "Then he bendeth his bow, and takes aim to shoot his arrows at the upright in heart, let them be as cut in pieces, v. 7. Let them fall at his feet, and never come near the mark."

4. That they and their interest might waste and come to nothing; that they might melt away as waters that run continually, as the waters of a land-flood, which, though they seem formidable for a while, soon soak into the ground, or return to their channels; or, in general, as water is still on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again, but gradually dries away, and disappears. Such shall the floods of ungodly men be, which sometimes make us afraid; (xviii. 4.) so shall the proud waters be reduced, which threaten to go over our soul, cxxiv. 4, 5. Let us by faith then see what they
11. His prediction of their ruin; (v. 9.) "Before your pots can feel the heat of a fire of thorns made under them, which they will presently do, for it is a quick fire, and violent while it lasts, so speedily, with such a hasty and violent flame, God shall hurry them away, as terribly and irresistibly as with a whirlwind, as it were alive, as it were in fury." The proverbial expressions are somewhat difficult, but the sense is plain; 1. That the judgments of God often surprise wicked people in the midst of their jollity, and hurry them away of a sudden. When they are beginning to walk in the light of their own fire, and the sparks of their own kindling, they are made to lie down in sorrow; (Isa. l. 11.) and their laughter proves like the crackling of thorns under a pot, the comfort of which is soon gone, here they can say, Alas, I am warm, Eccl. vii. 6. 2. That there is no standing before the destruction of God; that the Almighty never knows the power of God's anger? When God will take sinners away dead or alive, they cannot contest with him; The wicked are driven away in their wickedness.

Now there are two things which the psalmist promises himself as the good effects of sinners' destruction.

1. That saints would be encouraged and comforted by it; (v. 10.) The righteous shall rejoice, when he sees the vengeance; the pomp and power, the prosperity and success, of the wicked, is a discouragement to the righteous; they sunder their hearts, and weaken their hands, and are sometimes a strong temptation to them to question their foundations, lxiii. 2, 13. But, when they see the judgments of God hurrying them away, and just vengeance taken on them for all the mischief they have done to the people of God, they rejoice in the satisfaction thereby given to their doubts, and the confirmation thereby given to their faith in the providence of God, and his justice and righteousness in governing of the world; they shall rejoice in the victory thus gained over that temptation, by seeing their end, lxiii. 17. He shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked; there shall be abundance of blood shed; (lxviii. 23.) and it shall be as great a refreshment to the saints, to see God glorified in the ruin of sinners, as it is to a weary traveller to have his feet washed. It shall likewise contribute to their satisfaction; the sight of the vengeance shall make them tremble before God, (cxix. 120.) and shall convince them of the evil of sin, and the obligations they lie under to that God who pleads their cause, and will suffer no man to do them wrong, and go unpunished for it. The joy of the saints, in the destruction of the wicked, is then a holy joy, and justifiable, when it helps to make them holy, and to purify them from sin.

2. That sinners would be convinced and convinced by it, v. 11. The vengeance God sometimes takes on the wicked in this world, will bring men to say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous. Any man may draw this inference from such providences, and many a man shall, who, before, denied even these plain truths, or doubted of them. Some shall have this confession extorted from them, others shall have their minds so changed, that they shall willingly own it, and thank God, who has given them to see it, and see it with satisfaction, That God is just and righteous, That he is (1.) The judgment of his servants and saints; Verily, (however it be, so it may be read,) there is a fruit to the righteous; whatever damage a man may sustain, whatever hazard he may run, and whatever hardship he may undergo for his religion, he shall not only be no loser by it, but an unspeakable gainer, in the issue. Even in this world there is a reward for the righteous, they shall be recompensed in the earth. They shall be taken notice of, honoured, and protected, that seemed slighted, despised, and abandoned.

(2.) That he is the righteous Governor of the world, and will surely reckon with the enemies of his kingdom; verily, however it be, though wicked people prosper and bid defiance to Divine Justice, yet it shall be made to appear, to their confusion, that the world is not governed by chance, but by a Being of infinite wisdom and justice; there is a God to the earth, though he has prepared his throne in the heavens. He deals in all the affairs of the children of men, and directs and disposes them according to the counsel of his will, to his own glory; and he will punish the wicked, not only in the world to come, but in the earth, where they have laid up their treasure, and promised themselves a happiness; in the earth, that the Lord may be known by the judgments which he shall execute among the earth, that they may be taken as exceptions of a judgment to come. He is a God, (so we read,) not a weak man, nor an angel, nor a mere name, not (as the atheists suggest) a creature of men's fear and fancy, nor a deified hero, not the sun and moon, as idolaters imagined; but a God, a self-existent, perfect, Being; he it is that judges the earth; his favour therefore let us seek, from whom every man's judgment proceeds, and to him let all judgment be referred.

PSALMS LIX.

This psalm is of the same nature and scope with six or seven foregoing psalms; they are all filled with David's complaints of the malice of his enemies, and of their cursed and cruel designs against him; his prayers and prophecies against them; and his comfort and confidence in God as his God. The first is the language of nature, and may be allowed; the second of a prophetic spirit, looking forward to Christ and the enemies of his kingdom, and therefore not to be drawn by a precedent; the third of grace and a most holy faith, which is to be imitated by every one of us. In this psalm, 5. He prays to God to defend and deliver him from his enemies, representing them as very bad men, barbarous, malicious, and desirous of his destruction. He reserves and foretells the destruction of his enemies, which he would give to God the glory of, v. 8, 17. As far as it appears that any of the particular enemies of God's people fall into the hands of the psalmist, we should read this psalm, read their doom, and foresee their ruin.

To the chief musician, At-taschith, Michamit of David; when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him.

1. D ELIVER me from mine enemies, O my God: defend me from them that rise up against me. 2. Deliver me from the workers of iniquity, and save me from bloody men. 3. For, lo, they lie in wait for my soul; the mighty are gathered against me; not for my transgression, nor for my sin, 0 Lord. 4. They run and prepare themselves without my fault: awake to help me, and behold. 5. Thou, therefore, 0 Lord God of hosts, the God of Israel, awake to visit all the heathen: be not merciful to any wicked transgressors. Selah.

They return at evening: they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city. 7. Behold, they belch out with their mouth: swords are in their lips; for who, say they, doth hear?

The title of this psalm acquaints us particularly with the occasion on which it was penned; it was when Saul sent a party of his guards to beset David's house in the night, that they might seize him and kill him; we have the story, 1 Sam. xix. 11. It was when his hostilities against David were newly begun, and he had but just before narrowly escaped Saul's javelin. These first eruptions of Saul's malice could not but put David into disorder, and be both grievous and terrifying, and yet he kept up his communion with God, and such a composure of mind, so that he was never out of frame for prayer and praises; happy was he whose intercourse with him was not interrupted or broken in upon by their cares, or griefs, or fears, or any of the hurries (whether outward or inward) of an afflicted state.

In these verses,

1. David prays to be delivered out of the hands of his enemies, and that their cruel designs against him might be defeated; (v. 1, 2) "Deliver me from mine enemies, 0 my God; thou art God, and canst deliver me; my God, under whose protection I live, and thou hast promised me to be a God all-sufficient, and therefore, in honour and faithfulness, thou wilt deliver me. Set me on high out of the reach of the power and malice of them that rise up against me, and above the fear of it. Let me be safe, and see myself so, safe and easy, safe and satisfied. Oh deliver me, and save me!"

He cries out as one ready to perish, and that had his eye to God only for salvation and deliverance. He descants upon the excellency of his case, and how God had promised him to be a sufficient God, and therefore he appeals to his name, and his character, and his promise, and God's past dealings with him, that will deliver him. Thus the disciples, in the storm, awoke Christ, saying, Master, save us, we perish. And thus earnestly should we pray daily, to be defended and delivered from our spiritual enemies, the temptations of Satan, and the corruptions of our own hearts, which war against our spiritual life.

2. He prays for deliverance. Our God gives us leave, not only to pray, but to plead with him, to order our cause before him, and to fill our mouth with arguments; not to move him, but to move ourselves; David does so here.

1. He pleads the bad character of his enemies; they are workers of iniquity, and therefore not only his enemies, but God's enemies; they are bloody men, and therefore not only his enemies, but enemies to all mankind; "Lest, let not the workers of iniquity prevail against one that is a worker of righteousness; nor bloody men against a merciful man."

2. He pleads their malice against him, and the imminent danger he was in from them; (v. 3) "Their spite is great, they aim at my soul, my life, my better part; they are subtle and very politic, they lie in wait, taking an opportunity to do me a mischief; they are all mighty, men of honour, and get their unlawful ends, and interest in court and country; they are in a confederacy, they are united by league, and actually gathered together against me; combined both in consultation and action. They are very ingenious in their contrivances, and very industrious in their attempts. The French, in the beginning of their invasion, prepared themselves, with the utmost speed and fury, to do me a mischief."

He takes particular notice of the brutish carriage of the messengers that Saul sent to take him; (v. 6) "They return at evening from the posts assigned them in the day, to apply them selves to their works of darkness, (their night-work, which may well be their day-shame,) and then they make a noise like a hound in pursuit of the lamb."

Thus did David's enemies, when they came to take him, raise an out-cry against him as a rebel, a traitor, a man not fit to live; with this clamour they went round about the city, to bring a bad reputation upon David, if possible, to set the mob against him, at least, to prevent their being incensed against them, which otherwise they had reason to fear they would be, so much was David their darling. Thus the persecutors of our Lord Jesus, who are compared to dogs, (xxii. 16.) ran him down with noise, for else they could not have taken him, at least, not on the feast-day, for there would have been an uproar among the people. They belch out with their mouth the malice that boils in their hearts, v. 7. Swords are in their lips; reproaches that wound my heart with grief, (xlii. 10.) and slanderers that stab my reputation. They were continually suggesting that which would, and what, Saul's sword against him, and David's false accusations. The sword, perhaps, may be intended in Saul's hand, if it had not been first in their lips.

3. He pleads his own innocence, not as to God, he was never backward to own himself guilty before him, but as to his persecutors; what they charged him with was utterly false, nor had he ever said or done any thing to deserve such treatment from them; (v. 5.) Not for my transgression, nor for mine iniquity, is this the cause of my distress, nor is this the cause of this people's destruction, or these things." And again, (v. 4.) without my fault. Note, (1.) The innocence of the godly will not secure them from the malignity of the wicked. Those that are harmless, like doves, yet, for Christ's sake, are hated of all men, as if they were noisier than serpents, and obnoxious accordingly. (2.) Though our innocence will not secure us from troubles, yet it will greatly support and comfort us under our troubles; our own testimony of our conscience for us, that we have behaved ourselves justly, so that these that behave themselves ill toward us, will be very much our rejoicing in the day of evil. (3.) If we are conscious to ourselves of our innocence, we may with humble confidence appeal to God, and beg of him to plead our injured cause, which he will do in due time.

4. He pleads that his enemies were profane and atheistical, and bolstered themselves up in their enmity to David, with the counsel of God; For who (say they) doth hear? v. 7. Not God himself, x. 11.—xxiv. 7. Note, It is not strange, if these regard not what they say, who have made themselves believe that God regards not what they say.

III. He refers himself and his cause to the just judgment of God, v. 5. "The Lord, the Judge, be Judge between me and my persecutors!" In this appeal to God, he has an eye to him as the Lord of hosts, who is the power to judge, head of all creatures, even hosts of angels, at his command; he views him also as the God of Israel, to whom he was, in a peculiar manner, King and Judge, not doubting that he would appear on the behalf of these that were upright, that were Israelites indeed. When Saul's hosts persecuted him, he had recourse to God as the Lord of all hosts; when these maligned him, whose spirit were strangers to the northward of Israel, he had recourse to him as the God of Israel. He desires, that is, he is very sure, that God will awake to visit all the nations, will make an early and exact inquiry into the controversies and quarrels that are among the children of men; there will be a day of visitation, (Isa. x. 3.) and to that day David refers himself, with this solemn appeal, Be not merciful to any wicked transgressors; Selah; Mark that. 1. If David had been conscious to himself that he was a wicked transgressor, he would not have expected to find mercy; but as to his enemies, he could say he was no transgressor at all; (v. 3, 4.) "Not for my transgression, and therefore thou wilt appear for me." As to God, he could say he was no wicked transgressor; for, though he had transgressed, he was a penitent transgressor, and did not obstinately persist in what he had done amiss. 2. He knew his enemies were wicked transgressors, wilful, malicious, and hardened, in their transgressions, both against God and man, and therefore he uses for justice against them; judgment without mercy. Let not those expect to find mercy, who never showed mercy, for such are wicked transgressors.

8. But thou, O Lord, shalt laugh at them; thou shalt have all the heathen in derision. 9. Because of his strength will I wait upon thee: for God is my defence. 10. The God of my mercy shall prevent me: God shall let me see my desire upon mine enemies. 11. Slay them not, lest my people forget: scatter them by thy power; and bring them down, O Lord our shield. 12. For the sin of their mouth, and the words of their lips, let them even be taken in their pride; and for cursing and lying which they speak. 13. Consume them in wrath, consume them, that they may not be; and let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth. Selah. 14. And at evening let them return, and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city. 15. Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge, if they be not satisfied. 16. But I will sing of thy power; yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning: for thou hast been my defence and refuge in the day of my trouble. 17. Unto thee, O my strength, I will sing: for God is my defence, and the God of my mercy.

David here encourages himself, in reference to the threatening power of his enemies, with a pious resolution to wait upon God, and a believing expectation that he should yet praise him.

1. He resolves to wait upon God; (v. 9.) "Because of his strength," (either the strength of his enemies, the fear of which drove him to God, or because of God's strength, the hope of which drew him to God,) "will I wait upon thee, with a believing dependence upon thee, and confidence in thee." It is our wisdom and duty, in times of danger and difficulty, to wait upon God; for he is our Defence, our High-Place, in whom we shall be safe. He hopes

1. That God will be to him a God of mercy; (v. 10.) "The God of my mercy shall prevent me with the blessings of his goodness, and the gifts of his mercy; prevent my fears, prevent my prayers, and be better to me than my own expectations." It is very comfortable to us, in prayer, to eye God, not only as the God of mercy, but as the God of our mercy, the Author of all good in us, and the Giver of all good to us. Whatever mercy there is in God, it is laid up for us, and is ready to be laid out upon us. Justly does the psalmist call God's mercy his mercy, for all the blessings of the new covenant are called the sure mercies of David; (Isa. iv. 3.) and they are especial with him, because he was so merciful.

2. That he will be to his persecutors a God of vengeance. His expectation of this he expresses partly by way of prediction, and partly by way of petition, which come all to one; for his prayer that it might be so, amounts to a prophecy that it shall be so. Here are several things which he foretells concerning his enemies, or observers, that sought occasions against him, and opportunity to do him a mischief; in all which he should see his desire, not a passionate or revengeful desire, but a believing desire, upon them, v. 10. (1.) He foresees that God would expose them to scorn, as they had indeed made themselves ridiculous; (v. 8.) "They think God does not hear them, does not heed them; but thou, O Lord, shalt laugh at them for their folly, to think that he who planted the car, shall not hear, and thou shalt have not them only for sinners, but other such henchmen people that live without God in the earth;" (v. 8.) Note, Atheists and persecutors are worthy to be laughed at, and had in derision. See Ps. ii. Prov. i. 26. Isa. xxxvii. 22.

(2.) That God would make them standing monuments of his justice; (v. 11.) Slay them not; let them not be killed outright, lest my people forget. If the execution be soon done, the impressions of it will not be deep, and therefore will not be durable, but will quickly pass away, and be forgotten. Those men for the present, but they are soon forgotten; for which reason he prays that this might be gradual, "Scatter them by thy power, and let them carry about with them, in their wanderings, such tokens of God's displeasure as may spread the notice of their punishment to all parts of the country." Thus Cain himself, though a murderer, was not slain, lest the vengeance should be forgotten, but was sentenced to be a fugitive and a vagabond. Note, When we think God's judgments come slowly upon sinners, we must conclude that God has wise and holy ends in the gradual proceedings of his wrath. "So scatter them, as that they may never again unite to do mischief, bring them down, O Lord, our Shield." If God has undertaken the protection of his people as their Shield, he will, doubtless, humble and absolve all those that fight against them out.

(3.) That they might be dealt with according to their deserts; (v. 12.) For the sin of their mouth, even for the words of their lips; (for every word they speak his sin in it,) let them for this be taken in their pride, even for their cursing others, and themselves, (a sin Saul was subject to, 1 Sam. xiv. 28, 44.) and lying. Note, [1.] There is a great deal of malignity in tongue-sins, more than is commonly thought of. [2.] Cursing, and lying, and speaking proudly, are some of the worst of the sins of the tongue; and that man is truly miserable whom God deals with according to the deserts of these, making his own tongue to fall on him.

(4.) That God would glorify himself, as Israel's God and King, in their destruction; (v. 13.) "Consume them in wrath, consume them; follow them with one judgment after another, till they be utterly ruined, let them be insensible, but gradually, wasted that they themselves, while they are in the consuming, may know, and that the standers-by may likewise draw this inference from it, That God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth." Saul and his party think to rule and carry all before. them, but they shall be made to know that there is a Higher than they; that there is one who does not see the good for evil. The design of God's judgments is to convince men that the Lord reigns, that he fulfils his own counsels, gives law to all the creatures, and disposes all things to his own glory, so that the greatest of men are under his check, and he makes what use he pleases of them. He rules in Jacob, for there he keeps his court, there he is known, and his name is great; but he rules to the end of the earth; for all nations are without the stories of his kingdom. He is the king of the ends of the earth, even over those that know him not, but he rules for Jacob; so it may be read; he has an eye to the good of his church in the government of the world; the administrations of that government, even to the ends of the earth, are for Jacob his servant's sake, and for Israel's his elect, Isa. xiv. 4.

(5.) That he would make their sin their punishment; (v. 14.) and v. 6. Their sin was, hunting for David, to make a prey of him; their punishment should be, that they should be reduced to such extreme poverty, that they should hunt about for meat to satisfy their hunger, and should miss of it, as they missed of David. Thus they should be, not cut off at once, but scattered, (v. 11.) and gradually consumed; (v. 15.) they that die by famine die by inches, and feel themselves die, Lam. iv. 9. He foretells, that they should hunger and thirst. To beg their bread from door to door. [1.] That they should do it with the greatest regret and reluctancy imaginable; to beg they are ashamed, (which makes it the greater punishment to them,) and therefore they do it at evening, when it begins to be dark, that they may not be seen; at the time when other beasts of prey creep forth, civ. 20. [2.] That yet they should be very clamorous and loud in their complaints, which would proceed from a great indignation at their condition, which they cannot in the least degree reconcile themselves to; They shall make a noise like a dog. When they were in quest of David, they made a noise like an angry dog snarling and barking; now, when they are in quest of meat, they shall make a noise like an hungry dog howling and wailing. Those that repent of their sins, mourn, when in trouble, like doves; those whose hearts are hardened, make a noise, when in trouble, like dogs; Prov. vi. 27. and seek for the face of the Lord, See Hos. vii. 14. They have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled in their beds for corn and wine. [3.] That they should meet with little relief, but the hearts of people should be very much hardened toward them; so that they should go round about the city, and wander up and down for meat, (v. 15.) and should get nothing but by dint of importunity, according to our marginal reading, If they be not satisfied, they will cry with a loud voice, that what people do give them is not with good-will, but only to be rid of them, lest by their continual coming they weary them. [4.] That they should be instable, which is the greatest misery of all in a poor condition; They are err'dly dogs which can never have enough, (Isa. lvi. 11.) and they grudge if they be not satisfied. A contentious man, if he has not what he would have, yet does not grudge, does not quarrel with Providence, but desires more; so, if that what God is their belly, if that be not filled, and its appetites gratified, fall out both with God and themselves. It is not poverty, but discontent, that makes a man unhappy.

II. He expects to praise God; that God's providence would find him matter for praise, and that God's grace would work in him a heart for praise, v. 16, 17. Observe, v. 1. What he would praise God for. (1.) He would praise his power and his mercy, both should be the subject matter of his song. Power, without mercy, is to be feared; with power, without power, is not what a man can expect much benefit from; but God's power, by which he is able to help us, and his mercy, by which he is inclined to help us, will justly be the everlasting praise of all the saints. (2.) He would praise him, because he had, many a time, and all along, found him his Defence, and his Refuge, in the day of trouble. God brings his people into trouble, that they may experience his power; and, having mercy in protection, and after in punishment, may have occasion to praise him. (3.) He would praise him, because he had still a dependence upon him, and a confidence in him, as his Strength to support him and carry him on in his duty, his Defence to keep him safe from evil, and the God of his mercy to make him happy and easy. He that is all this to us, is certainly worthy of our best affections, praises, and services.

2. How he would praise God. (1.) He would sing. As that is a natural expression of joy, so it is an instituted ordinance for the exerting and exciting of holy joy and thankfulness. (2.) He would sing aloud, as one much affected with the glory of God, that was not ashamed to own it, and that desired to affect others with it. He will sing of God's power, but he will sing aloud of his mercy; the consideration of that raises his affections more than anything else. (3.) He would sing aloud in the morning; When his privy was written to be made void, then was God's compassion anew every morning, and therefore it is fit to begin the day with his praises. (4.) He would sing unto God, (v. 17.) to his honour and glory, and with him in his eye. As we must direct our prayers to God, so to him we must direct our praises, and must look up, making melody to the Lord.

PSALM LX.

After many psalms which David penned in a day of distress, this comes, which was calculated for a day of triumph; it was penned after he was settled in the throne upon occasion of an illustrious victory which God blessed his forces with over the Syrians and Edomites; it was when David was in the zenith of his prosperity, and the affairs of his kingdom seem to have been in a better posture than ever they were either before or after. See 2 Sam. viii. 3, 15. 1 Chron. xviii. 3, 12. David, in prosperity, was a devout and loyal subject of God in this psalm, I. He reflects upon the bad state of the public interests, for many years, in which God had been contending with them, v. 1-5. II. He takes notice of the happy issue of things, which he expects, and prays for the deliverance of God's Israel from their enemies, v. 5-11. III. He triumphs in hope of their victories over their enemies, and begun to God to carry them on and complete them, v. 6-12. In singing this psalm, we may have an eye both to the acts of the church, and to the state of our own souls, both which have their struggles.

To the chief musician upon Shushan-eduth, Micham of David, to teach; when he strove with Aram-naharaim and with Aram-zobah, when Job returned and smote of Edom in the valley of Salt twelve thousand.

1. 0 GOD, thou hast cast us off, thou hast scattered us, thou hast been displeased; O turn thyself to us again. 2. Thou hast made the earth to tremble; thou hast broken it; heal the breaches thereof; for it shaketh. 3. Thou hast shown thy people hard things; thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment. 4. Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth. Selah. 5. That thy beloved may be delivered, save with thy right hand, and hear me.

The title gives us an account, 1. Of the general design of the psalm; it is Michtam—David's jewel, and it is to teach. The Levites must teach it to the people, and by it teach them both to trust in God, and to triumph in him; we must in it teach ourselves and one another. In a day of public rejoicing, we have need to be taught to do this joy of the Lord, and to terminate it in him, to give none of that praise to the meanest of our deliverances which is due to him only, and to encourage our hopes with our joys. 2. Of the particular occasion of it: It was at a time, (1.) When he was at war with the Syrians, and still had a conflict with them, both those of Mesopotamia, and those of Zobah. (2.) When he had gained a great victory over the Edomites, by his forces under the command of Joab, who had left 12,000 of the enemy dead upon the spot. He had an eye to both these concerns, in this psalm: he is in care about his strife with the Assyrians, and, in reference to that, he prays; he is rejoicing in his success against the Edomites, and, in reference to that, he triumphs with a holy confidence in God, that he would complete the victory. We have our cares, at the same time that we have our joys, and they may serve for a balance to each other, that neither may exceed. They may likewise furnish us with matter both for prayer and praise, for both must be laid, before God with suitable affections and devotions. If one point be gained, yet in another we are still striving; the Edomites are vanquished, but the Syrians are not; therefore let not him that girds on the harness, boast as if he had put it off.

In these verses, which begin the psalm, we have, 1. A melancholy memorial of the many disgraces and disappointments which God had, for some years past, put the people under. During the reign of Saul, especially in the latter end of it, and during David's struggle with the House of Saul, while he reigned over Judah only, the affairs of the kingdom were much perplexed, and the neighbouring nations were vexatious to them. 1. He complains of hard things which they had seen, which they had suffered, (v. 3.) while the Philistines and other ill-disposed neighbours took all advantages against them. God sometimes shows even his own people hard things in this world, that they may be refined by their trials. God may yield us grace in that case in him only. He owns God's displeasure to be the cause of all the hardships they had undergone; "Thou hast been displeased by us, displeased against us, (v. 1.) and in thy displeasure hast cast us off, and scattered us, hast put us out of thy protection; else our enemies could not have prevailed thus against us. They had never made a prey of us, if thou hadst not broken the staff of bands, (Zech. xi. 14.) by which we were united, and so scattered us." Whatever our trouble is, and whoever are the instruments of it, we must own the hand of God, his righteous hand, in it. 3. He laments the ill effects and consequences of the miscarriages of the late years. The whole nation was in a confusion; Thou hast made the earth to tremble, or the land. The generality of the people had dreadfull apprehension of the issue of these things: the good people themselves were in a consternation; they had "no drink to drink the abhorrable banquet;" we were like men intoxicated, and at our wit's end, not knowing how to reconcile these dispensations with God's promises and his relation to his people; we are amazed, can do nothing, nor know what we to do." Now this is mentioned here, to teach, that is, for the instruction of the people. When God is turning his hand in our favours, it is good to remember our former calamities. (1.) That we may retain the good impressions they made upon us, and may have them revived. Our souls must still have the afflication and the misery in remembrance, that they may be humbled within us, Lam. iii. 19, 20. (2.) That God's goodness to us, in relieving and raising us up, may be more magnified; for it is as life from the dead, so strange, so refreshing. Our calamities serve as foils to our joys. (3.) That we may not be secure, but may always regard our hopes. In these things, how soon we may be returned into the furnace again, which we were lately taken out of, as the silver is when it is not thoroughly refined.

II. A thankful notice of the encouragement God had given them to hope, that, though things had been long bad, they would now begin to mend; (v. 4.) "Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, (for, as bad as the times are, there is a remnant among us that do fear thee—by name, for God, and which thou hast a tender concern,) that it may be displayed by thee, because of the truth of thy promise which thou wilt perform, and to be displayed by them, in defence of truth and equity," xlv. 4. This banner was David's government, the establishment and enlargement of it over all Israel; the pious Israelites, who feared God, and had a regard to the divine designation of David to the throne, took his elevation as a token for good, and liked the David of God. It united them, as soldiers are gathered together to their colours; they that were scattered, (v. 1.) divided among themselves, and so, weakened and exposed, coalesced in him, when he was fixed upon the throne. 2. It animated them, and put life and courage into them, as the soldiers are heartened by the sight of their banner. 3. It struck a terror upon their enemies, to whom they could now hang out a flag of defiance. Christ, the Son of David, is given a banner to the end of the days. (Isa. xl. 9.) for a Banner to those that fear God; in him, as the Centre of their unity, they are gathered together in one; to him they seek, in him they glory and take courage; his love is the banner over them, in his name and strength they wage war with the powers of darkness, and under him the church becomes terrible as an army with banners.

III. An humble petition for seasonable mercy. 1. That God would be reconciled to them, though he had broken the staff of bands, and scattered them. In his displeasure their calamities began, and therefore in his favour their prosperity must begin; O turn thyself to us again; (v. 1.) smile upon us, and take part with us; be at peace with us, and in that peace we shall have peace. Tranquillus Deus, tranquillat omnia—A God at peace with us, spreads peace over all the scene. 2. That they might be reconciled to one another, though they had been broken and wretchedly divided among themselves; "Heal the breaches of our land, (v. 2.) not only the breaches made upon us by our enemies, but the breaches made among ourselves by our unhappy divisions." Those are breaches which the folly and corruption of man makes, and which nothing but the wisdom and grace of God can make up and repair, by pouring out a spirit of love and peace, by which only a shaken shattered kingdom is set up to rights, and saved from ruin. 3. That they might be preserved out of the hands of their enemies; (v. 5.) "That thy beloved may be delivered, and not made a prey of, save with thy right hand, with thine own power, and by such instruments as thou art pleased to make the men of thy right hand, and hear me." They that fear God, they are dear to him as the apple of his eye; they are often in distress, but they shall be delivered; God's own right hand shall save them, for they that have his heart have his hand; Save them, and hear me. Note, God's praying people may take the general deliveries of the church, as answers to their prayers in particular. If we improve what interest we have at the throne of grace for blessings for the public, and those blessings be bestowed, beside the shape we have with them, on the benefit of them, we may each of us say, with peculiar satisfaction, "God has therein heard me, and answered me."

6. God hath spoken in his holiness; I will rejoice: I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth. 7. Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine; Ephraim also is the strength of my head; Judah is my lawgiver. 8. Moab is my wash-pot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe: Philistia, triumph thou because of me. 9. Who will bring me into the strong city? who will lead me into Edom? 10. Wilt not thou, O God, which hast cast us off? and thou, O God, which didst not go out with our armies? 11. Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man. 12. Through God we shall do valiantly: for he it is that shall tread down our enemies.

David is here rejoicing in hope, and praying in hope; such are the triumphs of the saints, not so much upon the account of what they have in session, as of what they have in prospect; (v. 6.) "God has spoken in his holiness; he has given me his word of promise, has sworn by his holiness, and he will not lie unto David;" (Ixxxix. 35.) therefore I will rejoice, and please myself with the hopes of the performance of the promise, which was intended for more than a pleasing promise." Note, God's word of promise, being a firm foundation of hope, is a full fountain of joy to all believers.

I. David here rejoices; and it is in prospect of two things:

1. The perfecting of this revolution in his own kingdom. God having spoken in his holiness that David shall be king, he doubts not but the kingdom is all his own, as sure as if it were already in his hand; I will divide Shechem, a pleasant city in mount Ephraim, and mete out the valley of Succoth, as my own; (v. 7.) Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine, and both entirely reduced. Ephraim would furnish him with soldiers for his life-guards and his standing forces, Judah would furnish him with able judges for his courts of justice; and thus Ephraim would be the strength of his head, and Judah his lawgiver. Thus may an active believer triumph in the promises, and take the comfort of all the good contained in them; for they are all yea and amen in Christ Jesus, who has spoken in his holiness, and then pardoned in mine, paid the days of mine, heaven mine, God himself mine; All is yours, for you are Christ's, 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23.

2. The conquering of the neighbouring nations, which had been vexatious to Israel, were still dangerous, and opposed the throne of David, v. 8. Moab shall be enslaved, and put to the utmost drudgery; The Meabites became David's servants, 2 Sam. viii. 14. It is part of David's own, which was signified by drawing off his shoe over it, Ruth iv. 7. As for the Philistines, let them, if they dare, triumph over him as they had done; he will soon force them to change their note: rather let those that know their own interest, triumph because of him; for it would be the greatest kindness imaginable to them, to be brought into subjection to David, and communion with Israel.

But the war is not yet brought to an end; there is a strong city, Rabbah (perhaps) of the children of Ammon, which yet holds out; Edom is not yet subdued. Now, (1.) David is here inquiring for help to carry on the war; Who will bring me into the strong city? What shall I do, since I cannot depend upon, to make me master of the enemies' country, and their strong holds? They that have begun a good work, cannot but desire to make a thorough work of it, and to bring it to perfection. (2.) He is expecting it from God only; "Wilt not thou, O God? For thou hast spoken in thine holiness; and wilt not thou be as good as thy word?" He takes notice of the favours of Providence they had been under, Thy hand was already powerful; what shall we do now? let us not go forth with our armies; when they were defeated and met with disappointments, they owned it was because they wanted, that is, because they had forfeited, the gracious presence of God with them; yet they do not therefore fly from him, but rather take so much the faster hold of him; and the less he has done for them of late, the more they hoped he would do. At the same time that they own God's justice in what was past, they hewed in his mercy what was to come. Though thou hast cast us off, yet thou wilt not contend with ever, thou wilt not always chide; though thou hast cast us off; yet thou hast begun to show mercy; and wilt thou not perfect what thou hast begun?" The Son of David, in his sufferings, seemed to be cast off by his Father, when he cried out, Why hast thou forsaken me? And yet, even then, he obtained a glorious victory over the powers of darkness and their strong city, a victory which will undoubtedly be completed at last, for he is gone forth conquering and to conquer. The Israel of God, his spiritual Israel, are likewise through him, more than conquerors. Though sometimes they may be tempted to think that God has cast them off, and may be foiled in particular conflicts, yet God will bring them into the strong city at last; Vincimus in praelio, sed non in bello—We are foiled in a battle, but not in the whole war. A lively faith in the promise will assure us, not only that the God of peace shall tread Satan under our feet shortly, but that it is our Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom.

II. He prays in hope. His prayer is, Give us help from trouble, v. 11. Even in the day of their triumph, they see themselves in trouble, because still in war, which is troublesome even to the prevailing side. None, therefore, can delight in war, but those that love to fish in troubled waters. The help from trouble they pray for, is preserving them, those were at war with. Though now they were conquerors, yet, (so uncertain are the issues of war,) unless God gave them help in the next engagement, they might be defeated; therefore, Lord, send us help from the sanctuary. Help from trouble is rest from war, which they prayed for, as those that contended for equity, not for victory, Sic querimus facere, Thus we seek for peace.

The hope with which they themselves, in this prayer, has two things in it. 1. A deficiency of themselves, and all their creature-confidence; Vain is the help of man. Then only are we qualified to receive help from God, when we are brought to own the insufficiency of all creatures to do that for us which we expect him to do. 2. A confidence in God, and in his power and promise; (v. 12.) Wilt thou not, O God, do with us after all things? If we are to do victoriously; for he it is, and he only, that shall tread down our enemies, and shall have the praise of it." Note, (1.) Our confidence in God must be so far from superseding, that it must encourage and quicken, our endeavours in the way of our duty. "I thought it is God that performs all things for us, yet there is something to be done by us.
Psalms, LXI.

David, in this psalm, as in many others, begins with a sad heart, but concludes with an air of pleasantness; begins with prayers and tears, but ends with songs of praise. Thus the soul, by being lifted up to God, returns to the enjoyment of itself. It should seem, David was driven out and banished when he penned this psalm, whether by Saul or Absalom is uncertain; some think by Abasalom, because he calls himself the king; (v. 6) but that refers to the King Messiah. David, in this psalm, resolves to persevere in his duty, encouraged thereto both by his experience of God's power and by his expectations. 1. He will call upon God, because God had protected him, v. 1-3. II. He will call upon God, because God had provided well for him, v. 4, 5. III. He will praise God, because he had an assurance of the coming of God's kingdom; v. 6-8. So that, in singing this psalm, we may find that which is very expressive both of our faith and of our hope, of our prayers and of our praises; and some passages in this psalm are very peculiar.

To the chief musician upon Neginah. A psalm of David.

1. Hear my cry, O God; attend unto my prayer. 2. From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed: lead me to the Rock that is higher than I. 3. For thou hast been a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy. 4. I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever; I will trust in the covert of thy wings. Selah.

In these verses, we may observe, 1. David's close adherence and application to God by prayer in the day of his distress and trouble; "Whatever comes, I will cry unto thee;" (v. 2) not cry to other gods, but to thee only; not fall out with thee because thou afflictst me, but still look unto thee, and wait upon thee; not speak to thee in a cold and careless manner, but cry to thee with the greatest importunity and fervency of spirit, as one that will not let thee go, except thou bless me." This he will do, (1.) Notwithstanding his distance from the sanctuary, the house of prayer, where he used to attend in the court of requests; "From the end of the earth, or of the land, from the remotest and obscure corner of the country, will I cry unto thee." Note, Wherever we are, we may have liberty of access to God, and may go to him by a way open to the throne of grace, Undique ad celos tantundem est vice—Heaven is equally accessible from all places. "Nay, because I am here in the end of the earth, in sorrow and solitude, therefore I will cry unto thee." Note, That which separates us from our other comforts, should drive us so much the nearer to God, the Fountain of all comfort. (2.) Notwithstanding the dejection and despondency of his spirit; "Though my heart is overburdened, it is not sunk, so swollen, but that it may overflow up to God in prayer; if it is not capable of being thus raised, it is certainly too much cast down." Nay, because my heart is ready to be overwhelmed, therefore I will cry unto thee, for thereby it will be supported and relieved." Note, Weeping must quicken praying, and not deaden it. Is any afflicted? let him pray. Jam. v. 13. Ps. cii. title.

2. The particular petition he put up to God, when his heart was overwhelmed, and he was ready to sink; Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I; that is, (1.) "To the Rock which is too high for me; (2.) To get up to, unless thou help me to it. Lord, give me such an assurance and satisfaction of my own safety as I can never attain to but by thy special grace working such a faith in me." (2.) "To the Rock on the top of which I shall be set further out of the reach of my troubles, and nearer the serene and quiet region, than I can by any power or wisdom of my own." God's power and promise are a rock that is higher than we; those are safe that are in him. We cannot get upon this rock, unless God by his power assist us; I will put thee in the chief of the rock, Exod. xxxiii. 22. We should, therefore, by faith and prayer, put ourselves under the divine conduct, that we may be taken under the divine direction.

3. His desire and expectation of an answer of peace. He begs in faith; (v. 1.) "Hear my cry, O God, attend unto my prayer; let me have the pre- sent comfort and knowing that I am heard, (xx. 6.) and in due time let me have that which I pray for." 4. The ground of this expectation, and the plea he uses to enforce his petition; (v. 3.) "Thou hast been a Shelter for me, I have found in thee a Rock higher than I; therefore I trust thou wilt still lead me to that Rock." Note, Past experiences of the benefit of trusting in God, as they should engage us still to keep close to him, so they should encourage us to hope that it will not baffle our desire. "Thou hast been my strong Tower from the enemy, and thou art as strong as ever, and thy name as much a refuge to the righteous as ever it was," Prov. xviii. 10.

5. His resolution to continue in the way of duty to God, and dependence on him, v. 4. (1.) The service of God shall be his constant work and business: all those must make it so, who expect to find God their Shelter and Strong Tower; none but his most faithful servants have the benefit of his protection; I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever. David was now banished from the tabernacle, which was his greatest grievance; but he is assured that God, by his providence, would bring him back to his tabernacle, because he had, by his grace, wrought in him such a kindness for his tabernacle, as that he was resolved to make it his perpetual residence, xxvii. 4. He speaks of abiding in it for ever, because the tabernacle was a type and figure of heaven, Heb. ix. 8, 9, 24. Those that dwell in God's tabernacle, as it is a house of duty, during their short ever on earth, shall dwell in that tabernacle which is the house of glory, during an endless ever. (2.) The grace of God and the covenant of peace shall be his constant comfort; I will make my refuge in the covert of his wings, as the chickens seek both warmth and safety under the wings of the hen. Those that have found God a Shelter to them, ought to trust to him in all their straits. This advantage they have that abide in God's tabernacle, that in the time of trouble he shall there hide them.

5. For thou, O God, hast heard my vows: thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy name. 6. Thou wilt prolong the king's life; and his years as many generations. 7. He shall abide before God for ever: O prepare mercy and truth, which may preserve him. 8. So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever, that I may daily perform my vows.
In these verses, we may observe,
1. With what pleasure David looks back upon what God had done for him formerly; (v. 5.) Thou, O God, hast heard my vows, that is, (1.) "The vows themselves which I made, and with which I bound my soul; thou hast taken notice of them; thou hast accepted them, because made in sincerity, and been well pleased with them; thou hast been mindful of them, and put me in mind of the same every day."
2. With what assurance he looks forward to the continuance of his life; (v. 6.) Thou shalt prolong the king's life. This may be understood, either, (1.) Of himself; if it was penned before he came to the crown, yet, being anointing by Samuel, and knowing what was in the hearts of men, both in his father's, and other's, he might assure himself, God would call himself the king, though now persecuted as an outlaw; or, perhaps, it was penned when Absalom sought to dethrone him, and forced him into exile. There were these arts aimed to shorten his life, but he trusted to God to prolong his life, which he did to the age of man set by Moses, that is, 70 years; which, being spent in serving his generation according to the will of God, (Acts xiii. 36.) might be reckoned as many generations, because many generations would be the better for him. His resolution was, to abide in God's tabernacle for ever, (v. 4.) in a way of duty; and now his hope is, that he shall abide before God for ever, in a way of comfort. Those abide to good purpose in this world that abide before God; that serve him, and walk in his fear; and they that do so shall abide before him for ever. He speaks of himself in the third person, because the psalm was delivered to the chief musician for the use of the church, and he would have the people, in singing it, to be encouraged with an assurance, that, notwithstanding the malice of his enemies, their king, as they wished, should live for ever. Or, (2.) Of the Messiah, the King of whom he was a type; it was a comfort to David to think, whatever became of him, that the years of the Lord's Anointed should be as many generations, and that of the increase of his government and peace, there should be no end. The Mediator shall abide before God for ever, for he always appears in the presence of God for us, and ever lives, making intercession; and because he lives, we shall live also.
3. With what importunity he begs of God to take him and keep him always under his protection; O prepare mercy and truth which may preserve him God's promises, and our faith in them, are not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, prayer. David is sure that God will prolong his life, and therefore prays that he would preserve it. Not that he would provide mercy and truth for himself, but that God would provide for his safety, according to the promise. We need not desire to be better secured than under the protection of God's mercy and truth. This may be applied to the Messiah; Let him be sent in the fulness of time, in performance of the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, Micah viii. 20. Luke i. 72, 73.
4. With what cheerfulness he vows the grateful returns of duty to God; (v. 8.) So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever. Note, God's preservation of us calls upon us to praise him; and therefore we should desire to live, that we may praise him; Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee. We must make praising God the work of our time, even to the last, as long as our lives are prolonged, we must continue praising God; and then it shall be made the work of our eternity, and we shall be praising him for ever; that I may daily perform my vows. His praising God was itself the performance of his vows, and it disposed his heart to the performance of his vows in other instances. Note, (1.) The vows we have made we must conscientiously perform. (2.) Praising God, and paying our vows to him, must be our constant daily work; every day we must be doing something towards it, because it is all but little in comparison with what is to be done in eternity. We daily receive fresh mercies, and because, if we think much to do it daily, we cannot expect to be doing it eternally.

PSALM LXII.

This psalm has nothing in it directly either of prayer or praise, nor does it appear upon what occasion it was penned, nor whether upon any particular occasion, whether mournful or joyful. But in it, I, David, with a great deal of pleasure, expressed my own confidence in God, and dependence upon him, and encourages himself to continue waiting on him, v. 1.-7. II. With a great deal of earnestness, he excites and encourages others to trust in God like himself; no, not in mere word, but in practise, v. 8. 12. In singing it, we should stir up ourselves to wait on God.

To the chief musician, to Jeduthun. A psalm of David.

1. TRULY my soul waiteth upon God: from him cometh my salvation. 2. He only is my rock and my salvation; he is my defence: I shall not be greatly moved. 3. How long will ye imagine mischief against a man? ye shall be slain all of you: as a bowing wall shall ye be, and as a toppling fence. 4. They only consult to cast him down from his excellency; they delight in lies: they bless with their mouth, but they curse inwardly. Selah. 5. My soul, wait thou only upon God: for my expectation is from him. 6. He only is my rock and my salvation; he is my defence: I shall not be moved. 7. In God is my salvation and my glory: the rock of my strength, and my refuge, is in God.

In these verses, we have,
1. David's profession of dependence upon God,
and upon him only, for all good; (v. 1.) Truly my soul waiteth upon God. Nevertheless, (so some), or, "However it be, whatever difficulties or dangers I may meet with, though God be not upon me, and yet I will with all my might, and by all means possible, come to him, as if he were my sure friend and companion, and expectantly had a doubtful event, with an entire satisfaction in his righteousness and goodness, however it be. Is not my soul subject to God? So the LXX. So it is, certainly so ought it to be; our wills must be melted into his will. "My soul has respect to God, for from him cometh my salvation." He doubts not but his salvation will come, though now he was threatened and in danger; and he expects it to come from God, and from him only: it hoped for from hills and mountains, Jer. iii. 23. Ps. cxxxi. 2. "From him I know it will come, and therefore on him will I patiently wait till it does come, for his time is the best time." We may apply it to our eternal salvation, which is called the salvation of God, (i. 23.) from him that comes; he prepared it for us, he prepares us for it, and preserves us to it, and therefore let our souls wait on him, to be conducted through this world to that eternal salvation, in such way as he thinks fit.

II. The ground and reason of this dependence: (v. 2.) He only is my Rock and my Salvation, he is my Defence. 1. "He has been so many a time; in him I have found shelter, and strength, and succour; he has, by his grace, supported me, and borne me up, under my troubles, and, by his providence, defended me from the insults of my enemies, and delivered me out of the troubles into which I was plunged; and therefore I trust he will deliver me," 2 Cor. i. 10. 2. "He only can be my Rock and my Salvation; creatures are insufficient, they are nothing without him, and therefore I will look above them to him." 3. "He has by covenant undertaken to be so. Even he that is the Rock of ages, is my Rock; he that is the God of salvation, is my Salvation; he that is the Most High, is my High Place; and all the confidences I have in him, I have all the reason in the world to confide in him."

III. The improvement he makes of his confidence in God.
1. Trusting in God, his heart is fixed. "If God is my Strength and mighty Deliverer, I shall not be greatly mov'd, I shall not be undone and ruined; I may be shaken, but I shall not be sunk." Or, "I shall not be much disturb'd and disquieted in my heart or breast. I may be put into some fright, but I shall not be afraid with any amazement, nor so as to be put out of the possession of my own soul. I may be perplexed, but not in despair," 2 Cor. iv. 8. This hope in God will be an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast.
2. His enemies are slighted, and all their attempts against him looked upon by him with contempt, v. 3, 4. If God be for us, we need not fear what man can do against us. I will not be mov'd, nor be mis'd and malis'cous. Hither: (1.) Gives a character of his enemies. They imagine mischief, design it with a great deal of the serpent's venom, and contrive it with a great deal of the serpent's subtlety, and this against a man, one of their own kind, against one single man, that is not an equal match for them, for they are many; they continued their malicious prosecution, though Providence often defeated their malicious designs. How long will ye do it? will ye never be convinced of your error? will your malice never have spent itself? They are unanimous in their consultations, to cast an excellent man down from his excellency, as by best man from his in legitimy, to entangle him in such a manner, that the only thing that can effectually cast us down from our excellency; to thrust a man, whom God has exalted, down from his dignity, and so to fight against God. Envy was at the bottom of their malice; they were grieved at David's advancement, and therefore plotted, by diminishing his character, and blackening that, (which was casting him down from his excellency,) to hinder his promotion. In order to this, they calumny him, and love to heap up bad characters given of him, and such bad reports raised and spread concerning him, as they themselves know to be false; they delight in lies. And as they make no conscience of lying concerning him, to do him a mischief, so they make no conscience of lying to him, to conceal the mischief they design, and accomplish it the more effectually; they bless with their mouth, they compliment David to his face, but they curse inwardly; in their hearts they wish him all mischief, and privately are plotting against him, and in their cabals carrying on some evil design or other, by which they hope to ruin him; it is dangerous putting our trust in men who are thus false; but God is faithful. (2.) He reads their doom, pronounces a sentence of death upon them, not as a king, but as a prophet; Ye shall be slain, all of you, by the righteous judgments of God. Soul and his servants were slain by the Philistines on mount Gileon, according to this prediction; those who seek the ruin of God's chosen, are but preparing ruin for themselves. God's church is built upon a rock which will stand; but they that fight against it, and its patrons and protectors, shall be as a bowing wall and a tottering fence, which, having a rotten foundation, sinks with its own weight, falls of a sudden, and buries those in the ruins of it that are but themselves under the shadow and shelter of it. David, having put his confidence in God, therefore foresees the over throw of his enemies, and, in effect, sets them at defiance, and bids them do their worst.
3. He is himself encouraged to continue waiting upon God; (v. 5, 6.) My soul, wait thou only upon God. Note, The good we do, we should stir up ourselves to continue doing, and to do yet more and more, as those that have, through grace, experienced the fit of it. We have found it good to wait upon God, and therefore let us continue to continue, to charge our souls, and even charm them, into such a constant dependence upon him, as may make us always easy. He had said, (v. 1.) From him cometh my salvation; he says, (v. 5.) My expectation is from him. His salvation was the principal matter of his expectation; let him have that from God, and he expects no more. His salvation being from God, all his other expectations are from him. If God will save me, I shall not demand much more; if he will grant me what he pleases with me, and I will acquiesce in his dispositions, knowing they shall all turn to my salvation," Phil. i. 19. He repeats (v. 6.) what he had said concerning God, (v. 2.) as one that was not only assured of it, but greatly pleased with it, and that dwelt much upon it, in his thoughts: He only is my Rock and my Salvation, he is my Defence, I know he is; but there is more, I shall not be greatly mov'd; I shall not be, I shall be more than highly mov'd; more faith is acted, the more active it is; Crescit eundo—It grows by being exercised. The more we meditate upon God's attributes and promises, and our own experience, the more ground we get of our fears, which, like Haman, when they begin to fall, shall fall before us, and we shall be kept in perfect peace, Isa. xxxvi. 3. And as David's faith in God advances to an unshaken stayedness, so his joy in God improves itself into a holy triumph; (v. 7.) In God is my salvation and my glory. Where our salvation is, there our glory is; for what is our salvation, but the glory to be revealed; the eternal weight of glory: And there our glorying must be.

In God let us boast all the day long. "The rock of my strength, my strong rock, on which I build my hopes, and stay myself, and my refuge, to which I flee for shelter when I am pursued, is in God, and in him alone: Upon whom two things I place my trust to; the more I think of it, the better satisfied I am in the choice I have made." Thus does he delight himself in the Lord, and then ride upon the high places of the earth, Is. Ixviii. 14.

8. Trust in him at all times, ye people; pour out your heart before him: God is a refuge for us. Selah. 9. Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity. 10. Trust not in oppression, become not vain in robbery: if riches increase, set not your heart upon them. 11. God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this, that power belongeth unto God. 12. Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy: for thou renderest to every man according to his work.

Here we have David's exhortation to others to trust in God, and wait upon him, as he had done. Those that have found the comfort of the ways of God themselves, will invite others into those ways; there is enough in God for all the saints to draw from, and we shall have never the less for others sharing the same in us.

I. He counsels all to wait upon God, as he did, v. 8. Observe, 1. To whom he gives this good counsel, Ye people, that is, All people; all shall be welcome to trust in God, for he is the Confidence of all the ends of the earth, Is. Ixv. 5. Ye people of the house of Israel; (so the Chaldees,) they are especially engaged and invited to trust in God, for he is the God of Israel; and should be received as such by all the other nations of the earth. 2. What the good counsel is which he gives. (1.) To confide in God; "Trust in him; deal with him, and be willing to deal upon trust; depend upon him to perform all things for you, upon his wisdom and goodness, his power and promise, his providence and grace. Do this at all times. We must have an habitual confidence in God always, must live a life of dependence upon him; must so trust in him at all times, as not at any time to put that confidence in ourselves, or in any creature, which is to be put in him only: and we must have an actual confidence in God upon all occasions; trust in him upon every emergency, to guide us when we are in doubt, to protect us when we are in danger, to supply us when we are in want, to strengthen us for every good work and work. (2.) To converse with God; Pour out your heart before him; the expression seems to allude to the pouring out of our faults and besetting sins before the Lord. When we make a penitent confession of sin, our hearts are therein poured out before God, 1 Sam. vii. 6. But here it is meant of prayer, which, if it be as it should be, is, the pouring out of the heart before God. We must lay our grievances before him, offer up our desires to him with all humble freedom, and then entirely refer ourselves to his disposal, patiently submitting our wills to his: this is pouring out our hearts.

What encouragement he gives us to take this good counsel, God is a Refuge for us; not only my Refuge, (v. 7.) but a Refuge for us all, even as many as will flee to him, and take shelter in him.

II. He cautions us to take heed of misplacing our confidence, in which, as much as in any thing the heart is deceitful, Jer. xvii. 5-9. They that trust in God truly, (v. 1.) will trust in him only, v. 5.

1. Let us not trust in the men of this world, for they are broken reeds; (v. 9.) Surely men of low degree are vanity, utterly unable to help us, and more often than not to be a snare to us, that we cannot trust to. Men of low degree, one would think, might be relied on for their multitude and number, their bodily strength and service; and men of high degree, for their wisdom, power, and influence: but men of neither degree are to be depended on; nay, of the two, men of high degree are mentioned in terms more disparaging; for they are liars, which do not only vanity, but iniquity. We are not so apt to depend upon men of low degree, as upon the king and the captain of the host, who, by the figure they make, tempt us to trust in them, and so, when they fail us, prove a lie. But, lay them in the balance, the balance of the scripture, or, rather, make trial of them, see how they will prove, whether they will answer your expectations from them or no, and you will write them down as liars, which do not only vanity, but iniquity.

2. Let us not trust in the wealth of this world, let not that be made our strong city; (v. 10.) Trust not in oppression, riches got by fraud and violence; because, where there is a great deal, it is commonly got by indirect scraping or saving; our Saviour calls it the mammon of iniquity, Luke xvi. 9. "Trust not in the arts of getting more. Think not, either because you have got abundance, or are in the way of getting, that therefore you are safe enough; for this is becoming vain in robbery, cheating yourselves while you think to cheat others."

He that trusted in the abundance of his riches, strengthened himself in his wickedness; (v. 7.) but, at the end, he will be a fool, Jer. xvii. 11. Let none be so stupid as to think they can support themselves in any degree of support from riches in this sin. Nay, because it is hard to have riches, and not to trust in them, if they increase, though by lawful and honest means, we must take heed lest we let out our affections inordinately toward them; "Set not your heart upon them; be not eager for them, do not take a complacency in them as the rest of your souls, nor put a confidence in them as your portion; be not ever-solicitous about them, do not value yourselves and others by them; make not the wealth of the world your chief good and highest end; in short, do not make an idol of it." This we are most in danger of doing when they increase; when the grounds of the rich man brought forth plentifully, then he said to his soul, Take thine ease in these things, Luke xii. 19. It is a smiling world that is most likely to draw the heart away from God, on whom only it should be set.

III. He gives a very good reason why we should make God our Confidence, because he is a God of infinite power, mercy, and righteousness, v. 11, 12.

This he himself was well assured of, and would have us be assured of it. God has spoken once, twice have I heard this, that is, 1. "God has spoken it, and I have heard it, once, yea twice. He has spoken it, and I have heard it by the light of reason, which easily infers it from the infinite, perfect Being, and from his works both of creation and providence. He has spoken it, and I have heard it, once, yea twice, that is, many a time, by the events that have concerned me in particular.
A psalm of David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

1. O GOD, thou art my God; early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is; 2. To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary.

The title tells us when the psalm was penned, when David was in the wilderness of Judah; that is, in the forest of Hareth, 1 Sam. xxii. 5. Or, in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxiii. 15. 1. Even in Canaan, though a fruitful land, and the people numerous, yet there were wildernesses, places less fruitful, and less inhabited, than other places. It will be so in the world, in the church, but not in heaven; there it is all city, all paradise, and no desert ground; the wilderness there shall blossom as the rose. 2. The best and dearest of God's saints and servants may sometimes have their lot cast in a wilderness, which speaks them lonely and solitary, desolate and afflicted, wanting wandering, and unsettled, and quite at a loss what to do with themselves. 3. None of the straits and difficulties of a wilderness may be put out of mind, as out of tune for sacred songs; but even then it is our duty and interest to keep up a cheerful communion with God. There are psalms proper for a wilderness, and we have reason to thank God that it is the wilderness of Judah we are in, not the wilderness of Sin.

David, in these verses, stirst up himself to take hold on God,

I. By a lively active faith; O God, thou art my God. Note, In all our addresses to God, we must eye him as God, and cur God, and this will be our comfort in a wilderness-state. We must acknowledge that God is, that we speak to one that really exists, and is present with us, when we say, O God, which is a serious word; pitly it should ever be used as a by-word. And we must own his authority over us, and propriety in us, and our relation to him; Thou art my God, mine by creation, and therefore my rightful Owner and Ruler, mine by covenant, and my own consent. We must speak it with the greatest pleasure to ourselves, and thankfulness to God, as those that are resolved to abide by it; O God, thou art my God.

II. By pious and devout affections, pursuant to the choice he had made of God, and the covenant he had made with him.

1. He resolves to seek God, and his favour and grace. Thou art my God, and therefore I will seek thee, for, should not a people seek unto their God? Isa. viii. 19. We must seek him; we must covet his favour as our chief good, and consult his glory as our highest end; we must seek acquaintance with him by his word, and seek mercy from him by prayer. We must seek him, (1.) Early, with the utmost care, as those that are afraid of missing him; we must begin our days with him, begin every day with him; EARLY will I seek thee. (2.) Earnestly, "My soul thirsteth for thee, and my flesh longeth for thee; my whole man is affected with this pursuit, here in a dry and thirsty land." Observe, [1.] His complaint in the want of God's favourable presence. He was in a dry and thirsty land; so he reckoned it, as so much because it was a wilderness, as because it was at a distance from the ark, from the word and sacraments. This world is a weary land, so the word is; it is so to the worldly that have their portion in it, it will yield them no true satisfaction; it is so to the godly that have their passage through it, it is a valley of Baca, they can promise themselves little from it. [2.] His importunity for

This psalm has in it as much of warmth and lively devotion, as any of David's psalms. In so little space, the sweetest of Paul's epistles were those that bore date out of a prison, so some of the sweetest of David's psalms were those that were penned, as this was, in a wilderness. That which grieved him most in his banishment was, the want of public ordinances; these he here longs to be restored to the enjoyment of; and the present want did but whet his appetite. Yet it is not the ordinances, but the God of the ordinances, that his heart is upon. And here are, 1. His desire toward God, v. 1, 2. His esteem of God, v. 3, 4. His satisfaction in God, v. 5, 6. His secret communion with God, v. 6, 7. His joyful dependence upon God, v. 7, 8. VI. His holy triumph in God over his enemies, and in the assurance of his own safety, v. 9, 11. A devout and pious soul has little need of direction how to sing this psalm, so naturally does it speak its own genuine language; and an unsanctified soul, that is unenlightened and unadorned with divine things, is scarcely capable of singing it with understanding. that presence of God; My soul thirsteth, longeth, for thee. His want quenched his desires, which were very intense; he thirsted as the hunted hart for the water-brooks; he would take up with nothing short of it. His desires were also impulsive; he longed, he languished, till he should be restored to the liberty of God's ordinances. Note, Gracious souls are as much in their outward circumstances as if they were in the tabernacle; to see it in secret, as I have seen it in the solemn assembly. Note, When we want the benefit of public ordinances, we should desire and endeavour to keep up the same communion with God in our retirements, that we have had in the great congregation. A closet may be turned into a little sanctuary.

Ezekiel had the visions of the Almighty in Babylon, and John, in the isle of Patmos. When we are alone, we may have the Father with us, and that is enough.

To see thy power, and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary. That is, (1.) To see it here in this wilderness, as I have seen it in the tabernacle; to see it in secret, as I have seen it in the solemn assembly." Note, When we want the benefit of public ordinances, we should desire and endeavour to keep up the same communion with God in our retirements, that we have had in the great congregation. A closet may be turned into a little sanctuary.

Ezekiel had the visions of the Almighty in Babylon, and John, in the isle of Patmos. When we are alone, we may have the Father with us, and that is enough.

To see thy power, and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary. That is, (2.) To see it again in the sanctuary, as I have formerly seen it there. He长得, he languished, till he should be restored to the liberty of his wilderness, not that he might see his friends again, and be restored to the pleasures and gaieties of the court, but that he might have access to the sanctuary; not to see the priests there, and the ceremony of the worship, but to see thy power and glory; he does not say, as I have seen them, but as I have seen thee. We cannot see the essence of God, but we see him, in seeing by faith his attributes and perfections. These sights David here plea.ses himself with the remembrance of; those were precious minutes which he spent in communion with God, he loved to remember; they made his heart glad, they took away the wilderness, the loss of, and longed to be restored to. Note, That which has been the delight, and is the desire, of gracious souls, in their attendance on solemn ordinances, is, to see God, and his power and glory in them.

3. Because thy loving-kindness is better than life, my lips shall praise thee. 4. Thus will I bless thee while I live: I will lift up my hands in thy name. 5. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness; and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips; 6. When I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night-watches.

How soon are David's complaints and prayers turned into praises and thanksgivings! After two verses that speak his desire in seeking God, here are some that speak his joy and satisfaction in having found him. Faithful prayers may quickly be turned into joyful praises, if it be not our own fault. Let the hearts of those rejoice that seek the Lord, (cv. 3.) and let them praise him for working those desires in them, and giving them assurance that he will satisfy them. David was now in a wilderness, and yet had his heart much enlarged in blessing God. Even in affliction, we need not want matter for praise, if we have but a heart to it. Observe,

1. What David will praise God for; (v. 3.) Because thy loving-kindness is better than life, than life; life, and all the comforts of life; life in its best estate; long life and prosperity. God's loving-kindness is, in itself, and in the account of all the saints, better than life. It is our spiritual life, and that is better than temporal life, xxx. 5. It is better, a thousand times, to die in God's favour, than to live under his wrath. David, in the wilderness, finds, by his own experience, that God's loving-kindness is better than life; and, Therefore (see xxvii. 16.), those lips shall praise thee. Note, Those that have their hearts refreshed with the tokens of God's favour, ought to have them enlarged in his praises. A great deal of reason we have to bless God that we have better provisions, and better possessions, than the wealth of this world can afford us; and that, in the service of God, and in communion with him, we have better employments, and better enjoyments, than we could have in the business and converse of this world.

II. How he will praise God, and how long, v. 4. He resolves to live a life of thankfulness to God, and dependence on him. Observe, 1. His manner of blessing God; Thus will I bless thee; thus, as I have now begun; the present devout affections shall not pass away, like the morning cloud, but shine more and more, like the morning sun. Or, God will have that power, that perseverance and energy with which I have prayed to thee.

2. His continuance and perseverance therein; I will bless thee while I live. Note, Praising God must be the work of our whole lives; we must always retain a grateful sense of his former favours, and repeat our thanksgivings for them; we must every day give thanks to him for the benefits with which we are daily loaded. We must in every thing give thanks; and not be put out of frame for this duty by any of the afflictions of this present time. Whatever days we live to see, how dark and cloudy soever, though the days come, of which we say, We have no pleasure in them, yet still every day must be a thanksgiving day, even to our dying day. In this work we must spend our time, because in this work we hope to spend a blessed eternity. 3. His constant regard to God upon all occasions, which should accompany his praises of him; I will lift up my hands in thy name. We must have an eye to God's name, to all that by which he has made himself known, in all our prayers and praises, which we are taught to begin with, Hallowed be thy name, and to conclude with, Thine is the glory. This we must have an eye to in our work and warfare; we must lift up our hands to our duty, and against our spiritual enemies, in God's name, in the strength of his Spirit and grace, xxxi. 16. Zech. x. 12. We must make all our praises in God's name; to him we must engage ourselves, and in a dependence upon his grace. And when we lift up the hands that hang down, in comfort and joy, it must be in God's name; from him our comforts must be fetched, and to him they must be devoted; In thee do we boast all the day long.

III. With what pleasure and delight he would praise God, v. 5. 1. With inward complacency; We will be satisfied with good; not only as with bread, which is nourishing, but as with marrow, which is pleasant and delicious, Isa. xxxv. 6. David hopes he shall return again to the enjoyment of God's ordinances, and then he shall thus be satisfied, and the more for his having been for a time under restraint. Or, if not, yet in God's loving-kindness, and in conversing with him in solitude, he shall be thus satisfied. Note, There are times of great bearing on the soul, God's mercy in them, which gives abundant satisfaction to a soul, xxxvi. 8.—lxv. 4. And there is that in a gracious soul, which takes abundant satisfaction in God, and communion with him. The saints have a contentment with God, they desire no more than his favour to make them happy; and they have a transcendent complacency in God, in comparison with which all the delights of sense are sapless and without relish; as puddle-water in comparison with the wine of the best vintage. 2. With outward expression of this satisfaction; he will praise God with joyful lips. He will praise him, (1.) Openly; his mouth and lips shall praise God. When with the heart man believes, and is thankful, with the mouth confession must be made of both, to the glory of God; not that the performances of the mouth are accepted without the heart, (Matt. xv. 8.) but out of the abundance of the heart the mouth must speak, (xiv. 1.) both for the expressiveness of our own devout affections and for the edification of others. (2.) Cheerfully. Thus we must praise God with joyful lips; we must address ourselves to that and other duties of religion with great cheerfulness, and speak forth the praises of God from a principle of holy joy. Praising lips must be joyful lips.

IV. How he would entertain himself with thoughts of God when he was most retired; (v. 6.) I will praise thee, when I remember thee upon my bed. We must praise God, upon every remembrance of him. Now that David was shut out from public ordinances, he abounded the more in secret communion with God, and so did something toward making up his loss. Observe here,

1. How David employed himself in thinking of God. God was in all his thoughts, which is the reverse of the wicked man's character; x. 4. The thoughts of God were ready to him; I remember thee; when I go to think, I find thee at my right hand, present to my mind. This subject should first offer itself, as that which we cannot forget or overlook. And they were fixed in him; I meditate on thee. Thoughts of God must not be transient thoughts, passing through the mind, and abiding thoughts, dwelling in the mind.

2. When David employed himself thus; Upon his bed, and in the night-watches. David was now wandering and unsettled, but, wherever he came, he brought his religion along with him. Upon my beds, so some: being hunted by Saul, he sel'dom lay, two nights together, in the same bed; but, wherever he lay, if, as Jacob, upon the cold ground, and with a stone for his pillow, good thoughts of God lay down with him. David was so full of business, all day, shifting for his own safety, that he had scarcely leisure to apply himself solemnly to religious exercises, and therefore it was the more incumbent upon him, during the vigil of his mind, and the necessity of his thoughts, to remember God, may be at ease, and repose themselves. Perhaps an hour's pious meditation will do us more good than an hour's sleep would have done; see xvi. 7. — xvii. 3. — iv. 4. — cxix. 62. There were night-watches kept in the tabernacle for praising God, (cxxxiv. 1.) in which, probably, David, when he had liberty, joined with the Levites, now that he could not keep place with them, he kept time with them, and wished himself among them.

7. Because thou hast been my help: therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice. 8. My soul followeth hard after thee: thy right hand upholdeth me. 9. But those that seek my soul, to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth. 10. They shall fall by the sword; they shall be a portion for foxes. 11. But the king shall rejoice in God; every one that swareth by him shall glory: but the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped.

David, having expressed his desires toward God, and his praises of him, here speaks his confidence in him, and his joyful expectations from him; (v. 7.) In the shadow of thy wings I will rejoice; alluding either to the wings of the cherubims, stretched out over the ark of the covenant, between which God is said to dwell; (cf. I will rejoice in thine oracles, and in covenant and communion with thee;) or to the wings of a fowl, under which the helpless young ones have shelter, as the eagle’s young ones, (Exod. xix. 4. Deut. xxxii. 11.) which speaks the divine power; and the young ones of the common hen, (Matt. xxiii. 37.) which speaks more of divine tenderness. It is a phrase often used in the psalms, (xvii. 8. — xxxvi. 7. — lii. 1.—lxxi. 4.—xci. 4.) and no where else in this sense, except Ruth ii. 12. where Ruth, when she became a proselyte, is said to trust under the wings of the God of Israel. It is our duty to rejoice in the shadow of God's wings, which denotes our reception of him by faith and prayer, as naturally as the chickens, when they are cold or frightened, run by instinct under the wings of the hen. It intimates also our reliance upon him as able and ready to help us, and our refreshment and satisfaction in his care and protection. Having committed ourselves to God, we must be easy and pleasant, and quiet from the fear of evil.

Now let us see further.

What were the supports and encouragements of David's confidence in God. Two things were as preps to that hope, which the word of God was the only foundation of.

1. His former experiences of God's power in relieving him; Because thou hast been my Help, when other helps and helpers failed me, therefore: I will still rejoice in thy salvation, will trust in thee for the future, and will do it with delight and holy joy. Thou hast been not only my Helper, but my Help; for where are the gods of the nations, which are the doing, nor could any creature have been helpful to us, but by him. Here we may set up our Ebenezer, saying, Hitherto the Lord has helped us, and must therefore resolve that we will never desert him, never distrust him, nor ever drop in our walking with him.

2. The present sense he had of God's grace carrying him on in these pursuits; (v. 8.) My soul follows hard after thee, which speaks a very earnest desire, and a serious, vigorous, endeavour to keep up communion with God; if we cannot always have God in our embraces, yet we must always have him in our eye, reaching forth toward him as our Prize, Phil. iii. 14. To press hard after God, is to follow him close, as those that are afraid of losing the sight of him, and to follow him fast, as those that long to be with him. This David did, and we were only mad that we were not yet attained what we are in the pursuit of. It is by the power of God, that is, his right hand, that we are kept from falling. Now this was a great encouragement to the psalmist to hope that he would, in due time, give him that which he so earnestly desired, because he had by his grace wrought in them those desires, and kept them up.

II. What it was that David triumphed in the hopes of.

1. That his enemies should be ruined, v. 9, 10. There were those that sought his soul to destroy it; not only his life (which he struck at, both to prevent his coming to the crown, and because they envied and hated him for his wisdom, piety, and usefulness,) but his soul, which they sought to destroy by banishing him from God's ordinances, which are the nourishment and support of the soul, so doing what they could to starve it; and, by sending him to serve other gods, so, doing what they could to poison it, 1 Sam. xxxvi. 19. But he foresees, and foretells, (1.) That they shall fall into the lower part of the earth; to the grave, to hell; their enmity to David would be their death and their damnation; their ruin, their eternal ruin. (2.) That they shall fall by the sword; by the sword of God's wrath and his justice; by the sword of man, Job xix. 28, 29. They shall die a violent death, Rev. xiii. 10. This was fulfilled in Saul, he fell by the sword, his own sword; David foretold this, yet he would not execute it when it was in the power of his hand, once and again; for precepts, not prophecies, are our rule. (3.) That they shall be a portion for foxes; either their dead bodies shall be a prey to ravenous beasts, (Saul lay a good while unburied,) or their houses and estates shall be a habitation for wild beasts, Isa. xxxiv. 14. Such as this will be the doom of Christ's enemies, that oppose his kingdom and interest in the world; Bring them forth, and slay them before me, Luke xix. 27.

2. That the himself should gain his point at last, (v. 11,) that he should be advanced to the throne to which he had been anointed; The king shall rejoice in God. (1.) He calls himself the king, because he knew himself to be so in the divine purpose and designation; thus Paul, while yet in the conflict, writes himself more than a conqueror, Rom. viii. 37. Believers are made kings, though they are not to have the dominion till the morning of the resurrection. (2.) He doubts not but that though he was now sorrowing in tears, he should reap in joy; The king shall rejoice. (3.) He resolves to make God the Alpha and Omega of all his joys; he shall rejoice in God. Now this is applicable to the glories and joys of the exalted Redeemer. Messiah the Prince shall rejoice in God; he is already entered into the joy set before him, and his glory will be completed at his second coming.

[1.] It would be the consolation of his friends. Every one that swears to him, that is, to David, that comes into his interest, and takes an oath of allegiance to him, shall glory in his success; or that swears by him, that is, by the blessed name of God, and not by any idol; (Deut. vi. 13,) and then it means all good people, that make a sincere and open profession of God's name; they shall glory in God; they shall glory in David's acknowledged success; They that believe on him, will be glad when they see me. They that heartily espouse the cause of Christ, shall glory in his victory at last. If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him.

[2.] It would be the confusion of his enemies; The mouth of them that speak lies, of Saul, and Doeg; and others that misrepresented David, and insulted over him, as if his cause was desperate, shall be quite stipped; they shall not have a word more to say against him, but will be for ever silenced and shamed. Apply this to Christ's enemies, to those that speak lies to him, as all hypocrites do, that tell him they love him, while their hearts are not with him; their mouth shall be stopped with that word, Thou knowest you not whence you are; they shall be for ever speechless, Matt. xxii. 12. The mouths of those also that speak lies against him, that pervert the right ways of the Lord, and speak ill of his holy religion, will be stopped, in that day when the Lord shall come to reckon for all the hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. Christ's second coming will be the everlasting triumph of all his faithful friends and followers, who may therefore now triumph in the believing hopes of it.

PSALM LXIV.

This whole psalm has reference to David's enemies, persecutors, and slanderers; many such were, and a great deal of trouble they gave him, almost all his days, so that we need not guess at any particular occasion of penning this psalm. I. He prays to God to preserve him from their malicious designs against him, v. 1, 2. He gives a very bad character of them, as men marked for ruin by their own wickedness, v. 3—6. III. By the spirit of prophecy, he foretells their destruction, which would redound to the glory of God, and the encouragement of his people, v. 7—10. In singing this psalm, we must observe the effect of the old enmity that is in the seed of the woman against the seed of the serpent; and assure ourselves that the serpent's head will be broken, at last, to the honour and joy of the holy seed.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. Hear my voice, O God, in my prayer; preserve me from life from fear of the enemy. 2. Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked; from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity: 3. Who whet their tongue like a sword, and bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words; 4. That they may shoot in secret at the perfect: suddenly do they shoot at him, and fear not. 5. They encourage themselves in an evil matter; they commune of laying snares privily; they say, Who shall see them? 6. They search out iniquities; they accomplish a diligent search; both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart, is deep.

David, in these verses, puts in before God a representation of his own danger, and of his enemies' character, to encourage his petition that God would protect him, and punish them.

I. He earnestly begs of God to preserve him; (v. 1, 2.) Hear my voice, O God, in my prayer; grant me the thing I pray for: and this is it, Lord, preserve my life from fear of the enemy, from the enemy that I am in fear of. He makes request for his life, which is, in a particular manner, dear to him, because he knows it is designed to be very serviceable to God and the preservation of the life, for fear has tormented; particularly the fear of death, by reason of which some are, all their life-time, subject to bondage. He prays, Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked, from the mischief which they secretly consult among themselves to do against me, and from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity, who join forces, as they join counsels, to do me a mischief." Observe, The secret counsel ends in an insurrection; treasonable practices begin in treasonable confederacies and conspiracies. "Hide me from them, that they may not find me, that they may not reach me. Let me be safe under thy protection."

II. He complains of the great malice and wickedness of his enemies; "Lord, hide me from them, for they are aiming mine eyes against me; they are dangerous men, that will stick at nothing; so that I am undone, if thou do not take my part."

1. They are very spiteful in their calumnies and reproaches; v. 3, 4. They are described as military men, with their sword and bow, archers that take aim exactly, secretly and suddenly shoot at the harmless bird that apprehends not herself in any danger. But, (1.) Their tongues are their swords, flaming with two-edged swords, draw swords, drawn in anger, with which they cut, and wound, and kill, the good name of their neighbour. The tongue is a little member, but, like the sword, it boosts great things, Jan. iii. 5. It is a dangerous weapon. (2.) Bitter words are their arrows. Scurrilous reflections, opprobrious nicknames, false representations, slanderers and calumnies, the fiery darts of the wicked one, are shot at their hapless soul. For these their malice sends their bows, to send out these arrows with so much the more force. (3.) The upright man is their mark, against him their spleen is, and they cannot speak peaceably either of him or to him. The better any man is, the more he is envied by those that are themselves bad, and the more ill is said of him. (4.) They manage it with a great deal of art and subtlety; they shoot in secret, that those they shoot at may not discover them, and avoid the danger, for if they shoot in the sight of any bird. And suddenly do they shoot, without giving a man lawful warning, or any opportunity to defend himself. Cursed be he that thus smites his neighbour secretly, in his reputation, Deut. xxvii. 24. There is no guard against a pass made by a false tongue. (5.) Herein they fear not; they are confident of their success, and doubt not but by these methods they shall gain the point which their masters aim at. Or, rather they fear not the wrath of God, which will be the portion of a false tongue. They are impudent and daring in the mischief they do to good people, as if they must never be called to an account for it.

2. They are very close, and very resolute, in their malicious projects, v. 5. (1.) They strengthen and corroborate themselves and one another in this evil matter, and, by joining together in it, they make one another the more bitter and the more bold; Fortiter calumniari, aliquid atheretrum—Let on an abundance of reproach; part will be sure to stick. It is bad to do a wrong thing, but worse to encourage ourselves and one another in it, that is doing the Devil's work for him. It is a sign that the heart is hardened to the highest degree, when it is thus fully set to do evil, and fears no censures. It is the office of conscience to discourage men in an evil matter, but, when that is buffeted, the case is desperate. (2.) They consult with themselves and one another how to do the most mischief, and most effectually; They commune of laying snares privately. All their communion is in sin, and all their communication is how to sin securely. They held councils of war for finding out the most effectual expeditious to do mischief, every snare they lay was talked of before God, and was laid with all the contrivance of their wicked wits combined. (3.) They please themselves with an atheistical conceit that God himself takes no notice of their wicked practices; they say, Who shall see them? A practical disbelief of God's omniscience is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked.

3. They are very industrious in putting their projects in execution; (v. 6.) They search out iniquity, they take a great deal of pains to find out some iniquity or other to lay to my charge, they dig deep, and look far back, and put things to the utmost stretch, that they may have something to accuse me of; or, They are industrious to find out new arts of doing mischief, in which they accomplish a diligent search; they go through and over it, and spare neither cost nor labour; evil men dig up mischief. Half the pains that many take to damn their souls, would serve to save them. They are masters of all the arts of mischief and destruction, for the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart, are deep; deep as hell, desperately wicked, who can know it? By the unaccountable wickedness of their hearts, and of their will, they show themselves to be, both in subtlety and malignity, the genuine offspring of the old serpent.

7. But God shall shoot at them with an arrow; suddenly shall they be wounded. So they shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves: all that see them shall flee away. 9. And all men shall fear, and shall declare the work of God: for they shall wisely consider of his doing. The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, and shall trust in him; and all the upright in heart shall glory.

We may observe here,

I. The judgements of God which should certainly come upon the most vicious persecutors of David. Though they encouraged themselves in their wickedness, here is that which, if they would believe and consider it, was enough to discourage them. And it is observable how the punishment answers the sin. 1. They shot at David secretly and suddenly, to wound him; but God shall shoot at them, for he ordains his arrows against the persecutors; (vii. 13.) against the face of them, xxi. 12. And God's arrows will hit surer, and fly swifter, and strike deeper, than theirs do, or can, in very many arrows, but they are only bitter words, and words are but wind; the curse causeless shall not come; but God has one arrow that will be their death, his curse, which is never causeless, and therefore shall come; with it they shall be suddenly wounded, their wound by it will be a surprise upon them, because they were secure, and not apprehensive of any danger. 2. Their tongues fell upon him, but God shall make their own tongues to fall upon themselves. They do it by the desert of their sin, God does it by the justice of his wrath, v. 8. When God deals with men according to the desert of their tongue-sins, and brings those mischiefs upon them, which they have passionately and maliciously imprecated upon others, then he makes their own tongues to fall upon them; and it is weight enough to sink a man to the lowest hell, like a talent of lead. Many have cut their own throats, and damned their own souls, with their tongues, and it will be an aggravation of their condemnation; O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself; art smote in the words of thy mouth. If thou scornest, thou alone shall bear it. They that love cursing, it shall come unto them. Sometimes men's secret wickedness is brought to light by their own confession, and then their own tongue falls upon themselves.

II. The influence which these judgements should have upon others; for it is done in the open sight of all, Job xxxiv. 26.
1. Their neighbours shall shun them, and shift for their own safety; they shall flee away, for fear of partaking in their plagues, and being involved in their ruin, so dreadful will it be, and such a noise will it make in the country; they shall flee away, the men of Ashdod did from the sight of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, Numb. xvi. 27. Some think this was fulfilled in the death of Saul, when not only his army was dispersed, but the inhabitants of the neighbouring country were so terrified with the fall, not only of their king but of his three sons, that they quitted their cities and fled, 1 Sam. xxxi. 7.

2. Spectators shall reverence the providence of God therein, v. 9. (1.) They shall understand and observe God's hand and work; and so we, as we were wont to do by the dispensations of Providence, (Hos. xiv. 9.) They shall wisely consider his doing. There is need of consideration and serious thought rightly to take the matter of fact, and need of wisdom to put a true interpretation upon it. God's doing is well worth our considering, (Ecc. vii. 13.) but it must be considered wisely, that we put not a corrupt gloss upon a pure text. (2.) They shall be affected with a holy awe of God, upon the consideration of the Word and the works of God. All men (all that have any thing of the reason of a man in them) shall fear and tremble because of God's judgments, cxix. 120. They shall fear to do the like; fear being found persecutors of God's people; Smite the scorners, and the simple shall beware. (3.) They shall declare the work of God; they shall speak to one another, and to all about them, of the justice of God in punishing persecutors; what we wish to consider ourselves, we should wisely consider others, for their caution and the glory of God; This is the finger of God.

3. Good people shall, in a special manner, take notice of it, and it shall affect them with a holy pleasure, v. 10. (1.) It shall increase their joy; The righteous shall be glad in the Lord, not glad of the misery and ruin of their fellow-creatures, but glad that God is glorified, and his word fulfilled, and the cause of injured innocence pleaded effectually. (2.) It shall encourage their faith; they shall commit themselves to him in the way of duty, and be willing to venture for him with an entire confidence in him. (3.) Their joy and faith shall both express themselves in a holy boasting; All the upright in heart, that keep a good conscience and approve themselves to God, shall glory, not in themselves, but in the favour of God, in his righteousness and goodness, their relation to him and interest in him; Let them that glory, glory in the Lord.

PSALM LXV.

In this psalm, we are directed to give to God the glory of his power and goodness, which is Ps. cxxi. 1. In the kingdom of God, v. 1. Hearing prayer, v. 2. Pardoningsin, (v. 3.) Satisfying the souls of the people, (v. 4.) Protecting and supporting them, v. 5. II. In the kingdom of Providence, fixing the mountains, (v. 6.) Calming the sea, v. 7. Preserving the regular succession of day and night, (v. 8.) And making the earth fruitful, v. 9.-13. These are blessings we are all indebted to God for, and therefore we may easily accommodate this psalm to our own situation, singing it.

To the chief musician. A psalm and song of David.

1. PRAISE waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion: and unto thee shall the vow be performed. 2. O thou that earrest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come. 3. Iniquities prevail against me: as for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away. 4. Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts: we shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house, even of thy holy temple. 5. By terrible things in righteousness wilt thou answer us, O God of our salvation; who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar off upon the sea:

The psalmist here has no particular concern of his own, at the throne of grace, but begins with an address to God, as the master of an assembly, and the mouth of a congregation; and observe,

1. How he gives glory to God, v. 1. By humble thankfulness; Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion; waits in expectation of the mercy desired, waits till it arrives, that it may be received with thankfulness and praise to God; when God is coming toward us with his favours, we must go forth to meet him with our praises, and wait till the day dawn. Praise waits with an entire satisfaction in thy holy will, and dependence on thy mercy; when we stand ready in every thing to give thanks, then praise waits for God. Praise waits thine acceptances; the Levites by night stood in the house of the Lord, ready to sing their songs of praise at the morning; Ps. xxxiii. 12.) and when their praise is waited for; Praise is silent unto thee, (so the word is,) as wanting words to express the great goodness of God, and being struck with a silent adoration at it. As there are holy groanings which cannot be uttered, so there are holy adorations which cannot be uttered, and yet shall be accepted by him that searches the heart, and knows what is the mind of the spirit. Our praise is silent, that the praises of the blessed angels, who excel in strength, may be heard. Let it not be told him that I speak, for if a man offer to speak forth all God's praise surely he shall be swallowed up, Job xxxvii. 20. Before thee, praise is rejected as silence, so the Chaldee; so far exalted is God above all our blessing and praise. Praise is due to God from all the world, but it waits for him in Zion only, in his church, among his people; all his works praise him, they minister matter for praise, but his saints only bless him by actual adorations. The redeemed church sing their new song upon mount Zion, Rev. xiv. 1. 3. In Zion was God's dwelling-place, ixvi. 2. 2. Happy they who dwell with him there, for they will be still praising him. 2. By sincere faithfulness; Unto thee shall the vow be performed, the sacrifice shall be offered up, which was vowed. We shall not be accepted in our thanksgivings to God for the mercies we have received, unless we make conscience of paying the vows which we made when we were in pursuit of the mercy; for better it is not to vow, than to vow, and not to pay. 2. What he gives him glory for.

1. For hearing prayer; (v. 2.) Praise waits for thee; and why is it so ready? (1.) Because thou art ready to grant our petitions. O thou that hearest prayer, thou canst answer every prayer, for thou art able to do for us more than we are able to ask or think, (Eph. iii. 20.) and thou wilt answer every prayer of faith, either in kind or kindness. It is much for the glory of God's goodness, and the encouragement of ours, that he is a God hearing prayer, and has taken it among the titles of his honour to be so; and we are much wanting to ourselves, if we do not take all occasions to give him his title. (2.) Because, for that reason, we are ready to run to him with what we have. Therefore, because thou art a God hearing prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come; justly does every man's praise wait for thee, because every man's prayer waits on thee, when he is in want or distress, whatever he does at other times. Now only the seed of Israel come to thee, and the proselytes to and that suffices them, they have enough, they desire no more.

4. For the glorious operations of his power on their behalf; (v. 5.) By terrible things in righteousness, and terrors will thou answer us, O God of our salvation. This may be understood of the rebukes with which God in his providence sometimes gives to his own people; he often answers them by terrible things, for the awakening and quickening of them, but always in righteousness; he neither does them any wrong, nor means them any hurt, for even then he is the God of their salvation. See Isa. xliv. 15. But it is rather to be understood of his judgments upon their enemies; God answers his people's prayers by the destructions made, for their sakes, among the heathen, and the recompense he renders to their proud oppressors, as a righteous God, the God to whom vengeance belongs, and as the God that protects and saves his people. By wonderful things, (so some read it,) things which are very surprising, and which we looked not for, Isa. lxiv. 3. Or by things which strike an awe upon us, thou wilt answer us; the holy freedom that we are admitted to in God's courts, and the nearness of our approach to him, must not at all abate our reverence and godly fear of him; for he is terrible in his holy places.

5. For the care he takes of all his people, however distressed, and withissoever dispersed: he is the Confidence of all the ends of the earth, of all the saints all the world over, and not theirs only that were of the seed of Israel: for he is the God of the Gentiles, as well as of the Jews; the Confidence of them that are afar off from his holy temple, and its courts, that dwell in the island of the Gentiles; or that are in distress upon the sea. They trust in thee, and cry to thee, when they are at their wit's end. civ. 27, 28. By faith and prayer we may keep up our communion with God, and fetch in comfort from him, wherever we are, not only in the solemn assemblies of his people, but afar off upon the sea.

6. Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains; being girded with power: 7. Which stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves, and the tumult of the people. 8. They also that dwell in the uttermost parts are afraid of thy tokens: thou maketh the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice. 9. Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it: thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water: thou preparest them corn, when thou hast so provided for it. 10. Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly; thou settlest the furrows thereof; thou makest it soft with showers; thou blessest the springing thereof. 11. Thou crownest the year with thy goodness; and thy paths drop fatness. 12. They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness; and the little hills rejoice on every side. 13. The pastures are clothed with flocks; the valleys also are covered over with corn: they shout for joy, they also sing.

That we may be the more affected with the wonderful condescensions of the God of grace, it is of use to observe his power and sovereignty as the God of nature; the riches and bounty of his providential kingdom.
I. He establishes the earth, and it abides, cxix. 90. (v. 6.) By his own strength, he setteth fast the mountains; did set them fast at first, and still keeps firm, though they are sometimes shaken by earthquakes.

II. He stills the sea, and it is quiet, v. 7. The sea, in a storm, makes a great noise, which adds to its threatening terror; but, when God pleases, he commands silence among the waves and billows, and lays them to sleep, turns the storm into a calm quickly, civ. 29. And by this change in the sea, as well as by the firmness of the mountains, the unchangeable, both out of the earth, it appears that he, whose the sea and the dry land are, is girded with power. And by this, our Lord Jesus gave of his divine power, that he commanded the winds and waves, and they obeyed him. To this instance of the quieting of the sea, he adds, as a thing much of the same nature, that he stills the tumult of the people, the common people. Nothing is more unruly and disagreeable than tumults in a mob, the insurrections of the rabble; yet even these God can pacify, in secret ways, which they themselves are not aware of. Or, it may be meant of the out- range of the people that were enemies to Israel, ii. 1. God has many ways to still them, and will for ever silence their tumults.

III. He reneweth the morning and evening; and their revolution is constant, v. 8. This regular succession of day and night may be considered, 1. As an instance of God's great goodness, so it strikes an awe upon all. They that dwell in the utmost parts of the earth are afraid at thy signs or tokens; they are by them convinced that there is a supreme Deity, a sovereign Monarch, before whom they ought to fear and tremble; for in these things the invisible things of God are clearly seen; and therefore they are said to be set for signs, Gen. i. 14. Many of them, that dwell in the remote and dark corners of the earth, were so afraid at these tokens, that they were driven to worship them, (Deut. iv. 19.) not considering that they were God's tokens, undeniable proofs of his power and godhead, and therefore they should have been led by them to worship him. 2. As an instance of God's great goodness, and so it brings comfort to all; Thou makest the outgoings of the morning, before the sun rises, and of the evening, before the sun sets, to rejoice. As it is God that scatters the light of the morning, and draws the curtains of the evening, so he does both in favour to man, and makes both to rejoice, gives occasion to us to rejoice in both; so that, how contrary soever light and darkness are to each other, and how invisible soever the partition between them, (Gen. i. 4.) both are equally welcome to the world in their season: it is hard to say which is more welcome to us, the light of the morning, which befriends the business of the day, or the shadows of the evening, which befriend the repose of the night. Does the watchman wait for the morning? so does the hireling earnestly desire the shadow. Some understand it of the morning and evening sacrifice, which good people greatly rejoiced in, and in which God was constantly honoured. Then makest them to sing, so the word is; for, every morning and every evening, songs of praise were sung by the Levites, it was their charge of duty at every day required. We are to look upon the daily worship, alone, and with our families, to be both the most needful of our daily occupations, and the most delightful of our daily com-forts; and if therein we keep up our communion with God, the outgoings both of the morning and of the evening are thereby made truly to rejoice.

IV. He waters the earth, and makes it fruitful; on this instance of God's power and goodness he enlarges very much. The psalm being, probably, penned upon occasion, it is clear that a more than ordinary plentiful harvest, or of a seasonable rain after long drought. How much the fruitfulness of this lower part of the creation depends upon the influence of the upper, is easy to observe; if the heavens be as brass, the earth is as iron; which is a sensible intimation to a stupid world, that every good and perfect gift is from above, omnia desuper—all from above; we must lift up our eyes above the hills, lift them up to the heavens, where the original springs of all blessings are, be of good cheer, and thither must our praises return; as the first-fruits of the earth were, in the heave-offerings, lifted up towards heaven, by way of acknowledgment that hence they were derived. All God's blessings, even spiritual ones, are expressed by his raining righteousness upon us.

Now observe how the common blessing of rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, is here described. It is with these there is an instance made of the fruitfulness and goodness of God; which is here set forth by a great variety of lively expressions. (1.) God, that made the earth, hereby visits it, sends to it, gives proof of his care of it, v. 9. It is a visit in mercy, which the inhabitants of the earth ought to return in praises. (2.) God, that made it dry land, hereby waters it, in order to its fruitfulness; though the productions of the earth flourished before God had caused it to rain, yet even then, it was the intention, and watered the whole face of the ground, Gen. ii. 5, 6. Our hearts are dry and barren, unless God himself be as the dew to us, and water us; and the plants of his own planting he will water, and make them to increase. (3.) Rain is the river of God, which is full of water, the clouds are the springs of this river, which do not flow at random, but in the channel which God cuts out for it. The showers of rain, as the rivers of water, turn which way soever he pleases. (4.) This river of God enriches the earth, which without it would quickly be a poor thing. The riches of the earth, which are produced out of its surface, are abundantly more useful and serviceable to man than those which are hid in its bowels; we might live well enough without silver and gold, but not without corn and grass.

2. How much benefit is derived from it to the earth, and man upon it:

(1.) To the earth itself; the rain in season gives it a new face; nothing is more reviving, more refreshing, than the rain upon the new-mown grass; (lxii. 6.) even the ridges of the earth, off which the rain seems to slide, are watered abundantly, for they drink in the rain which comes often upon them; the furrows of it, which are turned up by the plough, in order to the seediness, are settled by the rain, and made fruitful by the seed; which is derived from this blessing by being made soft. That which makes the soil of the heart tender, settles it; for the heart is established with that grace. Thus the springing of the year is blessed; and if the spring, that first quarter of the year, be blessed, that is an earnest of a blessing upon the whole year, which God is therefore said to crown with his goodness, (v. 11.) to compass it on every side as the head is compassed with a crown, and to complete the joy of it, as the setting of a crown is said to crown it. And his paths are said to drop fatness; for whatever fatness there is in the earth, which impregnates its productions, it comes from the outgoings of the divine goodness. Wherever God goes, he leaves the tokens of his mercy behind him, (Joel i. 13, 14.) and makes his path thus to shine after him. These communications of God's goodness to this lower world are very extensive and diffusive; (v. 12.) They drop upon the pastures, and furnish the pastures of the inhabited land. The deserts, which man takes no care of, and receives no profit from, are under the care of the Divine Providence, and the profits of them redound to the glory of God, as the great Benefactor of the whole creation, though not immediately to the benefit of man; and we ought to be thankful not only for that which serves us, but for that which serves any part of the creation, and renders it beautiful to the beholder of the Creator. The wilderness, which makes not such returns as the cultivated grounds do, receives as much of the rain of heaven as the most fruitful soil; for God doth good to the evil and unthankful. So extensive are the gifts of God's bounty, that in them the hills, the little hills, rejoice on every side, even the north-side, that lies most from the sun. Hills are not above the need of God's providence; little hills are not below the cognizance of the Creator. But as, when he pleases, he can make them tremble, (Exv. 6.) so, when he pleases, he can make them rejoice.

(2.) To man upon the earth. God, by providing rain for the earth, prepares corn for man, v. 9.

As for the earth, out of it comes bread, (Job xxviii.) 5. for out of it comes corn; but every grain of corn that comes out of it, God himself prepares; and therefore he provides rain for the earth, that thereby he may prepare corn for man, under whose feet he has put the rest of the creatures, and for whose use he has fitted them. When we consider that the yearly produce of the corn is not only an operation of the same power that raises the dead, but an instance of that power not much unlike it, as appears by that of our Saviour, (John xii. 24.) and that the constant benefit we have from it, is an instance of that goodness which endures for ever, we shall have reason to think that it is no less than a God that prepares corn for us. Corn and cattle are the two staple commodities with which the husbandman, who deals immediately in the fruits of the earth, is enriched; and both are owing to the divine goodness in watering the earth, v. 13. To this it is owing that the pastures are clothed with flocks, v. 13. So well stock'd are the pastures, that they seem to be covered over with the cattle that live in them, and yet the pasture not overcharged; so well fed are the cattle, that they are the ornament and the glory of the pastures in which they are fed. The valleys are so fruitful, that they seem to be covered over with corn, in the time of harvest. The lowest parts of the earth are commonly the most fruitful, and one acre of the humble valleys is worth five of the loftiest mountains. But both corn-ground and pasture-ground, answering to the land of their creation, are still to shout for joy, and sing; because they are serviceable to the honour of God and the comfort of man, and because they furnish us with matter for joy and praise. As there is no earthly joy above the joy of harvest, so there were none of the feasts of the Lord, among the Jews, solemnized with greater expressions of thankfulness than the feast of in-gathering at the end of the year, Exod. xxiii. 16. Let all these communications, the height of the mercy, be daily partake of, increase our love to God, as the best of beings, and engage us to glorify him with our bodies, which he thus provides so well for.

PSALM LXVI.

This is a thanksgiving-psalm; and it is of such universal use and application, that we need not suppose it penned upon any particular occasion. All people are here called upon to praise God, I. For the general instances of his sovereign dominion and power in the whole creation, v. 1.-7. II. For the special tokens of his favour in the church, his peculiar people, v. 8.-12. And then, III. The psalmist praiseth God for his own experiences of his goodness to him in particular, especially in answering his prayers, v. 13.-20. If we have learned in everything to give thanks for ancient and modern mercies, published and secret, shall we now fail to learn how to sing this psalm with grace and understanding.

To the chief musician. A song or psalm.

1. MAKE a joyful noise unto God, all ye lands: 2. Sing forth the honour of his name; make his praise glorious. 3. Say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works! through the greatness of thy power shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee. 4. All the earth shall worship thee, and shall sing unto thee; they shall sing to thy name. Selah. 5. Come and see the works of God; he is terrible in his doing toward the children of men. 6. He turned the sea into dry land: they went through the flood on foot: there did we rejoice in him. 7. He ruleth by his power for ever; his eyes behold the nations: let not the rebellious exalt themselves. Selah.

In these verses, the psalmist calls upon all people to praise God, all lands, all the earth, v. 1.; all the inhabitants of the world that are capable of praising God. 1. This speaks the glory of God, that he is worthy to be praised by all, for he is good to all, and furnishes every nation with matter for praise. 2. The duty of man, that all are obliged to praise God; it is part of the law of creation, and therefore is required of every creature. 3. A prediction of the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ; the time should come when all lands should praise God, and this incense should in every place be offered to him. 4. A hearty good-will which the psalmist had to this good work of praising God; he will abound in it himself, and wishes that God might have his tribute paid him by all the nations of the earth, and not by the land of Israel only. He excites all lands, (1.) To make a joyful noise to God: holy joy is that devout affection which should animate all our praises; and though it is not making a noise in religion that God will accept of, (hypocteres are said to cause their voice to be heard on high, Isa. lviii. 4.) yet, in praising God, [1.] We must be hearty and zealous, and must do, what we do, with all our might, with all that is within us; [2.] We must be open and public, as those that are not ashamed of our Master; and both these are implied in making a noise, a joyful joy. (2.) To sing with pleasure, and to sing forth, for the edification of others, the honour of his name, of all that whereby he has made himself known, v. 2. That which is the honour of God's name, ought to be the delight of our praise. (3.) To make his praise glorious, as far as we can. In praising God, we must do it so as to glorify him, and that must be the scope and drift of all our praises. Rock in it your greatest glory to praise God; so some. It is the highest honour the creature is capable of, to be the Creator for a name and a praise.
sent forth, it shall not return void, but shall bring all the earth, more or less, to worship God, and sing unto him. In gospel-times God shall be worshipped by singing of psalms: they shall sing to God, that is, sing to his name, for it is only to his declarative glory, that by which he has made himself known, not to his essential glory, that we can contribute anything by our praises.

That we may be furnished with matter for praise, we are here called upon to consider and see the works of God, of which we are to praise him, whether we do or no; and the reason why we do not praise him more and better, is, because we do not duly and attentively observe them. Let us therefore see God's works, and observe the instances of his wisdom, power, and faithfulness, in them, (v. 5.) and then speak of them, and speak of them to him, (v. 3.) say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works, terrible in thy doing.

1. God's works are wonderful in themselves, and such as, when duly considered, may justly fill us with amazement. God is terrible, that is, admirable in his works, through the greatness of his power, which is such, and shines so bright, so strong, in all he does, that it may be truly said there are not any works like unto his works. Hence he is said to be fearful in praises, Exod. xv. 11. In all his doings toward the children of men, he is terrible, and to be eyed with an holy awe. Much of religion lies in a respect to the Divine Providence.

2. They are formidable to his enemies, and have many a time forced and frightened them into a feigned submission; (v. 3.) Through the greatness of thy power, before which none can stand, shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee, they shall lie unto thee, (so the word is,) they shall be compelled, sore against their wills, to make their peace with thee upon any terms. Remember, also, the objection, which is so often held against natural religion, that is, so proper a means of propagating religion; nor can there be much joy of such prostrates to the church as will in the end be found liars unto it, Deut. xxxiii. 29.

3. They are comfortable and beneficial to his people, v. 6. When Israel came out of Egypt, he turned the sea into dry land before them, which encouraged them to follow God's guidance through the wilderness; when they were to enter Canaan, for their encouragement in their wars, Jordan was divided before them, and they went through that flood on foot; and such foot, so signally owned by heaven, might well pass for cavalry, rather than infantry, in the wars of the Lord. There did the enemies tremble before them; (Exod. xv. 14, 15. Josh. v. 1.) but there did we rejoice in him; both trust his power, (for relying on God is often expressed by rejoicing in him,) and sing his praise, v. 12. There did we rejoice; our ancestors did, and we in their loins. The joys of our fathers were our joys, and we ought to look upon ourselves as sharers in them.

4. They are commanding to all. God by his works keeps up his dominion in the world; (v. 7.) He rules by his power for ever; his eyes behold the nations. (1.) God has a commanding eye; from the throne of his glory he surveys all the habitants of the world, and he has a clear and full view of them all. His eyes run to and fro through the earth; the most remote and obscure nations are under his inspection. (2.) He has a commanding arm; his power rules, rules for ever, and is never weakened, never obstructed; strong is his hand, and high is his right hand. Hence he infers, Let not the rebellious exalt themselves; let not those who are revolting and rebellious hearts dare to rise up in any overt acts of rebellion against God, as Adonijah exalted himself, saying, I will be king; let not those that are in rebellion against God exalt themselves, as if there were any probability that they should gain their point; no, let them be still, for God hath said, I will be exalted, and man can not gainsay it.

3. O bless our God, ye people, and make the voice of his praise to be heard; 9. Which holdeth our soul in life, and suffereth not our feet to be moved. 10. For thou, O God, hast proved us: and thou hast tried us, as silver is tried. 11. Thou broughtest us into the net; thou laidest affliction upon our loins. 12. Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads: we went through fire and through water; but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.

In these verses, the psalmist calls upon God's people in a special manner to praise him. Let all lands do it, but Israel's land particularly. Bless our God; bless him as ours, a God in covenant with us, and that takes care of us as his own. Let them make the voice of his praise to be heard; (v. 8.) for from whom should it be heard, but from those who are his peculiar favourites and select attendants? Two things we have reason to bless God for.

I. Common protection; (v. 9.) He holdeth our soul in life, that it may not drop away of itself; for, being continually in our hands, it is apt to slip through our fingers. We must own that it is the good providence of God that keeps life and soul together, and his visitation that preserves our spirit; he futs our soul in life; so the word is. He that gave us our being, by a constant renewed act upholds us in our being, and his providence is a continued and an unchanging care and protection. When we are ready to faint and perish, he restores our soul, and so puts it, as it were, into a new life, giving new comforts. Non est vivere, sed valere vita—It is not existence, but happiness, that deserves the name of life. But we are apt to stumble and fall, and are exposed to many destructive accidents, killing disasters as well as killing diseases; and therefore as to these also we are guarded by the divine power; he suffers not our disasters, nor does he leave us unprovided for, which we ourselves were not aware of our danger from. To him we owe it that we have not, long ere this, fallen into endless ruin. He will keep the feet of his saints.

II. Special deliverance from great distress. Observe.

1. How grievous the distress and danger were, v. 11, 12. What particular trouble of the church this refers to, does not appear; it might be the trouble of some private persons or families only. But, whatever it was, they were surprised with it, as a bird with a snare, inclosed and entangled in it, as a fish in a net; they were pressed down with it, and kept under as with a load upon their loins, v. 11. But they owned the hand of God in it; we are never in the net, but God brings us into it, never under affliction, but God; yet, it is his hand; it is upon us. Is any among you sick? Let him call for the elders of the church, and let the prayer of faith save him from fire and water? We went through both, afflictions of different kinds; the end of one trouble was the beginning of another; when we had got clear of one sort of dangers, we found ourselves involved in dangers of another sort. Such may be the troubles of the best of God's saints, but he has promised, When thou passest through the waters, through the fire, I will be with thee, Isa. xliii. 2. Yet prove and cruel may be the fire and water, and more so; Be ware of men, Matt. x. 17. When men rose up against us, that was fire and water, and all that is threatening; (cxxiv. 2, 3, 4.) and that was the case here; "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads, to trample upon us and insult over us; to hector and abuse us, nay, and to make perfect slaves of us; they have said to our souls, Bow down, that we may go over," Isa. ii. 23. While it is the pleasure of good princes to rule in the hearts of their subjects, it is the pride of tyrants to ride over their heads. The all-powerful church in this also owns the hand of God, "Thou hast caused them thus to abuse us;" for the most furious oppressor has no power but what is given him from above.

2. How gracious God's design was, in bringing them into this distress and danger. See what the meaning of it is, (v. 10.) Thou, O God, hast proved us, and tried us. Then we are likely to get good by our afflictions, when we look upon them under this notion, for then we may see God's grace and love at the bottom of them, and our own honour and benefit in the end of them. By afflictions we are proved as silver in the fire. (1.) That our graces, by being tried, may be made more evident, and so we may be approved, as silver, when it is touched and marked sterling, and this will be to our praise at the appearing of Jesus Christ, (1 Pet. i. 7.) and perhaps in this world: Job's integrity and constancy were manifested by his afflictions. (2.) That our graces, by being exercised, may be made more strong and active, and so we may be improved, as silver, when it is refined by the fire, and made more clear from its dross; and this will be to our unspeakable advantage, for thus we are made partakers of God's holiness, Heb. xii. 10. Public troubles are for the purifying of the church, Dan. xi. 35. Rev. ii. 10. Deut. viii. 2.

3. How glorious that grace was at last. The troubles of the church will certainly end well; these do so. For (1.) The outlet of the trouble is happy. They are in fire and water, but they get through them; "We went through fire and water, and did not perish in the flames or floods." Whatever the troubles of the saints are, blessed be God, there is a way through them. (2.) The inlet to a better state is much more happy; Thou broughtest us out into a well-watered place, for the word is, like the gardens of the Lord, and therefore fruitful. God brings his people into trouble, that their comforts afterward may be the sweeter, and that their affliction may thus yield the peacable fruit of righteousness, which will make the poorest place in the world a wealthy place.

13. I will go into thy house with burnt-offerings; I will pay thee my vows, 14. Which my lips have uttered, and my mouth hath spoken, when I was in trouble. 15. I will offer unto thee burnt-sacrifices of fatlings, with the incense of rams: I will offer bullocks with goats. Selah. 16. Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul. 17. I cried unto him with my mouth, and he was exulted with my tongue. 18. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me: 19. But verily God hath heard me; he hath attended to the voice of my prayer. 20. Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me.

The psalmist, having before stirred up all people, and all God's people in particular, to bless the Lord, here stirs up himself, and engages himself to do it.

I. In his devotions to his God, v. 13-15. He had called upon others to sing God's praises, and to make a joyful noise with them; but, for himself, his resolutions go further, and he will praise God,

1. By costly sacrifices, which, under the law, were offered to the honour of God. All people had not wherewithal to offer these sacrifices, or wanted zeal enough to urge them on; but he would, David, for his part, being able, is a willing Soul in this chargeable way to pay his homage to God; (v. 13.) I will go into thy house with burnt-offerings. His sacrifices should be public, in the place which God had chosen; "I will go into thy house with them." Christ is our Temple, to whom we must bring our spiritual gifts, and by whom they are sanctified. They should be the best of the kind; burnt-sacrifices, which, as such, were probably the choicest, and most beloved, and such as would be most acceptable at his own table. God, who is the best, must be served with the best we have. The feast God makes for us is a feast of fat things, full of marrow; (Isa. xxv. 6.) and such sacrifices should we bring to him. He will offer bullocks with goats, so liberal would he be in his return of praise, not straitening himself to offer sacrifices which cost him nothing, but that which cost him a great deal; and this with the incense of rams, that is, with the fat of rams, which being burnt upon the altar, the smoke of it would ascend like the smoke of incense. Or, rams with incense. The incense typifies Christ's intercession, without which the fattest of our sacrifices will not be accepted.

2. By a conscientious performance of these vows. We do not pray that God will give us our deliverance out of trouble, unless we make conscience of paying the vows we made when we were in trouble. This was the psalmist's resolution, (v. 13, 14.) I will pay thee my vows, which my lips have uttered when I was in trouble. Note, (1.) It is very common, and very commendable, when we are under the pressure of any affliction, or in the pursuit of any mercy, to make vows, and solemnly to speak of the good things we expect before the Lord; to bind ourselves to fast, to pray, and to do many more things to our duty; not as if this were an equivalent, or valuable consideration, for the favour of God, it is only a qualification for receiving the tokens of that favour. (2.) The vows which we made when we were in trouble, must not be forgotten when the trouble is over, but be carefully performed, for better it is not to vow, than to vow and not pay.

II. In his declarations to his friends, v. 16. He calls together a congregation of good people to hear his thankful narrative of God's favours to him; "Come, and hear, all ye that fear God, for, 1. You will join with me in my praises, and help me in giving thanks." And we should be as desirous of the assistance of those that fear God, in returning thanks for the mercies we have received, as in praying for those we want. 2. You will be edified and encouraged, if you think you have a right to say; The humble shall hear of it, and be glad, (xxxiv. 2.) They that fear thee will be glad when they see me, (cxxxiv. 7.) and therefore let me have their company, and I will declare to them, not to vain carnal people, that will banter it, and make a jest of it," (pearls are not to be cast before swine,) "but to them that fear God, and will make a good use of it, I will declare what God has done for my soul; not in pride and vain-glory, that he might be thought more a favourite of heaven than other people, but for the honour of God, to which we owe this as a just debt, and for the edification of others. Note, God's people should communicate their experiences to each other; we should take all occasions to tell one another of the great and kind things which God has done for us, especially which he has done for our souls, the spiritual blessings with which he has blessed us in heavenly things; these should be most affected with ourselves, and therefore with these we should be desirous to affect others.

Now what was it that God had done for his soul? (1.) He had wrought in him a love to the duty of prayer, and had given him a heart for that duty, (v. 17.) "I cried unto him with my mouth; but if God, among other things done for our souls, had not given us the spirit of adoption, teaching and enabling us to cry, Abba, Father, we should never have done it. That God has given us leave to pray, a command to pray, encouragements to pray, and (to crown all) a heart to pray, is what we have reason to mention, with thankfulness, to his praise; and the more, if we cried in符合的 heart, he was exulted with our tongue, if we were enabled by faith and hope to give glory to him then, when we were seeking for mercy and grace from him, and to praise him for mercy in prospect, though it be not yet in possession. By crying to him do we indeed exult him. He is pleased to reckon himself honoured by the humble believing prayers of the upright, and this is a great thing which he has done for our souls, that he has pleased so far to deal with us, that, in seeking our own welfare, we seek his glory. His exaltation was under my tongue, so it may be read; I was considering in my mind how I might exalt and magnify his name. When prayers are in our mouths, praises must be in our hearts.

(2.) He had wrought in him a dread of sin as an enemy to prayer; (v. 18.) "If I regard iniquity in my heart, I know very well the Lord will not hear me." The Jewish writers, some say, had them that have the leaven of the Pharisees, which is hypocrisy, put a very corrupt gloss upon these words; "If I regard iniquity in my heart, that is, say they, If I allow myself only in heart-sins, and iniquity does not break out in my words and actions, God will not hear me, that is, he will not be offended with me, will take no notice of it, so as to lay it to my charge; as if heart-sins were no sins, in God's account; the falseness of this is the Saviour has shown in his spiritual expositions of the law, Mat. v. But the sense of this place is plain; If I regard iniquity in my heart, that is, "If I have favourable thoughts of it, if I love it, indulge it, and allow myself in it, if I treat it as a friend, and bid it welcome, make provision for it, and am loath to part with it, if I roll it under my tongue as a sweet morsel, though it be but a heart-sin that is thus countenanced and made much of, if I delight in it after the inward man, will not hear my prayer, will not accept it, or be pleased with it, nor can I expect an answer of peace to it." Note, Iniquity, regarded in the heart, will certainly spoil the comfort and success of prayer; for the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord. They that continue in love and league with sin, have no interest either in the promise or in the Mediator, and therefore cannot expect success in prayer.

(3.) He had graciousy granted him an answer of peace to his prayers; (v. 19.) "But verily God has heard me; though, being conscious to myself of much amiss in me, I began to fear that my prayers would have been rejected, yet, to my comfort, I found that God was pleased to regard them." This God did for his soul; by answering his prayer, he gave him a token of his favour, and an evidence that he had when he cried to him with our mouth, he therefore concludes, (v. 20.) Blessed be God. The two foregoing verses are the major and minor propositions of a syllogism; If I regard iniquity in my heart, God will not hear my prayers, that is the proposition; but verily God has heard me, that is the assumption, from which he might have rationally inferred, "Therefore I do not regard iniquity in my heart;" but, in stead of taking the comfort to himself, he gives the praise to God, Blessed be God. Whatever are the premises, God's glory must always be the conclusion; God has heard me, and therefore blessed be God. Note, What we win by prayer, we must wear with praise. Mercies, in answer to prayer, do, in a sense, to speak the manner, oblige us to be thankful. He has not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy; lest it should be thought that the deliverance was granted for the sake of some worthiness in his prayer, he ascribes it to God's mercy. This he adds by way of correction, "It was not my prayer that fetched the deliverance, but his mercy that sent it." Therefore God does not turn away our prayer, because he does not turn away his own mercy, for that is the foundation of our hopes, and the fountain of our comforts, and therefore ought to be the matter of our praise.

PSALM LXVII.

This psalm relates to the church, and is calculated for the public. Here is, 1. A prayer for the prosperity of the church of Israel, v. 1. 2. A prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles, v. 5. 3. A prayer for the progress of the church, v. 2. 5. 3. A prospect of happy and glorious times, when God shall do this, v. 6. 7. Thus was the psalmist carried out by the spirit of prophecy, to foretell the glorious estate of the church of Zion, in which Jewish and Gentile church shall unite into one fold, this psalm being of which blessed work ought to be the matter of our joy and praise, and the completing of it of our prayer and hope, in singing this psalm.

To the chief musician on Neginoth. A psalm or song.

I. GOD be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us. Selah. 2. That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations. 3. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. 4. O let the nations be glad, and sing for joy; for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth. Selah. 5. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. 6. Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us. 7. God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him.

The composition of this psalm is such as denotes the penman's affections to have been very warm and lively; by which spirit of devotion he was elevated to receive the spirit of prophecy concerning the enlargement of God's kingdom.

1. He begins with a prayer for the welfare and prosperity of the church then in being, in the happiness of which he should share, and think himself happy. 2. Our Saviour, in teaching us thus, Our Father, has intimated that we ought to pray with and for others; so the psalmist here prays not, God be merciful to me, and bless me, but to us, and bless us; for we must make supplication for all saints, and be willing and glad to take our lot with them. We are here taught, Thy all our happiness comes from God's mercy, and takes rise in that; and therefore the first thing prayed for is, God be merciful to us, and bless us, as if he were willing to us sinners, and pardon our sins, (Luke xiii. 13.) to us miserable sinners, and help us out of our miseries. 2. That it is conveyed by God's blessing, and secured in that; God bless us, give us an interest in his promises, and confer upon us all the good contained in them. God's speaking well to us, amounts to his doing well for us. God be blessed; a comprehensive prayer; it is ity such excellent words should ever be used slightly and carelessly, and as a by-word. 3. That it is completed in the light of his countenance; God cause his face to shine upon us, God by his grace qualify us for his favour, and then give us the tokens of his favour. We need desire no more to make us happy, than to have God's face shine upon us, to have God love us, and let us know that he loves us;
The shine with us; so the main part of the work of our endeavour, and let it crown that endeavour with success. If we by faith walk with God, we may hope that his face will shine with us.
II. He passes from this to a prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles; (v. 2.) That thy way may be known upon earth. "Lord, I pray not only that thou wilt be merciful to us and bless us, but that thou wilt be merciful to all mankind, that thy way may be known upon earth." Thus public-spirited must we be in our prayers, Father in heaven, hollowed be thy name, thy kingdom come. We shall have never the less of God's mercy, and blessing, and favour, for others coming in to share with us.
Or it may be taken thus, "God be merciful to us Jews, and bless us, that thereby thy way may be known upon earth; that, by the peculiar distinguishing tokens of thy favour to us, others may be allured to seek and find themselves to us, saying, He will go with you, for the Psalms have heard that God is with you." Zech. viii. 23. These verses, which point at the conversion of the Gentiles, may be taken, 1. As a prayer; and so it speaks the desire of the Old Testament saints; so far were they from wishing to monopolize the privileges of the church, that they desired nothing more than the throwing down of the inclosure, and the laying open of the advantages.
See then how the spirit of the Jews, in the days of Christ and his apostles, differed from the spirit of their fathers. The Israelites indeed, that were of old, desired that God's name might be known among the Gentiles, those counterfeit Jews were enraged at the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles; nothing in Christianity exasperated them so much as that did. 2. As a prophecy; that it shall be as he here prays. Many scripture-prophecies and promises are wrapt up in prayers, to intimate, that the saving work of God's kingdom is so wrought that the prayer is as sure as the performance of God's promises.

Three things are here prayed for, with reference to the Gentiles.

(1.) That divine revelation might be sent among them, v. 2. Two things he desires might be known upon earth, even among all nations, and not to the nation of the Jews only. 1. God's way, the rule duty; "Let them all know, as well as we do, what is good, and what Evil God requires of them; let them be blessed and honoured with the same righteous statutes and judgments, which are so much the praise of our nation, and the envy of all its neighbours," Deut. iv. 8. 2. His saving health, or his salvation; the former is wrapt up in his law, this in his gospel. If God makes known his way to us, and we walk in it, he will show us his saving health, I. 23. They that have themselves experienced the sweetness of God's salvation, cannot but expect the comfort of his salvation, cannot but desire and pray that they may be known to others, even among all nations. All upon earth are bound to walk in God's way, all need his salvation, and there is in it enough for all; and therefore we should pray, that both the one and the other may be made known to all.

(2.) That divine worship may be set up among them, as it will be where divine revelation is recieved and embraced; (v. 3.) "Let the people praise thee, O God, let them have matter for praise, let them have hearts for praise; yea, let not only some, but all the people praise thee;" all nations in their national capacity, so ran the psalmist's prayer, under repeat, (v. 5.) as that which the psalmist's heart was very much upon. They that delight in praising God themselves, cannot but desire that others also may be brought to praise him; that he may have the honour of it, and they may have the benefit of it. It is a prayer, [1.] That the gospel might be preached to them, and then they would have cause indeed to praise God, and in the day-spring after a long and dark night. "Orietur sol, et spero, that the sun is risen. Acts viii. 8. [2.] That they might be converted and brought into the church, and then they would have a disposition to praise God, the living and true God, and not the dumb and dead thing dees they had worshipped, Dan. v. 4. Then their hard thoughts of God would be silenced, and they would see him, in the gospel-glasse, to be love itself, and the proper object of praise. [3.] That they might be incorporated into sacred assemblies, and might praise God in a body, that they might all together praise him with one mind and one mouth. Thus a face of religion appears upon a land, when God is publicly owned, and the ordinances of religious worship are duly celebrated in religious assemblies.

(3.) That the divine government may be acknowledged and cheerfully submitted to; (v. 4. ) O let the nations be glad, and sing for joy. Holy joy, joy in God, and in his name, is the heart and soul of profitable praise. That all the people may praise thee, let the nations be glad. They that rejoice in the Lord always, will in every thing give thanks. The joy he wishes to the nations, is, holy joy; for it is joy in God's dominion, joy that God has taken to himself his great power, and has reigned, which the uncon-verted nations are angry at, Rev. xi. 17, 18. Let them be glad. [1.] That the kingdom is the Lord's, Isa. xxiv. 23. That he, as an absolute Sovereign, shall govern the nations upon earth. That by the reign of his providence he shall overrule the affairs of kings and princes, according to the counsel of his will, though they neither know him nor own him; and that in due time he shall discipline all nations by the preaching of his gospel, (Matth. xxviii. 19.) and set up the kingdom of his grace among them, upon the ruin of the Devil's kingdom. That he shall make them a willing people in a truth that shall have power, and even the kingdom of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ. [2.] That every man's judgment proceed from the Lord;
"Let them be glad that thou shalt judge the people righteousness, that thou shalt give a law and gospel which shall be a righteous rule of judgment, and shall pass an unerring sentence, according to that rule, upon all the children of men; against which there will be no exceptions, so let us be glad that they are not to be judged by another's judgment but that judges us is the Lord, whose judgment we are sure is according to truth.

III. He concludes with a joyful prospect of all good, when God shall do this, when the nations shall be converted, and brought to praise God.
1. The lower world shall smile upon them, and they shall have the fruits of that; (v. 6.) Then shall the earth yield her increase again, not but that God gave rain from heaven, and gave fruitfulness to the nation, even when they sat in darkness; (Acts xiv. 17.)
But, when they were converted, the earth yielded its increase to God; the meat and the drink then became a meat-offering and a drink-offering to the Lord our God; (Joel ii. 14.) and then it was fruitful to some good purpose. Then it yielded its increase more than before, to the comfort of men, who through Christ acquired a covenant-right to the fruits of it, and had a sanctified use of it. Note, The su-PSALMS, LXVIII.

This is a most excellent psalm, but in many places the genuine sense is not easy to come at; for in this, as in some other scriptures, there are things dark and hard to be understood. It does not appear when, or upon what occasion, David penned this psalm; but probably, it was when, God having given him rest from all his enemies round about, he brought the ark (which was both the token of God's presence and a type of Christ's mediation) from the house of Obed-edom to the tent he had pitched for it in Jerusalem, and set up the setting up of the ark in the midst of the land. 1. He begins with prayer, both against God's enemies, (v. 1, 2,) and for his people, v. 3. II. He proceeds to praise, which takes up the rest of the psalm, calling upon all to praise God, (v. 4, 26, 32,) and suggesting many things as matter for praise.

I. The goodness and goodness of God, v. 4–6. II. The wonderful works God had wrought for his people formerly, bringing them through the wilderness, (v. 7, 8,) settling them in Canaan, (v. 9, 10,) giving them victory over their enemies, (v. 11, 12,) and delivering them out of the hands of their oppressors, v. 13, 14. 3. The special presence of God in his church, (v. 15–17.) 4. The ascension of Christ, (v. 18,) and the salvation of his people by him, v. 19, 20. 5. The victories which Christ would obtain over his enemies, and the favours he would bestow upon his church, v. 21–26. 6. The enlargement of the church by the unnumbered converts to it, v. 27–31. So he concludes the psalm with a victorious acknowledgment of the glory and grace of God, v. 32, 33. With all these great things we should endeavour to be duly affected in singing this psalm.

To the chief musician. A psalm or song of David.

1. Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered: let them also that hate him flee before him. 2. As smoke is driven away, so drive them away: as wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God. 3. But let the righteous be glad: let them rejoice before God; yea, let them exceedingly rejoice. 4. Sing unto God, sing praises unto his name; extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH, and rejoice before him. 5. A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation. 6. God setteth the solitary in families: he bringeth out those which are bound with chains; but the rebellious dwell in a dry land.

In these verses, I. David prays that God would appear in his glory; 1. For the confusion of his enemies; (v. 1, 2,) "Let God arise, as a Judge to pass sentence upon them, as a General to take the field and do execution upon them; and let them be scattered, and flee before him, as unable to keep their ground, much less to make head against him. Let God arise, as the sun when he goes forth in his strength; and the children of Israel shall be scattered; and the ends of the earth shall be afraid of the rising of the sun. Let them be driven away as smoke by the wind, which ascends as if it would eclipse the sun, but is presently dispelled, and there appears no remainder of it; Let them melt as wax before the fire, which is quickly dissolved." Thus does David comment upon Moses's prayer, and not only repeat it, with application to himself and his own times, but enlarge upon it, to direct us how to make use of scripture-prayers. Nay, it looks further to the Redeemer's victory over the enemies of his kingdom, for he was the Angel of the covenant, that guided Israel through the wilderness. Note, (1.) There are, and have been, and ever will be, such as are enemies to God, and hate him; that join in with the old serpent against the kingdom of God among men, and against the seed of the woman. (2.) They are the wicked, and none but the wicked, that are enemies to God; the children of the wicked one. (3.) Though we are to pray for our enemies as such, yet we are to pray against God's enemies as such, against their enmity to him, and all their attempts upon his kingdom. (4.) If God but arise, all his impatient impecunious enemies, that will not repent to give him glory, will certainly and speedily be scattered, and driven away, and made to perish at his presence; for none ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered. The day of judgment will be the day of the complete and final perdition of ungodly men, (2 Pet. iii. 7,) who shall melt like wax before that flaming fire in which the Lord shall then appear, 2 Thess. i. 8.

2. For the comfort and joy of his own people; (v. 3.) "Let the righteous be glad, that are now in sorrow, let them rejoice before God, in his favourble presence. God is the Joy of his people, let them rejoice with him: let them come before God, let them exceedingly rejoice, let them rejoice with gladness." Note, Those who rejoice in God have reason to rejoice with exceeding joy; and this joy we ought to wish to all the saints, for it belongs to them, Light is shown for the righteous.

II. He prays God for his glorious appearances, and calls upon us to praise him, to sing to his name, and extol him, as God that infinitely great; (v. 4.) He rides upon the heavens, by his name JAH. He is the Spring of all the motions of the heavenly bodies, directs and manages them, as he that rides in the chariot, sets it a-going; has a supreme command of the influences of heaven; he rides upon the heavens for the help of his people, (Deut. xxxiii. 26,) so swiftly, so strongly, and so much above the reach of opposition. He rules these by his name Jah, or Jehovah, a self-existent, self-sustaining Being, the Founder of all being, the Ruler of all motion, and perfection; this is his name for ever. When we thus extol God, we must rejoice before him; holy joy in God will very well consist with that reverence and godly fear wherewith we ought to worship him.

2. As a gracious God, a God of mercy, and tender compassion. He is great, but he despises not any, no not the meanest; nay, being a God of great power, he uses his power for the relief of those who are distressed, ver. 8. The fatherless, the widows, the solitary, find him a God all-sufficient to them. Observe how much God's goodness is his glory. He that rides on the heavens, by his name Jah, one would think, should have immediately been made as King of kings and Lord of lords, and the sovereign Director of all the affairs of states and nations; he is so, but this he rather glories in, that he is a Father to the fatherless. Though God be high, yet has he respect to the lonely. Happy they that have an interest in such a God as this. He that rides upon the heavens is a Father worth having; thrice happy is the people whose God is the Lord.

(1.) When families are bereaved of their head, God takes care of them, and is himself their Head; and the widows and the fatherless children shall find that in him which they have lost in the relation that is removed, and infinitely more and better. He is a Father of the fatherless, to pity them, to bless them, to teach them, to provide for them, and to portion them. He will preserve them alive, (Jer. xliv. 11.) and with them he shall find mercy, Hos. xiv. 3. They have liberty to call him Father, and to plead their relation to him as their Guardian, ex. xlvi. 9—x. 14, 18. He is a Judge or Patron of the widows, to give them counsel, and to do them right; to own them, and plead their cause, Prov. xxiii. 23. He has an ear open to all their complaints, and a heart open to all their wants. He is so in his holy habitation; which may be understood either of the habitation of his glory in heaven, (there he has prepared his throne of judgment, which the fatherless and widow have free recourse to, and are under the protection of, ix. 4, 7.) or, of the habitation of his grace on earth; and so it is a direction to the widows and fatherless, how to apply themselves to God; let them go to his holy habitation, to his word and ordinances, and apply the grace of his hand, and find comfort in him.

(2.) When families are to be built up, he is the Founder of them; God sets the solitary in families, brings them into comfortable relations that were lonely, gives them a convenient settlement that were unsettled; (ex. xlix. 9.) he makes those dwell at home that were forced to seek for relief abroad, (so Dr. Hammond,) putting them that were destitute into a way of getting their livelihood, which is a very good way; and this is a work for God to do, that he may have glory in it.

3. As a righteous God. (1.) In relieving the oppressed; he brings out those that are bond with chains, and sets them at liberty, who were unjustly imprisoned, and brought into servitude. No chains can detain those whom God will make free. (2.) In reckoning with the oppressors; The rebellious dwell in a dry land, and have no comfort in that which they have got by fraud and injury. The hard service inflicted on the land to which the rebellion have forfeited the blessing of God, which is the juice and fatness of all our enjoyments. Israel were brought out of Egypt into the wilderness, but were there better provided for than the Egyptians themselves, whose land, if Niphlus failed them, as it sometimes did, was a dry land.

7. O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march through the wilderness; Selah: 8. The earth shook, the heavens also dropped at the presence of God: even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God, the God of Israel. 9. Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary. 10. Thy congregation hath dwelt therein: thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor. 11. The Lord gave the word; great was the company of those that published it.

12. Kings of armies did flee apace; and she that tarried at home divided the spoil. 13. Though ye have lien among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold. 14. When the Almighty scattered kings in it, it was white as snow in Salmon. The psalmist here, having occasion to give God thanks for the great things he had done for him and his people of late, takes occasion thence to praise him for what he had done for their fathers in the days of old. Fresh mercies should put us in mind of former mercies, and revive our grateful sense of them. Let it never be forgotten.

1. That God himself was the Guide of Israel through the wilderness; when he had brought them out of their chains, he did not leave them in the dry land, but himself went before them, in a march through the wilderness, v. 7. It was not a journey but a march, for they went as soldiers, as an army with banners. The Egyptians promised themselves that the wilderness would shut them in, but they were deceived; God's Israel having him for their Leader, marched through the wilderness, and were not lost in it. Note, If God bring his people into a wilderness, he will be sure to go before them in it, and bring them out of it. Cant. viii. 5.

II. That he manifested his glorious presence with them at mount Sinai, v. 8. Never did any people see the glory of God, nor hear his voice, as Israel did, Deut. iv. 32, 33. Never had any people such an excellent law given them; so expounded, so enforced. Then the earth shook, and the neighbouring countries, it is likely, felt the shock; terrible thunders there were, accompanied, no doubt, with thunder-showers, in which the heavens seemed to drop; while the divine doctrine dropped as the rain, Deut. xxxiii. 2. Sinai itself, that vast mountain, that long ridge of mountains, was moved at the presence of God; see Judg. v. 4, 5. Deut. xxxiii. 2. Hab. iii. 3. This terrible appearance of the Divine Majesty, as it would possess them with a fear and dread of him, so it would encourage their faith in him, and do them good. Whatever mountains of difficulty lay in the way of their happy settlement, he that could move Sinai itself, could remove them, could get over them.

III. That he provided very comfortably for them both in the wilderness and in Canaan; (v. 9, 10.) Thou didst send a plentiful rain, and hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor. This may refer, 1. To the victorious act of their camp with manna in the wilderness, which was rained upon them, as well as also the quails, (xxxviii. 24, 27.) and it might be fitly called a rain of liberality or munificence, for it was a memorable instance of the divine bounty. This confirmed the camp of Israel, (here called God's inheritance, because he had chosen them to be a peculiar treasure to himself,) when it was weary, and ready to perish; this confirmed their faith, and was a proof of God's power and goodness. Even in the wilderness God found a comfortable dwelling for Israel, which was his congregation. Or, 2. To the seasonable supplies granted them in Canaan, that land flowing with milk and honey, which is said to drink water of the rocks of Deut. xi. 11.

V. This is applicable to the victories obtained by the exalted Redeemer, for those that are his, over death and hell. By the resurrection of Christ our spiritual enemies were made to flee, their power was broken, and they were for ever disabled to hurt any of God's people. This victory was first noticed by the women (the she-publishers) to the disciples, (Matth. xxviii. 7.) and by them it was preached to all the world; while believers that tarry at home, that did not see it, neither write it down, nor publish it, enjoyed the benefit of it, and divide the spoil.

V. That, from a low and despaired condition, they had been advanced to splendid and prosperity. When they were bond-slaves in Egypt, and afterward, when they were oppressed sometimes by one potent neighbour, and sometimes by another, they did, as it were, lie among the pots or rubbish, as despised broken vessels, or as vessels in which there was no pleasure—they were black, and dirty, and dishonoured. But God, at length, delivered them from the pots; (Ixxxvi. 6.) and in David's time they were in a fair way to be one of the most prosperous kingdoms in the world, amiable in the eyes of all about them, like the wings of a dove covered with silver, v. 13. "And so, says Dr. Hammond, under Christ's kingdom, the heathen idolaters, that were brought to the basest and most despicable condition of any creatures, worshipping wood and stone, and given up to the vilest lusts, should, from that day forth, take comfort, as one of the service of Christ, and the practice of all Christian virtues, the greatest inward beauties in the world." It may be applied also to the deliverance of the church out of a suffering state, and the comforts of particular believers after their despondencies.

15. The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; a high hill, as the hill of Bashan. 16. Why leap ye, ye high hills? this is the hill which God desireth to dwell in; yea, the Lord will dwell in it for ever. 17. The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them as in Sinai, in the holy place. 18. Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God might dwell among them. 19. Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits, even God of our salvation. Selah. 20. He that is our God is the God of salvation; and unto God the Lord belong the issues from death. 21. But God shall wound the head of his enemies, and the hairy scalp of such a one as goeth on still in his trespasses.

David, having given God praise for what he had done for Israel in general, as the God of Israel, (v. 8.) here comes to give him praise as Zion's God in a special manner; compare ix. 11. Sing praises to the Lord which dwelleth in Zion, for which reason Zion is called the hill of God. 1. He compares it with the hill of Bashan, and other high and fruitful hills, and prefers it before them, v. 15, 16. It is true, Zion was but little and low, in comparison with them, and was not covered over with flocks and herds as they were, yet, upon this account, it has the pre-eminence above them all, that it is the hill of God, the hill which he de- sires to dwell in, and which he favoureth above all others. 2. Note, It is much more honourable to be holy to God, than to be high and great in the world. "Why leap ye, ye high hills? Why do you insult over poor Zion, and boast of your own height? This is the hill which God has chosen, and therefore, though you exceed it in bulk, and be first-rates, yet, because on this the royal flag is hoisted, you must all strike sail to it. "Zion was especially honourable, because it was a type of the gospel-church, which is therefore called mount Zion, (Heb. xii. 22.) and this is intimated here, when he said, The Lord will dwell in it for ever, which must have its accomplishment in the gospel Zion. There is no kingdom in the world comparable to the kingdom of the Redeemer, ne city comparable to that which is incorporated by the gospel-charter, for there God dwells, and will dwell for ever.

II. He compares it with mount Sinai, of which he had spoken, (v. 8.) and shows that it has the She-power of Sin and Satan in it, that the effectual is not as sensibly, as Sinai itself had, v. 17. Angels are the chariots of God, his chariots of war, which he makes use of against his enemies; his chariots of conveyance, which he sends for his friends, as he did for Elijah, and Lazarus is said to be carried by the angels; his chariots of state, in the midst of which he shows his glory and power. They are vastly numerous; twenty thousands, even thousands multiplied, is comprised of angels in the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. xi. 22. The enemies David fought with had chariots; (2 Sam. viii. 4.) but what were they, for number or strength, to the chariots of God? While David had them on his side, he needed not to fear those that trusted in chariots and horses, xx. 7. God appeared on mount Sinai, attended with myriads of angels, by whose dispensation the law was given, Acts vii. 52. He comes with ten thousands of saints, Dan. vii. 14. And still in Zion God manifests his glory, and is really present, with a numerous retinue of his heavenly hosts, signified by the cherubims, between which God is said to dwell. So that, as some read the last words of the verse, Sinai is in the sanctuary; the sanctuary was to Israel instead of mount Sinai, whence they received divine oracles. Our Lord Jesus has these chariots at command; when the First Begotten was brought into the world, it was with this charge. Let all the angels of God worship him; (Heb. i. 6.) they attended him upon all occasions, and he is now among them, angels, principalities, and powers, being made subject to him, 1 Pet. iii. 22. And it is intimated in the New Testament, that the angels are present in the solemn religious assemblies of Christians, 1 Cor. xi. 10. Let the woman have a veil on her head, because of the angels; and see Eph. iii. 10.

III. The glory of mount Zion was, the King whom God set on the holy hill, (v. 6.) who came to the daughter of Zion, Matth. xxi. 5. Of his ascension the psalmist here speaks, and to it is expressly applied, (Eph. iv. 8.) Thou hast ascended on high; (v. 18.) compare xlvii. 5, 6. Christ's ascending on high is here spoken of as a thing past, so sure was it; and spoken of to his honour, so great was it. It may include his whole exalted state, but points especially at his ascension into heaven to the right hand of the Father, which was as much our advantage as his advancement. For, 1. He then triumphed over the gates of hell; he led captivity captive; he led his captives in triumph, as great conquerors used to do, making a show of them openly, Col. ii. 15. He led those captives who had led us captives, and who, if he had not interposed, would have held us captive for ever. Nay, he led captivity itself captive, having quite broken the dungeon and the prison of death, he was the Captivity of captivity, Hos. xiii. 14. This speaks the complete victory which Jesus Christ obtained over our spiritual enemies; it was such, that through him we also are more than conquerors, that is, triumphers, Rom. viii. 37. 2. He then opened the gates of heaven to all believers; Thou hast received gifts for men; he gave gifts to men, so the apostle reads it, Eph. iv. 8. For he received power on his hands from the anointing of the Spirit was poured, that from him it might descend to the skirts of his garments. And he gave what he had received; having received power to give eternal life, he bestows it upon as many as were given him, John xvii. 2. Thou hast received gifts for men, not for angels; fallen angels were not to be made saints, nor standing angels made gospel ministers, Heb. ii. 5. Not for Jews only, but for all men; whoever will may reap the benefit of these gifts. The apostle tells us what these gifts were, (Eph. iv. 11.) prophets, apostles, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, the institution of a gospel-ministry, and the three; that we have for both which are to be valued as the gifts of Heaven, and the fruits of Christ's ascension. Thou hast received gifts in man; so the margin; that is, in the human nature which Christ was pleased to clothe himself with, that he might be a merciful and faithful High-Priest in things pertaining to God. In him, as Mediator, all fulness dwells, that from his fulness we might receive. To magnify the kindness of his love, of Christ taketh his seat to receive gifts for us, the psalmist observes, (1.) The forefathers had made of them. He received them for the rebellious also, for those that had been rebellious; so all the children of men had been in their fallen state; perhaps it is especially meant of the Gentiles, that had been enemies in their minds by wicked works, Col. i. 21. For them these gifts are received, to them they are given, that they might lay hold on their arms, that their eminence might be slain, and that the Lord might set up his throne over them. This magnifies the grace of Christ exceedingly, that through him rebels are, upon their submission, not only pardoned, but preferred. They have commission given them under Christ, which some say, in our law, amounts to the reversing of an attainer, Christ came to a rebellious world not to condemn it, but that through him it might be saved. (2.) The favour designed us in them; He received gifts for the rebellious, that the Lord God might dwell among them; that he might set up his throne, and Christ might dwell in the hearts of particular persons that had been rebellious. The gracious intention of Christ's undertaking was to rear up the tabernacle of God among men, that he might dwell with them, and they might be living temples to his praise, Ezek. xxxvi. 37.

IV. The glory of Zion's King, is, that he is a Saviour and Benefactor to all his willing people, and a consuming Fire to all those that persist in rebellion against him, v. 19., 21. We have here good and evil, life and death, the blessing and the curse, set before us, like that, (Mark xvi. 16.) He that believeth shall be saved; he that believes not shall be damned. 1. They that take God for their God, and so give upon themselves to him to be his people, shall be loaded with his benefits, and to them he will be a God of salvation. If in sincerity we avouch God to be our God, and seek to him as such, (1.) He will continually do us good, and furnish us with occasion for praise. Having mentioned the gifts Christ received for us, (v. 18.) fitly does he subjoin, in the next words, Blessed be the Lord, for it is owing to the mediation of Christ, that his people live comfortably, and are daily loaded with benefits. So many, so weighty, are the gifts of God's bounty to us, that he may be truly said to load us with them; he pours out blessings till there be no room to receive them, Mal. iii. 10. So constant are they, and so unwearyed is he in doing us good, that he daily loads us with them, according as the necessity of every day requires. (2.) He will, at length, be glorious among us, and will give them the everlasting salvation, the salvation of God, which he will show to them that order their conversation aright, (1. 25.) the salvation of the soul. He that daily loads us with benefits will not put us off with present things for a portion, but will be the God of our salvation; and what he gives us now, he gives as the God of salvation, pursuant to the great design of our salvation. He is our God, and therefore he will be the God of eternal salvation to us, for that only will answer the vast extent of his covenant-relation to us as our God. But has he power to complete this salvation? Yes, certainly, for unto God the Lord belong the issues from death. The keys of hell and death are put into the hand of the Lord Jesus, Rev. i. 18. He can and will judge an escape from death himself in his resurrection, has both authority and power to rescue those that are his from the dominion of death, by altering the property of it to them when they die, and giving them a complete victory over it when they shall rise again; for the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. And to those that shall thus for ever escape death, and shall find such an outlet from it as not to be hurt of the second death, to them surely all deliverance from temporal death are mercies indeed, and come from God as the God of their salvation. See 2 Cor. i. 10.

2. They that persist in their enmity to him, will certainly be ruined, (v. 21.) God shall wound the head of his enemies, of Satan the old serpent, of whom it was by the first promise foretold, that the Seed of the woman should break his head, Gen. iii. 15. He shall destroy all the powers of the nations, whether Jews or Gentiles, that oppose him and his kingdom among men, ex. 6. He shall wound the heads over many countries; of all those, whoever they are, that will not have him to reign over them, for those he accounts his enemies, and they shall be brought forth and slain before him, Luke xix. 27. He will wound the hairy scalp of such a one as goeth on still in his trespasses. Note, Those who go on still in their trespasses, and hate to be reformed, God looks upon as his enemies, and will treat them accordingly. In calling the head the hairy scalp, perhaps there is an allusion to Absalom, whose bushy hair was his halter. Or it denotes either the most fierce and barbarous of his enemies, who let their hair grow, to make themselves look the more frightful; or the most fine and delicate of his enemies, who are nice about their hair. He neither delivers them in his own person, nor delivers them from the fatal wounds which Divine Justice will give to the heads of those that go on in their sins.

22. The Lord said, I will bring again from Bashan; I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea: 23. That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same. 24. They have seen thy goings, O God; even the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary. 25. The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels. 26. Bless ye God in the congregations, even the Lord from the fountain of Israel. 27. There is little Benjamin with their ruler, the princes of Judah and their council, the princes of Zebulun, and the princes of Naphtali. 28. Thy God hath commanded thy strength: strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us. 29. Because of the temple at Jerusalem shall kings bring presents unto thee. 30. Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people, till every one submit himself with pieces of silver; scatter thou the people that delight in war. 31. Princes shall come out of Egypt; Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.

In these verses, we have three things.

I. The gracious promise which God makes of the redemption of his people, and their victory over his and their enemies; (v. 22, 23.) The Lord said, in his own gracious purpose and promise, "I will do great things for my people, as the God of their salvation," v. 20. God will not fail the expectations of those who by faith take him for their God. It is promised, 1. That he will set them in safety from their danger, as he had done formerly: I will again bring them from the depths of the sea, as he did Israel, when he brought them out of the slavery of Egypt into the case and liberty of the wilderness; and I will again bring them from Bashan, as he did Israel, when he brought them from their wants and wanderings in the wilderness into the fulness and settlement of the land of Canaan; for the land of Bashan was on the other side Jordan, where they had wars with Sihon and Og, and whence their next removal was into Canaan. Note, The former appearances of God's power and goodness for his people should encourage their faith and hope in him for the future, that what he has done he will do again. He will set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people; (Isa. xi. 11.) and we may perhaps see repeated all the wonders which our fathers told us of. But this is not all; 2. That he will make them victorious over their enemies; (v. 23.) That thy feet may be dipped, as the footman in the blood of the powerful, in the blood of thy enemies; as the footman of Saul shed like water in great abundance, and the tongue of thy dogs may lap in the same. Dogs licked the blood of Ahab; and, in the destruction of the anti-Christian generation, we read of blood up to the horses' bridles, Rev. xiv. 20. The victories with which God blessed David's forces over the enemies of Israel are here prophesied of; but as types of Christ's victor over death and the grave, for himself, and for all believers, in his resurrection and theirs by virtue of his) out of the earth; and of the destruction of the enemies of Christ and his church, who shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy.

II. The welcome entertainment which God's own people shall give to these glorious discoveries of his grace, both in his word and in his works. Has he spoken in his holiness? Has he said he will bring again from Bashan? What then is required of us in return to this?

1. That we observe his motions; (v. 24.) "They have seen, thy people have seen, thy goings, O God; while others regard not the work of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands, they have seen the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary." See here, (1.) How an active faith appropriates God; he is God and King; but that is not all, he is my God and my King. Though he thus take him for theirs, may see him, in all his outgoings, acting as their God, as their King, for their good, and in answer to their prayers. (2.) Where God's most remarkable outgoings are; even in the sanctuary, in and by his word and ordinances; and among his people, in the gospel-church especially, in and by which is made known the manifold wisdom of God. These outgoings of his in the sanctuary for our instruction, the outgoings of the morning and the evening, and more loudly proclaim his eternal power and godhead. (3.) What is our duty in reference to these outgoings?
ings, which is to observe them. This is the finger of God; surely God is with us of a truth.
2. That we give him glory in the most devout and solemn manner. When we see his going in his sanctuary,

(1.) Let those that are immediately employed in the service of the temple praise him, v. 25. It was asserted that the Levites, some of whom were singers, and others players on instruments, who had the nearest views of his outings in his sanctuary, should lead in his praises. And, it being a day of extraordinary triumph, among them were damnsel playing with timbrels, to complete the concert.

"Thy God" (God the Father) "has commanded thy strength," has made thee strong for himself, as the man of his right hand, (Ixx. 17.) has treasured up strength in thee for us; therefore we pray, that thou, O Son, wilt strengthen what thou hast wrought for us, will accomplish thine undertaking for us, by finishing thy good work in us." III. The powerful invitation and inducement which would thereby be given to those that are without, to come in and join themselves to the church, v. 29—31. "This was in part fulfilled by the success which the preachers to the Jewish religion in the days of David and Solomon had; but it was to have its full accomplishment in the conversion of the Gentile nations to the faith of Christ, and the making of them fellow-heirs, and of the same body, with the seed of Israel, Eph. iii. 6.

1. Some shall submit for fear; (v. 30.) "The company of shearmen, that stand it out against Christ and his gospel, that are not willing to be ruled by him, that persecute the preachers and profaners of his church, that are turned every one of them according to his own inclinations, as a multitude of bulls, fat and wanton as the calves of the people," (which is a description of those Jews and Gentiles that opposed the gospel of Christ, and did what they could to prevent the setting up of his kingdom in the world,) "Lord, rebuke them, abate their pride, assuage their malice, and confound their devices, till conquered by the convictions of their consciences, and the many checks of providence, they come to know and own, at length, to submit themselves with pieces of silver, with gladness to make their peace with the church upon any terms." Even Judas submitted himself with pieces of silver, when he returned them with this confession, I have betrayed innocent blood. And see Rev. iii. 9. Many, by being rebuked, have been happily saved from being ruined. But as for those that will not submit, notwithstanding these rebukes, they play for their dispersion, which amounts to a prophecy of it; Scattered thou the people that delight in war, who take such a pleasure in opposing Christ, that they will never be reconciled to him. This may refer to the unbelieving Jews, who delighted in making war upon the holy seed, and would not submit themselves, and were therefore scattered over the face of the earth. David had himself been a man of war; but could appeal to God, that he never delighted in war and bloodshed for its own sake; as for those that did, and therefore would not submit to the fairest terms of peace, he does not doubt but God would scatter them. Those are left to all the sacred principles of humanity, as well as Christianity, that can delight in war, and take a pleasure in contention; let them expect, that sooner or later, they shall have enough of it, Isa. xxxiii. 1. Rev. xiii. 10.

2. Others shall submit willingly; (v. 29, 31.) Because of thy temple at Jerusalem, (this David speaks of in faith, for the temple of Jerusalem was not built in his time, only the materials and model were prepared,) kings shall bring presents unto thee, rich presents shall be brought, such as are fit for kings to bring. Even kings themselves, that stand much upon the punctilios of honour and prerogative, shall court the favour of Christ, at a great expense. The temple is God's temple, that beauty in the service of God; the temple was sanctified with him, and in the gospel of Christ, which went forth from Jerusalem, that is enough to invite kings themselves to bring presents to God, to present themselves to him as living sacrifices, and with themselves the best performances. He mentions Egypt and Ethiopia, two countries out of which

2. Some make this whole verse to be a believer's address to the Messiah, whom David calls God, as he had done, xlv. 6, 8. "Thy God" (God the Father) "has commanded thy strength," has made thee strong for himself, as the man of his right hand, (Ixxx. 17.) has treasured up strength in thee for us; therefore we pray, that thou, O Son, wilt strengthen what thou hast wrought for us, will accomplish thine undertaking for us, by finishing thy good work in us."
subjects and supplicants were least to be expected; (v. 31.) Princes shall come out of Egypt, as ambassadors to seek God's favour, and submit to him; and they shall be accepted, for the Lord of Hosts shall thereupon bless them, saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, Isa. xix. 25. Even Ethiopia, that had stretched out her hand to God, in prayer, in presents, and to take hold on him, and that soon; Agree with thine adversary quickly. Out of all nations some shall be gathered in to Christ, and be owned by him.

32. Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth; O sing praises unto the Lord; Selah: 33. To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens which were of old: lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice. 34. Ascribe ye strength unto God; his excellency is over Israel, and his strength is in the clouds. 35. O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places: the God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power unto his people. Blessed be God.

The psalmist, having prayed for, and prophesied of, the conversion of the Gentiles, here invites them to come in and join with the devout Israelites in praising God, intimating that their accession to the church would be the matter of their joy and praise; (v. 32.) Let the kingdoms of the earth sing praises to the Lord; they all ought to join in it, and when they become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, they will do it. God is here proposed to them as the proper Object of praise, upon several accounts.

1. Because of his supreme and sovereign dominion; He rides upon the heavens of heavens, which were of old; (v. 33.) compare v. 4. He has, from the beginning, nay, from before all time, prepared his throne; he sits on the circuit of heaven; guides all the motions of the heavenly bodies; and, from the highest heavens, which are the residence of his glory, dispenses the influences of his power and goodness to this lower world.

2. Because of his awful and terrible majesty; He sends out his voice, and that a mighty voice; which may refer either generally to the thunder, which is called the voice of the Lord, and is said to be powerful and full of majesty, (xxxix. 3, 4;) or in particular to that thunder in which God spake to Israel at mount Sinai.

3. Because of his mighty power; Ascribe ye strength unto God; (v. 34.) acknowledge him to be a God of such irresistible power, that it is folly to contend with him, and wisdom to submit to him; acknowledge that he has power sufficient both to protect his faithful subjects, and to destroy his stubborn adversaries; and give him the glory of all the instances of his omnipotence. Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. We must acknowledge his power, (1.) In the kingdom of grace. His excellency is over Israel; he shows his sovereign care in protecting and governing his church; that is the excellency of his power, which is employed for the good of his people. (2.) In the kingdom of providence: His strength is in the clouds, whence comes the thunder of his power, the small drops of rain, and the great rain from heaven. Though God has his strength in the clouds, yet he condescends to gather his Israel under the shadow of his wings, Deut. xxxiii. 26.

4. Because of the glory of his sanctuary, and the wonders wrought there; (v. 35.) O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places. God is to be admired and adored with reverence and godly fear by all those that attend him in his holy places, that receive his oracles, that observe his operations according to them, and that pay their homage to him. He displays that out of his holy places, which speaks aloud that he will be sanctified in those that come nigh unto him. Out of heaven, his holy place above, he does, and will, show himself a terrible God. Nor is any attribute of God more dreadful to sinners than his holiness.

5. Because of the grace bestowed upon his people; The God of Israel is he that gives strength and power unto his people, which the gods of the nations, that were vanity and a lie, could not give to their worshippers; how should they help them, when they could not help themselves? All Israel's strength against their enemies came from God; they owned they had no might of their own, 2 Chron. xx. 12. And all our sufficiency for our spiritual work and warfare is from the grace of God. It is through Christ strengthening us that we can do all things, and not otherwise; and therefore he must have the glory of all we do, (cxxxv. 1;) and our humble thanks for enabling us to do it, and accepting the work of his own hands in us. If it be the God of Israel that gives strength and power unto his people, they ought to say, Blessed be God. If all be from him, let all be to him.

PSALM LXIX.

David penned this psalm, when he was in affliction; and in it, 1. He complains of the great distress and trouble he was in; and earnestly begs of God to relieve and succor him; (v. 1-6.) 2. He gives an account of the judgments of God upon his persecutors, v. 22-29. 3. He concludes with the voice of joy and praise, in an assurance that God would help and succor him, and would do well for the church, v. 30-36. Now, in this, David was a type of Christ, and all the predictions in this psalm are applied to Christ in the New Testament, and are said to have their accomplishment in him, v. 4, 9, 21; and v. 22. refers to the enemies of Christ. So that (like the 22d psalm) it begins with the humiliation, and ends with the exaltation, of Christ, one branch of which was the destruction of the Jewish nation for persecuting him, which the imprecations here are predictions of. In singing this psalm, we must have an eye to the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that followed; not forgetting the sufferings of Christians too, and the glory that shall follow them; for it may lead us to think of the ruin reserved for the persecutors, and the rest reserved for the persecuted.

To the chief musician upon Shoshannim. A psalm of David.

1. SAVE me, O God; for the waters are come in unto my soul. 2. I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing: I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me. 3. I am weary of my crying; my throat is dried; mine eyes fail while I wait for my God. 4. They that hate me without a cause are more than the hairs of my head: they that would destroy me, being mine enemies wrongly, are mighty: then I restored that which I took not away. 5. O God, thou knowest my foolishness; and my sins are not hid from thee. 6. Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for my sake: let not those that seek thee be confounded for my sake, O God of Israel. 7. Because for thy sake I have borne reproach: shame hath covered my face. 8. I am become a stranger unto my brethren, and an alien unto my mother's children. 9. For the zeal of thy house hath eaten me up; and the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me. 10. When I wept, and chastened my soul with fasting, that was to my reproach. 11. I made sackcloth also my garment; and I became a proverb unto them. 12. They that sit in the gate speak against me; and I was the song of the drunkards.

In these verses, David complains of his troubles, intermixing with those complaints some requests for relief.

I. His complaints are very sad, and he pours them out before the Lord, as one that hoped thus to ease himself of a burthen that lay very heavy upon him.

1. He complains of the deep impressions that his troubles made upon his spirit; (v. 1, 2.) "The waters of affliction, those bitter waters, are come unto my soul; not only threaten my life, but disquiet my mind; they fill my head with perplexing cares, and my heart with oppressive grief; so that I cannot enjoy God and myself as I used to." We shall bear up under our troubles, if we can but keep them from our hearts; but when they put us out of the possession of our own souls, our case is bad. The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but what shall we do when the spirit is wounded? That was David's case here. His thoughts sought for something to confide in, and with which to support his hope, but he found nothing; he sunk in deep mire, where there was no standing, no firm footing; the considerations that used to support and encourage him, now failed him, or were out of the way, and he was ready to give himself up for gone. He sought for something to comfort himself with, but found himself in deep waters that overflowed him, overwhelmed him. He was like a sinking drowning man, in such confusion and constellation. This points at Christ's sufferings in his soul, and the inward agony he was in, when he said, Now is my soul troubled; and My soul is exceeding sorrowful; for it was his soul that he made an offering for sin. And it instructs us, when we are in affliction, to commit the keeping of our souls to God, that he may be neither sorded with discontent, nor sink into despair.

2. He complains of the long continuance of his troubles; (v. 5.) I am weary of my crying. Though he could not keep his head above water, yet he cried to his God, and the more death was in his view, the more life was in his prayers; yet he had not immediately an answer of peace given in, no, nor so much of that support and comfort in praying, which God's people used to have; so that he was almost overpowered by the sense of crying, grew hoarse, and his throat so dried, that he could cry no more. Nor had he his wonted satisfaction in believing, hoping, and expecting relief, Mine eyes fail while I wait for my God; he had almost looked his eyes out, in expectation of deliverance. Yet his pleading this with God, is an indication that he is resolved not to give up believing and praying. His throat is dried, but his heart is not; and what the soul does, the mouth speaks. The Lord Jesus, on the cross, cried out, Why hast thou forsaken me? Yet, at the same time, he kept hold of his relation to him, My God, my God.

3. He complains of the malice and multitude of his enemies, their injustice and cruelty, and the hardships they put upon him, v. 4. They hated him, they would destroy him, for hatred aims at the destruction of the person hated; but what was his iniquity, what was his sin, what provocation had he given them, that they were so spiteful toward him? None at all; "They hate me without cause, and there is no deceit in my tongue," (Ps. 120.1.) "I will not set my mind upon evildoers, when the wicked seekth my soul to cast it down," (Ps. 119.135.) Our Saviour answered it to himself, (John xv. 25.) They hated me without a cause. We are apt to use this, in justification of our passion against those that hate us, that we never gave them cause to hate us. But it is rather an argument why we should bear it patiently, because then we suffer as Christ did, and may then expect that God will right us; "They are mine enemies wrongfully, for I have been to them good," (Ps. 57.6.) and see where unrighteousness reigns so much, we must not wonder if we meet with those that are our enemies wrongfully. Let us take care that we never do wrong, and then we may the better bear it, if we receive wrong. These enemies were not to be despised, but were very formidable, both for their number, They are more than the hairs of mine head, (Christ's enemies were numerous, they that came to seize him were a great multitude; how were they increased that troubled him?) and for their strength, They are mighty, in authority and power. We are weak, but our enemies are strong; for we wrestle against principalities and powers. Then I restored that which I took not away. Applying this to David, (1.) It was what his enemies compelled him to; they made him suffer for that offence which he had never been guilty of. (2.) It was what he consented to, that, if possible, he might pacify them, and make them to be at peace with him, and he might have insisted upon the laws of justice and honour, the former not requiring, and the latter commonly thought to forbid, the restoring of that which we took not away, for that is to wrong ourselves both in our wealth and in our reputation. Yet the case may be such sometimes, that it may become our duty. Blessed Paul, though free from all men, yet, for the honour of Christ, and the edification of the church, made himself a servant to all. But, applying it to Christ, it is an observable description of the satisfaction which he made to God for our sin by his blood; Then he restored that which he took not away; he underwent the punishment that was due to us, paid our debt, suffered for our offence. God's glory, in some instances of it, was taken away by the sir of man; man's honour, and peace, and happiness, were taken away; it was not he that took them away, but yet by his death and atonement.

4. He complains of the unkindness of his friends and relations, and this is a grievance which with an irascible mind cuts as deep as any other; (v. 8.) I am become a stranger to my brethren; they make themselves strange to me, and use me as a stranger, are shy of conversing with me, and ashamed to own me. This was fulfilled in Christ, whose brethren did not believe on him, (John vii. 5.) who came from his mother's womb, and not by his brethren. (John i. 11.) and who was forsaken by his disciples, whom he had been free with as his brethren.

5. He complains of the contempt that was put upon him, and the reproach with which he was continually loaded. And in this, especially, his complaint points at Christ, who for our sakes submitted to the greatest disgrace, and made himself of no reputation; we having by sin injured God in his honour, Christ became the sin offering, and he was forsaking himself of the honour due to him by an incarnate Deity, but by submitting to the greatest dishonours that could be done to any man. Two things David here takes notice of as aggravations of the indignities done him: (1.) The ground and matter of the reproach, v. 10, 11. They ridiculed him for that by which he both humbled himself and honoured God. When men lift themselves up in pride and vain glory, they are justly laughed at for it; but David chastened his soul, and clothed himself with sackcloth, and, from his abusing himself, they took occasion to trample upon him. When men dis honour God, it is just that it turn to their dishonour; but when David, purely in devotion to God, and to testify his respect to him, wept, and chastened his soul with fasting, and manused with his garments, the instruments used to do; instead of commending his devotion, and recommending it as a great example of piety, they did all they could both to discourage him in it, and to prevent others from following his good example, for that was his reproach; they laughed at him, as a fool, for mortifying himself thus; and even for this he became a proverb to them; they made him the common subject of their banter. We must not think it strange if we be ill-spoken of for that which is well done, and in which we have reason to hope that we are accepted of God. Our Lord Jesus was stoned for his good works, (John x. 32.) and, when he cried, Eli, Eli, My God, my God, was ban tered, as if he called for Elias. (2.) The persons that reproached him, v. 12. [1.] Even the gravest, and the most honourable, from whom better was expected; They that sit in the gate speak against me, and their reproaches for the dictates of senators, and the decrees of judges, and are credited accordingly. [2.] The meanest, and the most despicable, the objects, (xxxv. 15.) the scum of the country, the children of fools, yea, the children of base men; (Job xxx. 8.) and he was the song of the drunkards, they made themselves and their companions merry with him. See the bad consequences of the sin of drunkenness; it makes men desirers of those things are good, 2 Tim. iii. 5. When the king was made sick with bottles of wine, he stretched out his hand with scorners, Hos. vii. 5. The bench of the drunkards is the seat of the scornful. See what is common the lot of the best of men; they that are the praise of the wise, are the song of fools: but it is easy to those that rightly judge of things, to despise being thus despised.

II. His confessions of sin are very serious; (v. 5.) "O God, thou knowest my foolishness, both what is, and what is not; my sins that I am guilty of are not hid from thee, and therefore thou knowest how innocent I am of those crimes which they charge upon me." Note, Even then when, as to men's unjust accusations, we plead Not guilty, yet, before God, we must acknowledge ourselves to have deserved all that is brought upon us, and much worse. This is the genuine confession of a penitent, who knows that he cannot prosper in covering his sins, and that therefore it is his wisdom to acknowledge it, because it is naked and open before God. 1. He knows the corruption of our nature; Thou knowest the foolishness that is bound up in my heart. All our sins take rise from our foolishness. 2. He knows the transgressions of our lives; they are not hid from him, no not our heart-sins, no not those that are committed most secretly. They are all done in his sight, and are never past, though they be covered and pardoned. This may be applied to Christ, for he knew no sin, yet he was made sin for us; and God knew it, nor was it hid from him, when he pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief.

III. His supplications are very earnest. 1. For himself; (v. 1.) "Save me, O God, save me from sinking, from despairing." Thus Christ was heled in that he feared that he was saved from letting fall the burden of our sinning, Heb. v. 7. 2. For his friends; (v. 6.) Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, and that seek thee, O God of Israel, (under these two characters we ought to seek God, and in seeking him to wait on him, as the God of hosts, who has all power to help, and as the God of Israel in covenant with his people, whom therefore he is engaged in honour and truth to help,) let not them be ashamed and confounded for my sake. This intimates his fear, that, if God did not appear for him, it would be a discouragement to all other good people, and would give them occasion to think it over them; it intimates too his earnest desire, that, wherewith or became of him, all that seek God, and wait upon him, might be kept in heart, and in countenance, and might neither be discouraged in themselves, nor exposed to contempt from others. If Jesus Christ had not been owned and accepted of his Father in his sufferings, all that seek God, and wait for him, had been ashamed and confounded; but they have received him accepted in his name come boldly to the throne of grace. IV. His plea is very powerful, v. 7, 9. Reproach was one of the greatest of his burdens; "Lord, roll away the reproach, and plead my cause, for, 1. It is for thee that I am reproached, for serving thee and trusting in thee; For thy sake I have borne reproach. Those that are evil spoken of for well doing, may with an humble confidence leave it to God to bring forth their righteousness as the light. It is easy that I am reproached. The zeal of thine house has eaten me up, has made me forget myself, and do that which they wickedly turn to my reproach. They that hate thee and thy house, for that reason hate me, because they know how zealously affected I am to it. That is it that has made them ready to eat me up, and has eaten up all the love and respect I had among them." They that blasphemed God, and spoke ill of his word and ways, did therefore reproach David, for believing in his word, and walking in his ways. Or it may be considered as an instance of David's zeal for God's house, that he resented all the indignities done to God's name, as if they had been done to his own name. He laid to heart all the dishonour done to God, and the contempt cast upon religion; these he laid nearer to his heart than any outward troubles of his own. And therefore he had reason to hope God would interest himself in the reproaches cast upon him, because he had always interested himself in the reproaches cast upon God. Both the parts of this verse are applied to Christ: (1.) It was an instance of his love to his Father, that, the zeal of his house did even eat him up, when he whipped the buyers and sellers out of the temple, which minded his disciples of this text, John ii. 17. (2.) It was an instance of his self-denial, and that he was so far interested in himself, that the reproaches cast upon him, that reproached God fell upon him, (Rom. xvi. 8.) and therein he set us an example.

13. But as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O Lord, in an acceptable time: O God, in the multitude of thy mercy hear me: in the truth of thy salvation. 14. Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink: let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters. 15. Let not the water-flood overflow me, neither let the deep swallow me up, and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me. 16. Hear me, O Lord; for thy loving-kindness is good: turn unto me according to the multitude of thy tender mercies. 17. And hide not thy face from thy servant; for I am in trouble: hear me speedily. 18. Draw nigh unto my soul, and redeem it: deliver me, because of mine enemies. 19. Thou hast known my reproach, and my shame, and my dishonour; my adversaries are all before thee. 20. Reproach hath broken my heart, and I am full of heaviness; and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none. 21. They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.

David had been speaking before of the spiteful reproaches which his enemies cast upon him; But as for me, my prayer is unto thee. They spoke ill of him for his fasting and praying, and for that he was made the song of the drunkards; but, notwithstanding that, he resolved to continue on for the love of God, and therefore was not sooner for well-doing, we must never be jereed out of it. Those can bear but little for God, and their confessing of his name before men, that cannot bear a scoff and a hard word, rather than quit their duty. David's enemies were very abusive to him, but this was his comfort, that he had a God to go to, with whom he would lodge his cause. They think to carry their cause by insolence and calumny; but I use other methods, saith the psalmist, and that is, O Lord, and it was in an acceptable time; not the less acceptable for being a time of affliction. God will not drive us from him, though it is need that drives us to him; nay, it is the more acceptable, because the misery and distress of God's people make them so much the more the objects of his pity: it is seasonable for him to help them, when all other helps fail, and they are undone, and feel that they are, if they do not help them. We find this expression used concerning Christ, (Isa. xlix. 8.) In an acceptable time have I heard thee. Now observe

I. What his requests are.

1. That he might have a gracious audience given to his complaints, the cry of his affliction, and the desire of his heart. Hear me; (v. 3.) and again, Hear me, O Lord; (v. 16.) Hear me speedily; (v. 17.) not only hear what I say, but grant what I ask. Christ knew that the Father heard him always, John xi. 42. 2. That he might be rescued out of his troubles; might be saved from sinking under the load of grief; Deliver me out of the mire; let me not stick in it, (so some,) but help me out, and set my feet on a rock, xl. 2.) might be saved from his enemies, that they might not swallow him up, nor have their will against him; Let me be delivered from them that hate me, as a lamb from the paw of the lion, v. 14. Though I came into deep waters, (v. 2.) where I am ready to conclude that the floods will overflow me, yet let my fears be prevented, and silenced; let not the water-flood, though it flow upon me, overflow me, v. 15. Let me not fall into the gulf of despair, let not that deep swallow me up, let not that pit shut her mouth upon me, for then I am undone. He gave himself for lost, in the beginning of the psalm, yet now he has his head above water, and is not so weary of crying as he thought himself. That God would do this, (v. 3.) God would shore him, and not hide his face from him, v. 17. The tokens of God's favour to us, and the light of his countenance shining upon us, are enough to keep our spirits from sinking in deepest mire of outward troubles, nor need we desire any more to make us safe and easy, v. 18. Draw nigh to my soul, to manifest thyself to it, and that shall redeem it.

II. What his pleas are, to enforce these petitions. This pleads God's mercy and truth; (v. 12.) In the multitude of thy mercy hear me. There is a mercy in God, a multitude of mercies, all kinds of mercy, inexhaustible mercy, mercy enough for all, enough for each; and hence we must take our encouragement in praying. The truth also of his salvation, the truth of all those promises of salvation which he has made to those that trust in him, is a further encouragement. He repeats his argument taken from the mercy of God; 4. Hear me, for thy loving-kindness is good; it is so in itself, it is rich, and plentiful, and abundant, it is so in the account of all the saints, they are so precious to them, it is their life, their joy, their all; Oh, let me have the benefit of it! Turn to me, according to the multitude of thy tender mercies," v. 16. See how highly he speaks of the goodness of God; in him there are mercies, tender mercies, and a multitude of them. If we think well of God, and continue to do so, under the greatest hardships, we need not fear but God will do well for us; for he takes pleasure in them that hope in his mercy, cxlv. 11.

2. He pleads particularly the reproach he was under, and the indignities that were done him; (v. 19.) Thou hast known my reproach, my shame, and my dishonour. See what a stress is laid upon this: for, in the sufferings of Christ for us, perhaps not less a cause; and more to the satisfaction he made for sin, which has been so indelibly imprinted upon his honour, than the reproach, and shame, and dishonour, he underwent; which God took notice of, and accepted, as more than an equivalent for the everlasting shame and contempt which our sins had deserved, who therefore must by repentance take shame to ourselves, and bear the reproach of our youth. And if at any time we be called out to suffer reproach, and shame, and dishonour, for his sake, this may be our argument, our ground of prayer. It is before-hand with us, so he will not be behind-hand with us. The psalmist speaks the language of an ingenuous nature, when he says, (v. 20.) Reproach has broken my heart, I am full of heaviness; for it bears hard upon one that knows the worth of a good name, to be oppressed with a had one; but, when we consider what a name it is to be dis honoured for God, and what a favour to be counted worthy to bear this name, (as they deemed it, Acts v. 41.) we shall see there is no reason at all why it should sit so heavy, or be any heart-breaking to us.

3. He pleads the insolence and cruelty of his enemies; (v. 18.) Deliver me because of mine enemies, because they were such as he had before described them; (v. 4.) Mine adversaries are all before thee, (v. 19.) thou knowest what sort of men they are, what danger I am in from them, what enemies they are to thee, and how much thou art reflected upon in what they do and design against me. One instance of their barbarity is given, (v. 21.) They gave me gall for my meat, (the word signifies a bitter herb, and is often joined with wormwood,) and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink. This was literally fulfilled in Christ, and did so directly point to him, that he would not say It is finished, till this was fulfilled; and, in order that his enemies might have occasion to fulfil it, he said, I thirst, John xix. 28, 29. Some think that the hyssop which they put to his mouth, with vinegar, was the bitter herb which they gave him with the vinegar for his meat. See how particularly the sufferings of Christ were foretold, which proves the scripture to be the word of God; and how exactly the predictions were fulfilled in Jesus Christ, which proves him to be the true Messiah. This is he that should come, and we are to look for no other.

4. He pleads his own distress and affliction; (v. 20.) I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; they all disliked him, like the brooks in summer. This was fulfilled in Christ, for in his sufferings all his disciples forsook Vol. III—3 E.
him and fled. We cannot expect too little from men, miserable comforters are they all; nor can we expect too much from God, for he is the Father of mercy, and the God of all comfort and consolation.

22. Let their table become a snare before them; and that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap. 23. Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not; and make their loins continually to shake. 24. Pour out thine indignation upon them, and let thy wrathful anger take hold of them. 25. Let their habitation be desolate; and let none dwell in their tents. 26. For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten; and they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded. 27. Add iniquity unto their iniquity; and let them not come into thy righteousness. 28. Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous. 29. But I am poor and sorrowful: let thy salvation, J God, set me up on high.

These imprecations are not David's prayers against his enemies, but prophecies of the destruction of Christ's persecutors, especially the Jewish nation, which our Lord himself foretold with tears, and which was accomplished about forty years after the death of Christ. The two first verses of this paragraph are expressly applied to the judgments of God upon the unbelieving Jews by the apostle, (Rom. xi. 9, 10.) and therefore the whole must look that way. The rejection of the Jews for rejecting Christ, as it was a signal instance of God's justice, and an earnest of the vengeance which God will at last take on all that are obstinate in their infidelity, so it was, and continues to be, a convincing proof of the truth of the Christian religion; one great objection against it, at first, was, that it set aside the ceremonial law; but its doing so was effectually justified, and that objection removed, when God so remarkably set it aside by the utter destruction of the temple, and the shinking of those, with the Mosaic economy, that obstinately adhered to it, in opposition to the gospel of Christ.

Let us observe here,

1. What the judgments are which should come upon the crucifiers of Christ; not upon all of them, for there were those who had a hand in his death, and yet repented, and found mercy, (Acts ii. 23.—iii. 14, 15.) but upon those of them and their successors, who justified it by an obstinate infidelity, and rejection of his gospel, and by an invertebrate enmity to his disciples and followers. See 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. It is here foretold.

1. That their sacrifices and offerings should be mischief and prejudice to them; (v. 22.) Let their table become a snare. The altar of the Lord, which is called his table and theirs, because, in feasting upon the sacrifices, they were partakers of the altar: this should have been for their welfare or peace, for the altar was round, like a table, and a trap to them, for by their affection and adherence to the altar they were held fast in their infidelity, and hardened in their prejudices against Christ, that altar which they had no right to eat of who continued to serve the tabernacle, Heb. xii. 10.

Or, it may be understood of their common creature-comforts, even their necessary food; they had given Christ gall and vinegar, and therefore judgment shall their meat and drink be made gall and vinegar to them. When the supports of life and delights of sense, through the corruption of our nature, become an occasion of sin to us, and are made the food and fuel of our sensuality, then our table is a snare, which is a good reason why we should never feed ourselves without fear, Jude 12.

2. That they should never have the comfort either of that knowledge, or of that peace, which believers are blessed with in the gospel of Christ. v. 23. That they should be given up, (1.) To a judicial blindness; Let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and their heart hardened. Their sin was, that they would not see, but shut their eyes against the light, loving darkness rather; their punishment was, that they should not see, but be given up to their own hearts' lusts, which were hardening; and the god of this world should be permitted to blind their minds, 2 Cor. iv. 4. This was foretold concerning them, (Isa. vi. 10.) and Christ ratified it, Matth. xiii. 14, 15. John xii. 40. (2.) To a judicial distemper, which opens the way to comfort, such as that of Paul, (Acts ix. 6.) he trembled and was astonished; but this is a terror that shall never end in peace, but shall make their loins continually to shake, through horror of conscience, as Belshazzar, when the joints of his loins were loosed. Let them be driven to despair, and filled with constant confusion. This was fulfilled in the desperate counsels of the Jews, when the Romans came upon them. 3. That they should fall and lie under God's anger and fiery indignation; (v. 24.) Pour out thine indignation upon them. Note, Those who reject God's great salvation proffered to them, may justly fear that his indignation will be poured out upon them; for they that submit not to the Son of his love, will certainly be made the generation of his wrath. It is the doom passed on those who believe not in Christ, that the wrath of God abideth on them, (John iii. 36.) he takes hold of them, and will never let them go. Salvation itself will not save those that are not willing to be ruled by it. Behold the goodness and severity of God!

4. That their place and nation should be utterly taken away, the very thing they were afraid of, and to prevent which, as they pretended, they persecuted Christ; John xxi. 48. (v. 23.) Let their habitation be desolate, which was fulfilled when their country was utterly wasted, their temples and churches, and for their sakes, was ploughed as a field, Mic. iii. 12. The temple was the house which they were in a particular manner proud of; but this was left unto them desolate, Matth. xxviii. 38. Yet that is not all, it ought to be some satisfaction to us, if we be cut off from the enjoyment of our possessions, that others will have the benefit of them when we are dislodged; but is here added, Let none dwell in their tents, which was remarkably fulfilled in Judah and Jerusalem, for, after the destruction of the Jews, it was long ere the country was inhabited to any purpose. But this is applied particularly to Judas, by St. Peter, Acts i. 20. For he being felo de se— a suicide, we may suppose his estate was confiscated, so that his habitation was desolate, and no man of his kindred dwelt therein.

5. That their way to ruin should be down-hill, and nothing should stop them, nor any power to prevent it. This is the case of the world Jews, as they were, and we may say, of all men, by reason of their discussing to themselves, to add iniquity to iniquity. Those that are bad, if they be given up to their own hearts' lusts, will certainly be worse; they will add sin to sin, they will add rebellion to their sin, Job xxxiv. 37. It is said of the Jews, that they filled up their sin always, 1 Thess. ii. 16. Add the punishment of iniquity to their iniquity, so some read it, for the same word signifies both sin and punishment, so close is their connexion, that punishment in sin, God will reckon for it. But those that have multiplied to sin, may yet find mercy, for God multiplies to pardon, through the righteousness of the Mediator; and therefore, that they might be precluded from all hope of mercy, he adds, Let them not come into thy righteousness, to receive the benefits of the righteousness of God, which is by faith in a Mediator, Phil. iii. 9. Not that God shuts out any from that righteousness, for the gospel excludes none that do not by their unbelief exclude themselves; but let them be left to take their own course, and they will never come into this government; for, being ignorant of the demands of God's righteousness, and going about to establish the merit of their own, they have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God. They have been too proud and self-willed, that they will not come into God's righteousness, shall have their doom accordingly; themselves have decided it, they shall not come into his righteousness. Let them not expect any benefit by it, that are not willing and glad to be beholden to it.

6. That they should be cut off from all hopes of happiness; (v. 28.) Let them be blasted out of the book of the living, let them not be suffered to live any longer they live, the mere mischiefs they do. Multitudes of the unbelieving Jews fell by sword and famine, and none of those who had embraced the Christian faith perished among them; the nation, as a nation, was blasted out, and became not a people. Many understand it of their rejection from God's covenant, and all the privileges of it; that is the book of the living; the commonwealth of Israel itself; Israel according to the flesh, now become alienated from that covenant of promise, which hitherto it has had the monopoly of. Let it appear that they were never written in the Lamb's book of life, but reprobat silver let men call them, because the Lord has rejected them. Let them not be written with the righteous; let them not have a place in the congregation of the saints, when they shall all be gathered in the general assembly of those whose names are written in heaven. i. 3.

II. What the sin is, for which these dreadful judgments should be brought upon them; (v. 26.) They persecute him whom thou hast smitten, and talk to the grief of thy wounds. 1. Christ was he whom God had smitten, for it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and he was esteemed stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted, and therefore men hid their faces from him, Isa. lIII. 3, 4, 10. They persecuted him when he was wounded, a reprobate in his days. They cried, Crucify him, crucify him. Compare that of St. Peter with this; (Acts ii. 23.) though he was delivered by the counsel and foreknowledge of God, it was with wicked hands that they crucified and slew him. They talked to the grief of the Lord Jesus when he was upon the cross, saying, He trusted in God, let him deliver him, than which nothing could be said more grieving. 2. The suffering saints were smitten, wounded, bruised in his days, when they cried, Crucify him, crucify him. Compare of that of St. Peter; (Acts iii. 13.) though he was delivered by the counsel and foreknowledge of God, it was with wicked hands that they crucified and slew him. They talked to the grief of the Lord Jesus when he was upon the cross, saying, He trusted in God, let him deliver him, than which nothing could be said more grieving.

30. I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgiving. 31. This also shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs. 32. The humble shall see this, and be glad: and your heart shall live that seek God. 33. For the Lord heareth the poor, and despiseth not his prisoners. 34. Let the heaven and earth praise him, the seas, and every thing that moveth therein: 35. For God will save Sion, and will build the cities of Judah; that they may dwell there, and have it in possession. 36. The seed also of his servants shall inherit it; and they that love his name shall dwell therein.

The psalmist here, both as a type of Christ, and as an example to Christians, concludes a psalm with holy joy and praise, which he began with complaints and remonstrances of his griefs.

1. He resolves to praise God himself, not doubting but that therein he should be accepted of him; (v. 30, 31.) I will praise the name of God, not only with my heart, but with my song, and magnify him with thanksgiving. For he is pleased to reckon himself magnified by the thankful praises of his people. It is intimoted that all Christians ought to glorify God with their praises, psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs. And this shall please the Lord, through Christ, the Mediator of our praises as well as of our prayers, better than the most valuable of the legal sacrifices, (v. 31.) on ox or bullock. This is a plain intimation, that in the days of the Messiah an end should be put not only to the sacrifices of atonement, but to those of praise and acknowledgment, which were instituted by the ceremonial law; instead of them, spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving are accepted; the calves of our lips, not the calves of the stall, Heb. xiii. 15. It is a great comfort to us, that humble and thankful praises are more pleasing to God than the most costly pompous sacrifices are, or ever were.

2. He encourages other good people to rejoice in God, and to continue to seek his face; (v. 32, 33.) The humble shall see this, and be glad. They shall observe, to their comfort, (1.) The experiences of the saints. They shall see how ready God is to hear the poor, when they cry to him, and to give them that which they call upon him for; how far he is from despising his prisoners, though men despise them; he favours them with his gracious visits, and will find a time to enlarge them. The humble shall see this, and be glad.

(2.) The exaltation of the Saviour, for of him the psalmist had been speaking, and of himself as a type of him. When his sorrows are over, and he enters into the joy that was set before him, when he is heard, and discharged from his imprisonment in the grave, the humble shall look upon it and be glad, and they that seek God through Christ, shall live and be comforted; concluding that, if they suffer with him, they shall also reign with him.

3. He calls upon all the creatures to praise God; the heavens above, earth, and sea, and the inhabitants of each, Ps. 8. Heaven and earth, and the dwellers of both, were made by him, and therefore let heaven and earth praise him. Angels in heaven, and saints on earth, may each of them in their respective habitations furnish themselves with matter enough for constant praise. Let the sea, though mute to a proverb, praise the Lord, for the sea is his, and he made it.

The praises of the world must be offered for God's favours to his church, v. 35, 36. For God will save Zion, the holy mountain, where his service was kept up. He will save all that are sanctified and set apart to him, all that employ themselves in his worship, and all those over whom Christ reigns; for he was King upon the holy hill of Zion. He has mercy in store for the cities of Judah, of which tribe Christ was. God will do great things for the church, in which let all that wish well to it, rejoice. (Psalms 145:4.) It shall be peopleed and inhabited. There shall be a temple built to it, and it shall be served.

The cities of Judah shall be built, particular churches shall be formed and incorporated according to the gospel-model, that there may be a remnant to dwell there, and to have it in possession, to enjoy the privileges conferred upon it, and to pay the tribute and services required from it. They that love his name, that have a kindness for religion in general, shall embrace the Christian religion, and take their place in the Christian church; they shall dwell therein, as citizens, and of the household of God. (2.) It shall be perpetuated and inherited. Christianity was not to be res uniuss retatis—a transitory thing; no, the seed of his servants shall inherit it, God will secure and raise up for himself a seed to serve him, and they shall inherit the privileges of their fathers; for the promise is to you and your children, as it was of old, I will be a God to their seed for ever. The land of promise shall never be lost for want of seeds. For God out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, and will do it rather than the entail shall be cut off.

David shall never want a man to stand before him. The Redeemer shall see his seed, and prolong his days in them, till the mystery of God shall be finished, and the mystical body completed. And since the holy seed is the substance of the world, and if that were all, we sometimes pray to over the prayers we have formerly made to God, upon like occasions, which may be done with new affections. David here prays that God would send, I. Help to himself, v. 1. II. Help to his enemies, v. 2, 3. II. Joy to his friends, v. 5. These were the five last verses of Ps. xl. He seems to have intended this short prayer to be, both for himself and us, a salve for every sore, and therefore to be always in mind; in singing, we may all make it our own, and pray for those who ever are.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

1. Make haste, O God, to deliver me; make haste to help me, O Lord.

2. Let them be ashamed and confounded that seek after my soul: let them be turned backward, and put to confusion, that desire my hurt. 3. Let them be turned back for a reward of their shame that say, Aha, aha! 4. Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee: and let such as love thy salvation say continually, Let God be magnified. 5. But I am poor and needy; make haste unto me, O God: thou art my help and my deliverer, O Lord: make no tarrying.

The title tells us that this psalm was designed to bring to remembrance, to put God in remembrance of his mercy and promises; for so we are said to do, when we pray to him, and plead with him; (Isa. xlii. 26.) Put me in remembrance. Not that the Eternal Mind needs a remembrance, but this honour he is pleased to put upon the prayer of faith. It was rather to put himself and others in remembrance of former affections, that we may never be careless, and always in exercise of some of the former devotions, that, when the clouds return after the rain, we may have recourse to the same means, which we have formerly found effectual for fetching in comfort and relief. We may in prayer use the words we have often used before; our Saviour in his agony prayed thrice, saying the same words; so David here uses the words he had used before, yet not without some alterations, to show that he did not design to tie himself or others to them as a form. God looks at the heart, not at the words.

1. David here prays that God would make haste to relieve and succour him; (v. 1, 5.) I am poor and needy, in want and distress, and much at a loss within myself. Poverty and necessity are very good pleas in prayer to a God of infinite mercy, who despises not the sighing of a cent'rie heart, and has pronounced a blessing upon the poor in spirit; who fills the hungry with good things. He prays, (1.) That God would hasten to him on his troubles and in his troubles in due time. (2.) That in the mean time he would come in to him, to help him under his troubles, that he might not sink and faint. (3.) That he would do this quickly; Make haste, (v. 1) and again, (v. 5.) Make haste, make no tarrying. Sometimes God seems to delay helping his own people, that he may excite such earnest desires as these. He that believes does not make haste; so as to anticipate the divine counsels, so as to force a way of escape, or to take any unlawful methods of relief; but he may make haste by going forth to meet God in humble prayer, that he would hasten the desired succour. "Make haste unto me, for the longing desire of my soul is toward thee; I shall perish, if I be not speedily helped; I have no other to expect relief from; thou art my Help and my Deliverer. Thou hast engaged to be with me, that I may depend upon thee to be so to me; I have often found thee so; and thou art sufficient, all-sufficient, to be so; therefore make haste to me,"

2. He prays that God would fill the faces of his enemies with shame, v. 2, 3. Observe, (1.) Hews he describes them; they sought after his soul, his life, to destroy that; his mind, to disturb that; to draw him from God to sin, and to despair; they desired his hurt, his ruin; whom, no calamity befell him, or threatened him, they said, "Aha, aha, so would we have it, we shall gain our point now, and see him ruined." Thus spiteful, thus inscient, were they. (2.) What his prayer is against them: "Let them be ashamed; let them be brought to repentance, so filled with shame, as that they may seek thy name; (lxxxiii. 16.) let them see their fault and folly, in fighting against those whom thou dost protect, and be ashamed of their envy, Isa. xxvi. 11. However, let their designs against me be frustrated, and their measures broken; let them be turned back from their malicious pursuits, and then they will be ashamed and confounded, and, like the enemies of the Hebrews, much cast down in their own eyes, Neh. vi. 16.

3. He prays that God would fill the hearts of his friends with joy; (v. 4.) that all those who see God, and love his salvation, who desire it, delight in it, and depend upon it, may have continual matter for joy and praise, and hearts for both; and then he doubts not but he may put in for a share of the blessing he prays for, and so may we, if we answer the character. (1.) Let us make the service of God our great business, and the favour of God our great delight and pleasure, for that is seeking him, and loving his salvation. Let the pursuit of a happiness in God be our great care, and the enjoyment of it our great satisfaction. A heart to love the salvation of the Lord, and to prefer it before any secular advantages whatsoever, so as cheerfully to quit all, rather than hazard our salvation, is a good evidence of our interest in it, and title to it. (2.) Let us then be assured, that if it be not our own fault, the joy of the Lord shall fill our minds, and the high praises of the Lord shall fill our mouths. Those that seek God, if they seek him early, and seek him diligently, shall rejoice and be glad in him, for their seeking him is as an evidence of his good will to them, and an earnest of their finding him, v. 3.

There is joy even in seeking God, for it is one of the fundamental principles of religion, That God is the Rewarder of all those that diligently seek him. Those that love God's salvation shall say with pleasure, with constant pleasure, (for praising God, if we make it our continual work, will be our continual feast,) Let God be magnified, as he will be, to eternity, in the salvation of his people. All who wish well to the comfort of the saints, and to the glory of God, cannot but say a hearty amen to this prayer, that those who love God's salvation may say continually, Let God be magnified.

PSALM LXXI.

David penned this psalm in his old age, as appears by several passages in it; which makes many think it was penned at the time of Absalom's rebellion; for that was the greatest trouble he had for some days. It may be occasioned by Sheba's insurrection, or some trouble that happened to him in that part of his life, of which it was foretold, that the sword should not depart from his house. But he is not over-particular in representing his case, because he intended it for the general use of God's people in their afflictions, especially those they meet with in their declining years; for this psalm, above any other, is fitted for the use of the old disciples of Jesus Christ. I. His thoughts begin with this assurance, (v. 1.) prayers that God would deliver and save him, (v. 2, 4.) and cast him off, (v. 9.) or be far from him, (v. 12.) and that his enemies might be put to shame, v. 13. He pleads his conditions of God; (v. 1, 2.) the experience he had had of help from God; (v. 6.) and the malice of his enemies against him, v. 10, 11. II. He concludes the psalm with believing prayers, v. 14, &c. Never was his hope more established, v. 16, 18, 20, 21. Never was his heart and hope more enlarged, v. 13, 19, 22, 24. He is in an ecstasy of joyful praise; in the singing of it, we too should have our faith in God encouraged, and our hearts raised in blessing his holy name.

In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust; let me never be put to confusion. 2. Deliver me in my righteousness, and cause me to escape: incline thine ear unto me, and save me. 3. Be thou my strong habitation, whereto I may continually resort: thou hast given commandment to save me, for thou art my rock and my fortress. 4. Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the wicked, out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man. 5. For thou art my hope, O Lord God: thou art my trust from my youth. 6. By thee have I been hidden up from the womb: thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels: my praise shall be continually of thee. 7. I am as a wonder unto many: but thou art my strong refuge. 8. Let my mouth be filled with thy praise and with thine honour all the day. 9. Cast me not off in the time of old age: forsake me not when my strength faileth. 10. For mine enemies speak against me; and they that lay wait for my soul take counsel together, 11. Saying, God hath forsaken him; persecute and take him: for there is none to deliver him. 12. O God, be not far from me: O my God, make haste to my help. 13. Let them be confounded and consumed that are adversaries to my soul; let them be covered with reproach and dishonour that seek my hurt.

Two things, in general, David here prays for; That he might not be confounded, and That his enemies and persecutors might be confounded.

1. He prays that he might never be made ashamed of his dependence upon God, nor disappointed in his believing expectations from him. With this petition every true believer may come boldly to the throne of grace; for God will never dash the hope that is of his own raising. New observe here,

1. How David professes his confidence in God, and with what pleasure and grateful variety of expression he repeats his prayers and that confidence, still presenting the profession of it to God, and pleading it with him. We praise God, and so please him, by telling him, (if it be indeed true,) what an entire confidence we have in him; (v. 1.) 'In thee, O Lord, and in thee only, do I put my trust. Whatever others do, I choose the God of Jacob for my Help. They that are entirely satisfied with God's all-sufficiency, and the truth of his promise, and in dependence upon that, as sufficient to make them amends, are freely willing to do and suffer, to lose and venture, for him, may truly say, In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust. Those that will deal with God, must deal upon trust; if we are shy of dealing with him, it is a sign we do not trust him. Thou art my Rock and my Fortress, (v. 3.) and again, Thou art my Refuge, my strong Refuge; (v. 7.)

I fly to thee, and am sure to be safe in thee, and under thy protection. If thou secure me, none can hurt me. Thou art my Hope and my Trust; (v. 5.) thou hast proposed thyself to me in thy word as the proper Object of my hope and trust; I have hoped in thee, and never found it vain to do so.'

2. How his confidence in God is supported and encouraged by his experiences; (v. 5, 6.) 'Thou hast been my Trust from my youth; ever since I was capable of discerning between my right hand and my left. I have found that God has been a great deal of reason to do so; for by thee have I been hidden up from the womb.' Ever since he had the use of his reason, he had been a dependent upon God's goodness, because ever since he had a being, he had been a monument of it. Nete, The consi deration of the gracious care which the Divine Providence took of us in our birth and infancy, should engage us to an early piety, and constant devotedness to his honour. He that was our Help from our birth, ought to be our Hope from our youth. If we received so much mercy from God before we are capable of thinking and service, we should lose no time when we are capable. This comes in here as a support to the psalmist in his present distress; not only that God had given him his life and being, bringing him out of his mother's bowels into the world, and providing that he should not die from the womb, nor give up the ghost when he came out of the belly; but that he had betimes made him one of his family; Thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels, and kept me in the arms of thy grace, under the shadow of thy wings, into the bond of thy covenant; thou tookest me into thy church, as a son of thine handmaid, and born in thine house, cxvi. 16. And therefore, (1.) I have reason to hope that thou wilt protect me; thou hast held me up hitherto, wilt not let me fall now; thou that madest me, wilt not forsake the work of thine own hands; thou that helpedst me, when I could not help myself, wilt not abandon me now that I am as helpless as I was then. (2.) Therefore I have reason to resolve that I will devote myself unto thee; My praise shall therefore be continually of thee; I will make it my business every day to praise thee, and will take all occasions to do it.

3. What his requests to God are, in this confidence.

(1.) That he might never be put to confusion, (v. 1.) that he might not be distressed much with the négríness of his characters, and so made ashamed of his expectation. Thus we may all pray in faith, that our confidence in God may not be our confusion. Hope of the glory of God is hope that makes not ashamed.

(2.) That he might be delivered out of the hand of his enemies; (v. 2.) Deliver me in thy righteousness; as thou art the righteous Judge of the world, pleading the cause of the injured, and punishing the injurious, cause me some way or other to escape, (God will, with the temptation, make a way to escape, I Cor. x. 13.) Incline thine ear unto my prayers, and, in answer to them, save me out of my troubles, v. 4. Deliver me, O my God, out of the hands of those that are ready to pull me in pieces. Three things he pleads for deliverance; [1.] The encouragement God had given him to expect it; Thou hast given commandment to save me; (v. 3.) thou hast promised to do it; and such efficacy is there in God's promises, that they are often spoken of as commands; like that, Let there be light, and there was light. He speaks, and it is done. [2.] The character of his enemies; they are wicked, unrighteous, cruel, men, and it will be for the honour of God to appear against them, (v. 4.) for he is a holy, just, and good, God. [3.] The many eyes that were upon him; (v. 7.) I am as a wonder unto many; every one that seeth me shall be afraid; but upon the extraordinary troubles as I am fallen into, and such extraordinary confidence as I prefer to have in God. Or, I am looked upon as a monster, am one whom every body shuns, and therefore am undone if the Lord be not my Refuge. Men abandon me, but God will not.

(3.) That he might always find rest and safety in God; (v. 3.) Be thou my strong Habitation; be that place of my resort always, that is my Rock, whereby I may continually resort. They that are at home in God, that live a life of communion with him, and confidence in him, that continually resort unto him by faith and prayer, having their eyes ever toward him, may promise themselves a strong Habitation in him, such as never will fail of itself, nor can ever be broken through by any invading power; and they shall be welcome to resort to him continually upon all occasions, and not be upbraided as coming too often.

(4.) That he might have continual matter for thanksgiving to God, and might be continually employed in that pleasant work; (v. 8.) Let my mouth be like a psalm; with it I will sing of thy testimonies, and declare thy commands, and profess my faith, and make my complaints, and then I shall not be ashamed of my hope, but my enemies will be ashamed of their insolence. They that love God, love to be praising him, and desire to be doing it all the day; not only in their morning and even devotions, not only seven times a day, (cxxxix. 164.) but all the day, to intermix with all they say something or other that may redound to the honour and praise of God. They may do this, and they shall do this; they hope to be doing it eternally in a better world.

(5.) That he might not be neglected now in his declining years; (v. 9.) Cast me not off now in the time of my old age, forsake me not when my strength fails. Observe here, [1.] The natural sense he had of the infirmities of age; My strength fails; where there was strength of body, and vigour of mind, strong sight, a strong voice, strong limbs, alas! Old age they fail; the life is continued, but the strength is taken away. Or the image may be turned the other way, and that he does not forsake me, (v. 20.) which is the right sense, the true sense, xeron, xc. 10. [2.] The gracious desire he had of the continuance of God's presence with him under these infirmities; Lord, cast me not off, do not then forsake me. This intimates that he should look upon himself as undone, if God should abandon him; to be cast off and forsaken of God is a thing to be dreaded at any time, especially in the time of old age, and when our strength fails us; for it is God that is the Strength of our heart. But it intimates that he had reason to hope God would not desert him; the faithful servants of God may be comfortably assured that he will not cast them off in old age, nor forsake them when their strength fails them. He is a Master that is not wont to cast off old servants. In this confidence, David here prays again, (v. 12.) O God, be not far from me, let me not be under the apprehension of thy withdrawals; for then I am miserable; O my God, a God in covenant with me, make haste for my help, lest I perish before help come. I. He prays that his enemies might be made ashamed of their designs against him. Observe, 1. What it was which they unjustly said against him, v. 10, 11. Their plot was deep and desperate, it was against his life; They lay wait for my soul, (v. 10.) and are adversaries to that, v. 13. Their powers and policies were combined, they took counsel together, and very insolent they were in their conduct; they say, God has forsaken him, persecute and take him. Here their promises are utterly false, because that a good man was in great trouble, and had continued long in it, and was not so soon delivered as perhaps he expected, therefore God had forsaken him, and would have no more to do with him. All are not forsaken of God, who think so; they are often delivered who others think to be so, because as their promises were false, so their inference was barbarous. If God has forsaken him, then persecute and take him, and doubt not but to make a prey of him. This is talking to the grief of one whom God hath smitten, lxix. 26. But they endeavor to discourage David, as Si macherib endeavored to intimidate Hezekiah, by suggesting that God was his Enemy, and fought against him; Am I the first who pitted to thee of thy enemies? or shall I destroy it? Is. xxxvii. 10. It is true, if God has forsaken a man, there is none to deliver him; but therefore to insult over him, ill becomes those who are conscious to themselves that they deserve to be for ever forsaken of God. But rejoice not against me, O mine enemy, though I fall, I shall rise He
14. But I will hope continually, and will yet praise thee more and more. 15. My mouth shall show forth thy righteousness and thy salvation all the day; for I know not the numbers thereof. 16. I will go in the strength of the Lord God: I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only. 17. O God, thou hast taught me from my youth: and hitherto have I declared thy wondrous works. 18. Now also, when I am old and gray-headed, O God, forsaile me not, until I have showed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power to every one that is to come. 19. Thy righteousness also, O God, is very high, who hast done great things: O God, who is like unto thee? 20. Thou, which hast showed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth. 21. Thou shalt increase my greatness, and comfort me on every side. 22. I will also praise thee with the psaltery, even thy truth, O my God: unto thee will I sing with the harp, O thou Holy One of Israel. 23. My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee; and my soul, which thou hast redeemed. 24. My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long: for they are confounded, for they are brought unto shame, that seek my hurt. David is here in a holy transport of joy and praise, arising from his faith and hope in God; we have both together, (v. 14.) where there is a sudden and remarkable change of his voice, his fears are all silenced, his hopes raised, and his prayers turned into thanksgivings, "Let mine enemies say what they will, to drive me to despair, I will hope continually, hope in all conditions, in the most cloudy and dark day; I will live upon hope, and will hope to the end."

saints, and that will help to extenuate them, and make them seem light. He does not say, "Thou hast burdened me with those troubles," but "showed them me;" as the tender father shows the child the rod to keep him in awe. [5.] Though God's people be not always in danger of the loss of great things, yet, it seems, (as long as we do live here,) much trouble he can revive them, and raise them up. Are they dead? He can quicken them again. See 2 Cor. i. 9. Are they buried, as dead men out of mind? He can bring them up again from the depths of the earth, can cheer the most dropping spirit, and raise the most sinking interest. [4.] If we have a due regard to the hand of God in our troubles, we may promise ourselves, in due time, a deliverance out of them. Our scenes being so much and so great, there shall be no hinderance to our joyful resurrection from the depths of the earth; witness our great Master, to whom this may have some reference; his Father showed him great and sore troubles, but quickened him and brought him up from the grave. (3.) He hopes that God will not only restore him out of his troubles, but would advance his honour and joy more than ever; (v. 21.) "Thou shalt not only restore me to my greatness again, but shalt increase it, and give me a better interest, after this shock, than before; thou shalt not only comfort me, but comfort me on every side, so that I shall see nothing black or threatening on any side." Note, Sometimes God makes his people's troubles contribute to the increase of their greatness, and their sun shines the brighter for having been under a cloud. If he makes them contribute to the increase of their godliness, that will prove in the end the increase of their greatness, their glory; and if he comfort them on every side, according to the time and degree wherein he has afflicted them on every side, they will have no reason to complain. When our Lord Jesus was quickened again, and brought back from the depths of the earth, his greatness was increased, and he entered on the joy set before him. (4.) He hopes that all his enemies will be brought to confusion, v. 24. He speaks of it with the greatest assurance as a thing done, and triumphs in it accordingly; They are confounded, they are brought to shame, that seek my hurt. His honour would be their disgrace, and his comfort their vexation. II. Let us now see how his heart is enlarged in joy and praises; how he rejoices in hope, and sings in hope, for we are saved by hope. 1. He will speak of God's righteousness and his salvation, as great things, things which he was well accustomed with, and much affected with, which he desired God might have the glory of, and others might have the comfortable knowledge of; (v. 15.) My mouth shall show forth thy righteousness, and thy salvation; and again, (v. 24.) My tongue shall talk of thy righteousness, and this, all the day. God's righteousness, which David seems here to be in a particular manner affected with, includes a great deal; the rectitude of his nature; the equity of his providence; the whole of his actions, and the divine laws; has given us to be ruled by; the righteous promises he has given us to depend upon; and the everlasting righteousness which his Son has brought in for our justification. God's righteousness and his salvation are here joined together; let no man think to put them asunder, nor expect salvation without righteousness, 1. 23. If these two are made the object of his desire, let them be made the subjects of our discourse and praises; for they are subjects that can never be drawn dry. 2. He will speak of them with wonder and adoration; as one astonished at the dimensions of divine love and grace, the height and depth, the length and breadth, of it; "I know not the numbers thereof;" (v. 15.) Though I cannot give a particular account of thy favours to me, they are so many, so great; (if I would count them, they are more in number than the sand, ch. 5.) yet, knowing them to be numberless, I will be still speaking of them, for in them I shall find new matter," v. 19. The righteousness and salvation of God, which is done by him for his people is very great; put both together, and we shall say, O God, who is like unto thee? This is praising God, acknowledging his perfections and performances to be, (1.) Above our conception; they are very high and great; so high, that we cannot apprehend them; so great that we cannot comprehend them. (2.) Without any parallel; no being like him, no works like his; O God, who is like unto thee? One of his works, then, renders him, no angel, no king. God is our refuge; we do not rightly praise him, if we do not own him to be so.

3. He will speak of them with all the expressions of joy and exultation, v. 22, 23. Observe, (1.) How he would eye God in praising him. [1.] As a faithful God; I will praise thee, even thy truth. God is made known by his word; if we praise that, and the truth of that, we praise him. By faith we set to our seal that God is true; and so we praise his truth. [2.] As a God in covenant with him; "O my God, whom I have consented to, and avouched for mine." As in our prayers, so in our praises, we must look up to God as our God, and give him the glory of our interest in him and relation to him. [3.] As the Holy One of Israel; Israel's God in a peculiar manner, glorious in his holiness among that people, and faithful to his covenant with them. It is God's honour, that he is a Holy One; it is his people's honour, that he is the Holy One of Israel. (2.) Observe how he will express his joy and exultation; [1.] With his hand, in sacred music, with the psaltery, with the harp; at these David excelled, and the best of his skill shall be employed in setting forth God's praises to such advantage as might affect others. [2.] With his lips, in sacred songs; "Unto thee will I sing, to thine honour; and with a desire to be accepted of thee. My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee, knowing they cannot be better employed." [3.] In both, with his heart; "My soul shall rejoice, which thou hast redeemed." Note, First, Holy joy is the very heart and life of thankful praise. Secondly, We do not make melody to the Lord, in singing his praises, if we do not do it with our hearts. My lips shall rejoice, but that is nothing; lip-labour, though ever so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour in serving God; the soul must be at rest, and with all. As we are to use our bodies to glorify his Holy Spirit; so all else about us is worth little. Thirdly, Redeemed souls ought to be joyful, thankful souls. The work of redemption ought, above all God's works, to be celebrated by us in our praises. The Lamb that was slain, and has redeemed us to God, must therefore be counted worthy of all blessing and praise.

PSALM LXXII.

The foregoing psalm was penned by David when he was old, and, it should seem, so was this too; for Solomon was not then seven years old for him, but was penning for himself, this for his son and successor, and with these two, the prayers of David, the son of Jesse, are ended, as we find in the close of this psalm. If we have but God's word to guide us while we regulate good offices concerning those that shall come after us, that they shall be praising God on earth when we are praising him in heaven, it is enough. This is entitled a psalm for Solomon; it is probable that he was by the blessed Spirit dictated to him, when, a little before he died, by divine direction, he settled the succession, and gave orders to proclaim Solomon king, 1 Kings i. 30, &c. But, though Solomon's name is here made use of, Christ's kingdom is here preached under the type and figure of Solomon's. David knew what the divine oracle was, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his
1. GIVE the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king’s son.

This verse is a prayer for the king, even the king’s son.

1. We may apply it to Solomon; Give him thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness; make him a man, a king; make him a good man, a good king. (1) It is the prayer of a father for his child; a dying blessing, such as the patriarchs bequeathed to their children. The best thing we can ask of God for our children, is, that God will give them wisdom and grace to know and do their duty; that is better than gold. Solomon learned to pray for himself as his father had prayed for him, not that God would give him riches and honour, but a wise and understanding heart. It was a comfort to David, it was the crown of his own blessedness. (2) It is the prayer of a king for his successor. David had executed judgment and justice during his reign, and now he prays that his son might do so too. Such a concern as this we should have for posterity, desiring and endeavouring that those who come after us may do God more and better service in their day than we have done in ours. Those have little love either to God or man, and are of a very narrow selfish spirit, who care not what becomes of the world and the church when they are gone. (3) It is the prayer of subjects for their king. It should seem, David penned this psalm for the use of the people, that they, in singing, might pray for Solomon. Those who would live quiet and peaceable lives, must pray for kings and all in authority, that God would give them his judgments and righteousness.

2. We may apply it to Christ; not that he who intercedes for us needs us to intercede for him. But, (1) It is a prayer of the Old Testament church for sending the Messiah, as the church’s King, King on the holy hill of Zion, of whom the King of kings had said, Thou art my Son, ii. 6, 7. “Hasten his coming, to whom all judgment is committed,” and we must thus hasten the second coming of Christ, when he shall judge the world in righteousness. (2) It is an expression of the saving reception which all true believers take in the authority which the Lord Jesus has received from the Father: “Let him have all power both in heaven and earth, and be the Lord our Righteousness; let him be the great Trustee of divine grace for all that are his; give it him, that he may give it us.”

2. He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment.

3. The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness.

4. He shall judge the poor of the people, he shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor. 5. They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations. 6. He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass; as showers that water the earth. 7. In his days shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. 8. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. 9. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; and his enemies shall lick the dust. 10. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. 11. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him. 12. For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper. 13. He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy, 14. He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence; and precious shall their blood be in his sight. 15. And he shall live, and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba: prayer also shall be made for him continually; and daily shall he be praised. 16. There shall be a handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon: and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth. 17. His name shall endure for ever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed.

This is a prophecy of the prosperity and perpetuity of the kingdom of Christ, under the shadow of the reign of Solomon. It comes in, 1. As a plea to enforce the prayer; “Lord, give him thy judgments, and thy righteousness, and then he shall judge thy people with righteousness, and shall answer the end of his elevation, v. 2. Give him thy grace, and then thy people, committed to his charge, will have the benefit of it.” Because God loved Israel, he made him king over them to do judgment and justice, 2 Chron. ix. 8. We may in faith wrestle with God for that grace which we have reason to think will be of common advantage to his church. 2. As an answer of peace to the prayer. As by the prayer of faith we return answers to God’s promises of mercy, so by the promises of mercy God returns answers to our prayers of faith. That this prophecy must refer to the kingdom of the Messiah, is plain, because there are many passages in it which cannot be applied to the reign of Solomon. There was indeed a great deal of righteousness and peace, at first, in the administration of his government; but, before the end of his reign, there were both trouble and unrighteousness. The kingdom here spoken of is to last as long as the sun, but Solomon’s was soon extinct. Therefore even the Jewish expositors understand it of the kingdom of the Messiah. Let us observe the many great and precious promises here made, which were to have their full accomplishment only in the kingdom of Christ; and yet some of them were in part fulfilled in Solomon's reign.

1. That it should be a righteous government; (v. 2.) He shall judge thy people with righteousness. Compare Isa. xi. 4. All the laws of Christ's kingdom are consonant to the eternal rules of equity; the chancery it creaks, to relieve against the rigours of an broken law, is indeed a court of equity; and against the sentence of his last judgment there will lie no exception. The peace of his kingdom shall be supported by righteousness; (v. 3.) For he shall judge the people with justice, and the nations with his truth. That is, (says Dr. Hammond,) both the superi- and the inferior courts of judicature in Solomon's kingdom. There shall be abundance of peace, v. 7. Solomon's name signifies peaceable, and such was his reign; for in Israel enjoyed the victories of the foreign reign, and preserved the tranquillity and repose of that reign. But peace is, in a special man- ner, the glory of Christ's kingdom, for, as far as it prevails, it reconciles men to God, to themselves, and to one another, and slays all enmities; for he is our Peace.

II. That it should be a peaceable government; The mountains shall be brought down, and the little hills; (v. 3.) that is, (says Dr. Hammond,) both the supe- rior and the inferior courts of judicature in Solomon's kingdom. There shall be abundance of peace, v. 7. Solomon's name signifies peaceable, and such was his reign; for in Israel enjoyed the victories of the foreign reign, and preserved the tranquillity and repose of that reign. But peace is, in a special man- ner, the glory of Christ's kingdom, for, as far as it prevails, it reconciles men to God, to themselves, and to one another, and slays all enmities; for he is our Peace.

III. That the poor and needy should be, in a particular manner, taken under the protection of this government; (v. 4.) He shall deliver the needy, and will rescue the poor, who are God's poor, that are impoverished by keeping a good conscience, and those shall be provided for with a distinguishing care, shall be judged for with judgment, with a particular cognizance taken of their case, and a particular vengeance taken for their wrongs. The poor of the people, and the children of the needy, he will be sure to judge, as to save, v. 4. This is insisted upon again, (v. 12, 13.) intimating that Christ will be sure to carry his cause on behalf of his injured poor. He will deliver the needy that lie at the mercy of their oppressors, the poor also, both because they have no helper, and it is for his honour to help them; and because they cry unto him, and he has promised, in answer to their prayers, to help them; they by prayers commit themselves unto him, x. 14. He will spare the needy that throw themselves on his mercy, and will not be rigorous and severe with them, he will spare them, and to the world, and to his church, Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the king- dom of heaven. Christ is the poor man's King.

IV. That proud oppressors shall be reckoned with; He shall break them in pieces; (v. 4.) shall take away their power to hurt, and punish them for all the mischief they have done. This is the office of a good king, Parcerre subjecta, et debellare superbo—To spare the vanquished, and debate the victorious. The Devil is the great oppressor, whom Christ will break in pieces, and of whose kingdom he will be the destruction; with the breath of his mouth shall he slay that wicked one, (Isa. xi. 4.) and shall deliver the souls of his people from deceit and violence, v. 14. He shall save from the power of Satan, both as an old serpent working by deceit to ensnare them, and as a roaring lion working by violence to terrify and devour them. So precious shall the destruction of Satan be, and the destruction of his instruments, without being reckoned for,Christ is a King, who, though he calls his subjects sometimes to resist unto blood for him, yet is not prodigal of their blood, nor will ever have it parted with, but upon a valuable consideration to his glory and theirs, and the filling up of the measure of their enemies' iniquity.

V. That religion shall flourish under Christ's go- vernment; (v. 5.) They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure. Solomon indeed built the temple; and in the face of God was well kept up, for some time, under his government, but it did not last long; this, therefore, must point at Christ's kingdom, all the subjects of which are brought to, and kept in, the fear of God; for the Christian religion has a direct tendency to, and a powerful influence upon, the support and advance- ment of natural religion. Faith in Christ will set up, and keep up, the fear of God; and therefore this is the everlasting gospel that is preached, Fear God, and give honor to him. Rev. xiv. 7. And as Christ's government promotes devotion toward God, so it promotes both justice and charity among men; (v. 7.) In his days shall the righteous flourish; righteousness shall be practised, and those that practise righteousness shall be preferred. Righ- teousness shall abound, and be in reputation, shall command, and be in power. The law of Christ, written in the heart, disposes men to be honest and just, and to render to all their due; it likewise dis- poses men to live in love; and so it produces abund- ance of peace, and beats swords into ploughshares. Both holiness and love shall be perpetual in Christ's kingdom, and shall never go to decay, for the sub- jects of it shall fear God as long as the sun and moon endure; Christianity, in the profession of it, having got footing in the world, shall keep its ground till the end of time, and having, in the power of it, got footing in the world, shall last long. The earth is filled, by death, the sun, and the moon, and the stars, that is, the bodily senses, are darkened. Through all the changes of the world, and all the changes of life, Christ's kingdom will support itself; and if the fear of God continues as long as the sun and moon, abundance of peace will. The peace of the church, the peace of the soul, shall run parallel with its purity and piety, and last as long as these last.

VI. That Christ's government shall be the most comfor- table to his faithful loving subjects; (v. 6.) He shall, by the graces and comforts of his Spirit, come down like rain upon the mown grass; not on that which is cut down, but that which is left growing, that it may spring again, though it was beheaded. The gospel of Christ distils as the rain which softens the ground that was hard, moistens that which was dry, and so makes it green and fruitful, Isa. lv. 10. Let our hearts drink in the rain, Heb. vii. 11. Solomon's kingdom shall be extended very far, and greatly enlarged; considering, 1. The extent of his territories; (v. 8.) He shall have dominion from sea to sea, from the South sea to the North, or from the Red sea to the Mediterranean; and from the river Euphrates, or Nile, to the ends of the earth. Solomon's dominion was very large, (1 Kings iv. 21.) according to the promise, Gen. xvi. 18. But no sea, no river, is named, that it might, by these proverbial expressions, speak the universal monarchy of the Lord Jesus. His gospel has been, or shall be, preached to all nations, (Matt. xxiv. 14.) and the kingdoms of the world shall become his kingdoms. (Rev. xv. 15.) when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in. His ter- ritories shall be extended to those countries, (1.) That were strangers to him; They that dwell in the wilderness, cut of all high roads, that seldom hear of the true religion. (2.) That were enemies to him, and had fraught against him; They shall lick the dust, they shall be brought down, and laid in the dust, shall bite the ground for vexation, and be so hunger-bitten, that given of his wisdom, justice, and goodness; Daily shall he be praised. By praying daily in his name, we give him honour. Subjects ought to speak well of the government that is a blessing to them; and much more ought all Christians to praise Jesus Christ, daily to praise him; for they owe their all to him, and to him they lie under the highest obligations.

IX. That under his government there shall be a wonderful increase both of meat and mire and, both of the fruits of the earth in the country, and of the people inhabiting the cities. v. 16. The country shall grow rich; saw but a handful of corn on the tops of the mountains, whence one would expect but little, and yet the fruit of it shall shake like Lebanon. Even upon the tops of the mountains, the earth shall bring forth by handfuls; that is an expression of great plenty; (Gen. xli. 47.) as the grass upon the house-top is said to be where with the mower fills not his hand. This is applicable to the wonderful productions of the seed of the gospel in the days of the Messiah. A handful of that seed, sown in the mountainous and barren soil of the Gentile world, shall bring forth greater than the increase of Lebanon; and, fruit that shock like Lebanon. The fields were white to the harvest, John iv. 35. Math. ix. 37. The grain of mustard-seed grew up to a great tree. 2. The towns shall grow populous; They of the city shall flourish like grass, for number, for verdure. The Gospel-church, the city of God among men, shall have all the marks of prosperity, many shall be added to it, and those that are, shall be happy in it.

X. That his government shall be perpetual, both to his honour, and to the happiness of his subjects. The Lord Jesus shall reign for ever, and of him only this must be understood, and set at all of Solomon. It is Christ only that shall be feared throughout all generations, (v. 5.) and as long as the sun and moon endure, v. 7. The honour of the prince is immortal, and shall never be sullied; (v. 17.) His name shall endure for ever, in despite of all the malicious attempts and endeavours of the powers of darkness to eclipse the lustre of it, and to cut off the line of it; it shall be preserved, it shall be perpetuated, it shall be propagated. As the names of earthly princes are continued in their posterity, so Christ is in himself; Filiiabur nomen eius—His name shall descend to posterity; all nations, while the world stands, shall call him blessed; shall bless God for him, continually speak well of him, and think themselves happy in him. To the end time, and to eternity, his name shall be celebrated, shall be made use of; every tongue shall confess it, and every knee shall bow before it. The happiness of the people is universal too, it is complete, and everlasting; men shall be blessed, truly and for ever blessed, in him. This plainly refers to the promise made unto the fathers, that in the Messiah all the nations of the earth should be blessed, Gen. xii. 3.

18. Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things. 19. And blessed be his glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen. Amen. 20. The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.

Such an illustrious prophecy as is in the foregoing verses of the Messiah and his kingdom, may fitly be concluded, as it is here, with hearty prayers and praises.
for the prophecy and promise, v. 18, 19. So sure is every word of God, and with so much satisfaction may we rely upon it, that we have reason enough to give thanks for what he has said, though it be not yet done. We must own, that, for all the great things he has done for the world, the church, for the children of men, for his own children, in the works of providence, in the kingdom of grace, for all the power and trust lodged in the hands of the Redeemer, he is worthy to be praised; we must stir up ourselves and all that is within us to praise him after the best manner, and desire that all others may do it. Blessed be the Lord, that is, blessed be his glorious name; for it is only in his name that we can contribute any thing to his glory and blessedness, and yet that is as well as any other name. Let it be blessed for ever, it shall be blessed for ever, it deserves to be blessed for ever, and we hope to be for ever blessing it. We are here taught to bless the name of Christ, and to bless God in Christ, for all that he has done for us by him. We must bless him, (1.) As the Lord God, as a self-existent, self-sufficient, Being, and our Sovereign Lord. (2.) As the God of Israel, in covenant with that people, and work shewn by his hand, and does them and does those to the ends of the earth unto Jacob and the mercy to Abraham. (3.) As the God who only does wonderful things, in creation and providence, and especially this work of redemption, which exceeds them all. Men’s works are little common trifling things, which, however, without him, they could not do. But God does all by his own power, and they are wondrous things which he does, and such as will be the eternal admiration of saints and angels.

2. He is earnest in prayer for the accomplishment of this prophecy and promise; Let the whole earth be filled with his glory; as it will be when the kings of Tarshish, and the isles, shall bring presents to him. It is sad to think how empty the earth is of the glory of God, how little service and honour he has from a world to which he is such a beneficent. All these, therefore, that wish well to the honour of God, and the welfare of mankind, cannot but wish that the earth may be filled with the discoveries of his glory, suitably returned in thankful acknowledgments of his glory. Let every heart, and every mouth, and every assembly, be filled with the high praises of God. We shall see how earnest David is in this prayer, and how much his heart is in it, if we observe, (1.) How he shuts up the prayer with a double seal; “Amen and Amen, again and again I say, I say it, and let all others say the same, so be it; Amen to my prayer, Amen to the prayers of all the saints to this purpose; Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come.” (2.) How he even shuts up his life with this prayer, v. 20. This was the last psalm that ever he penned, though not placed last in this collection; he penned it when he lay on his death-bed, and with this he breathes his last; “Let God be glorified, let the kingdom of the Messiah be set up, and kept up in the world, and I have enough.” With this let the prayers of David the son of Jesse be ended; even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.”

This psalm, and the ten that next follow it, carry the name of David; it is in the titles of them, “If he was the penman of them, (as many other parts of Scripture are,) we rightly refer them psalms of Asaph. If he was only the chief musician, to whom they were delivered, our marginal reading is right, which calls them psalms for Asaph. It is probable that he penned them for we read of the words of David, and of Asaph the seer, which were used in praising God, in Hezekiah’s time, 2 Chron. xxxix. 30. Though the Spirit of prophecy, by sacred songs, descended chiefly on David, who is therefore styled the sweet psalmist of Israel, yet God put some of that Spirit upon those about him. This is a psalm of great use; it gives us an account of the conflict which the psalmist had with a strong temptation to envy the prosperity of wicked people. He begins his account with a sacred principle, which he held fast, and, by the help of which, he kept his ground, and carried his point, v. I. He then tells us, I. How he got into the temptation, v. 2-14. II. How he got out of the temptation, and gained a victory over it, v. 15-20. III. How he got by the temptation, and was the better for it, v. 21-28. In singing this psalm, we fortify ourselves against the like temptation, we do not use it in vain. The experiences of others should be our instructions.

A psalm of Asaph.

1. TRULY God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart. 2. But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped. 3. For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. 4. For there are no bands in their death; but their strength is firm. 5. They are not in trouble as other men, neither are they plagued like other men. 6. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment. 7. Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish. 8. They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily. 9. They set their mouth against the heavens; and their tongue walketh through the earth. 10. Therefore his people return hither; and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them: 11. And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the Most High? 12. Behold, these are the ungodly who prosper in the world; they increase in riches. 13. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. 14. For all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning.

This psalm begins somewhat abruptly. Yet God is good to Israel, so the margin reads it: he had been thinking of the prosperity of the wicked, while he was thus musing, the fire burned, and, at last, he spake by way of check to himself for what he had been thinking of; “However it be, yet God is good.” Though wicked people receive many of the gifts of his providential bounty, yet we must own that he is, in a peculiar manner, good to Israel; they have favours from him, which others have not.

The psalmist designs an account of a temptation he was strongly assaulted with—to envy the prosperity of the wicked; a common temptation, which has tried the graces of many of the saints. Now, in this account,

I. He lays down, in the first place, that great principle which he is resolved to abide by, and not to quit while he was perusing with this temptation, v. 1. Job, when he was entering into such a temptation, fixed for his principle, the omniscience of God; Times are not hidden from the Almighty, Job xxiv. 1. Jeremiah’s principle is, the justice of God; Righteous art thou, O God, when I plea with thee, Jer. xii. 1. Habakkuk’s principle is, the holiness of God; Thou art of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, Hab. i. 13. The psalmist's here, is, the goodness of God. These are truths which cannot be shaken, and which we must resolve to live and die by. Though we may not be able to reconcile all the disposals of Providence with them, we must believe they are reconcilable. Note, Good thoughts of God will fortify us against many of Satan's temptations. Truly God is good; he had had many thoughts in his mind concerning the worst things that could happen to him, last, but he beth at him; For all this, God is good, good to Israel, even to those that are of a clean heart. Note, 1. Those are the Israel of God that are of a clean heart, purified by the blood of Christ, cleansed from the pollutions of sin, and entirely devoted to the glory of God. An upright heart is a clean heart; cleanness is truth in the inward part. 2. God, who is good to all, is, in a special manner, good to his church and people, as he was good to his people of old. God was good to Israel in redeeming them out of Egypt, taking them into covenant with himself, giving them his laws and ordinances, and, in the various providences that related to them; he is, in like manner, good to all them that are of a clean heart, and, whatever happens, we must not think otherwise.

II. He comes, now, to relate the shock that was given to him, in God's distinguishing grace to Israel, by a strong temptation to envy the prosperity of the wicked, and therefore to think that the Israel of God are no happier than other people, and that God is no kinder to them than to others. He speaks of it as a very near escape, that he had not been quite foiled and overthrown by this temptation, v. 2. But, as for me, though I was so well satisfied in the goodness of God to Israel, yet my heart was almost gone, the tempter had almost tripped me up, and I staggered. Shortly after, being stirred up, I had had to quitting my religion, and given up all my expectations of benefit by it, for I was envious at the foolish.” Note, 1. The faith even of strong believers may sometimes be sorely shaken, and ready to fail them. There are storms that will try the firmest anchors. 2. Those that shall never be quite undone, are sometimes very near it, and, in their own apprehension, as good as gone. The ruin of a precious soul, that shall live for ever, had once a very narrow turn of its life; almost and well nigh ruined, but a step between it and fatal apostasy, and yet snatched as a brand out of the burning, which will for ever magnify the riches of divine grace in the nations of them that are saved.

Now let us take notice of the process of the psalmist's temptation, what he was tempted with, and tempted to do.

(1.) He observed that foolish wicked people have sometimes a very great share of outward prosperity. He saw, with grief, the prosperity of the wicked, v. 3. Wicked people are really foolish people, and act against reason and their true interest, and yet every one of them sees their prosperity.

[1.] They seem to have the least share of the troubles and calamities of this life; (v. 5.) They are not in the troubles of other men, even of wise and good men, neither are they plagued like other men, but seem as if, by some special privilege, they were exempted from the common lot of sorrows. If they meet with some little trouble, it is nothing to what others endure, that are less sinners, and yet greater sufferers.

[2.] They seem to have the greatest share of the comforts of this life. They live at ease, and bathe themselves in pleasures, so that their eyes stand out with fatness, v. 7. See what the excess of pleasure is; the moderate use of it enlightens the eye, but they indulge themselves inordinate in the delights of sense have their eyes ready to start out of their heads. Epicures are really their own tormentors, by putting a force upon nature, while they pretend to gratify it. And well may they feed themselves to the full, who have more than heart could wish, more than they themselves ever thought of, or expected to be masters of. They have, at least, more than an humble, quiet, contented, heart could wish, yet not so much as they themselves wish for. There are many who have a great deal of this life in their hands, but nothing of the other life in their possession. They are ungodly, which is, without the fear and worship of God, and yet they prosper and come on in the world, and not only are rich, but increase in riches, v. 12. They are looked upon as thriving men; while others have much ado to keep what they have, they are still adding more, more honour, power, pleasure, by increasing in riches; They are the prosperous of the age, so some read it.

[2.] Their end seems to be peace; this is mentioned first, on account of its being so strange; for it was never thought to be the peculiar privilege of the godly; (xxxvi. 37.) yet, to outward appearance, it is often the lot of the ungodly; (v. 4.) There are no bands in their death. They are not taken off by a violent death; they are foolish, and yet die not as fools die; for their hands are not bound, nor their feet put in fetters, 2 Sam. iii. 33, 34. They are not taken off by an untimely death, like the fruit forced from the tree before it is ripe; but their days are left to hang, till, through old age, they gently drop off themselves. They do not die of sorne and painful diseases, there are no pangs, no agonies, in their death, but their strength is firm to the last, so that they scarcely feel themselves die. They are of those who die in their full strength, being wholly at ease and quiet; not of those that die in the bitterness of soul; (v. 5.) They never eat with pleasure, Job xxx. 25, 25. Nay, they are not bound without the terrors of conscience in their dying moments, they are not frightened either with remembrance of their sins, or the prospect of their misery; but die securely. We cannot judge of men's state on the other side death, either by the manner of their death, or the frame of their spirits in dying. Men may die like lambs, and yet have their place with the goats.

(2.) He observed that they made a very bad use of their outward prosperity, and were hardened by it in their wickedness, which very much strengthened the temptation he was in to fret at it. If it had done them any good, if it had made them less provoking to God, or less oppressive to man, it would never have vexed him; but it had quite a contrary effect upon them.

[1.] It made them very proud and haughty, because they live at ease; Pride compasses them as a chain, v. 6. They show themselves (to all that see them) to be puffed up with their prosperity, as men show their ornaments; The pride of Israel testifies to his face, Hos. v. 5. Isa. i. 9. Pride ties on their chain, or necklace; so Dr. Hammond reads it. It is no harm to wear a chain or necklace; but when pride ties it on, when it is worn to gratify a vain mind, it ceases to be an ornament. It is not so much with what apparel is, (though we have rules for that, 1 Tim. ii. 9.) as what principle does it on, and with what spirit it is worn. And as the pride of sinners appear in their dress, so it doth in their talk; They speak loftily; (v. 8.) they affect great swelling words of vanity, (2 Pet. ii. 18.) bringing of themselves, and disdaining all about them. Out of the abundance of the pride that is in their heart they speak big.

[3.] It made them oppressive to their poor neighbours; (v. 6.) Violence covers them as a garment. What they have got by fraud and oppression, they keep and increase by the same wicked methods, and care not what injury they do to others, nor what violence they use, so they may enrich and aggrandize themselves. They are corrupt, like the giants, the sinners of the old world, when the earth was filled with violence, Gen. vi. 11, 13. They care not what mischief they do, either for mischief-sake, or for their own advantage-sake. They speak wickedly concerning opponents and themselves in it; they that speak well of sin, speak wickedly of it. They are corrupt, that is, dissolved in pleasures, and every thing that is luxurious; (so some;) and then they deride and speak maliciously, they care not whom they wound with the poisoned darts of calumny, from on high they speak oppression.

[3.] It made them very insolent in their carriage, toward both God and man; (v. 9.) They set their mouth against the heavens; putting contempt upon God himself and his honour, bidding defiance to him, and his power and justice; they cannot reach the heavens with their hands, to shake God's throne, else they would; but they show their ill-will by setting their mouth against the heavens. Their tongue also walks through the earth, and they take liberty to abuse all that come in their way. No man's greatness or goodness can satisfy him; for the good things they had, and would have taught them to use them well, that they were not willing to believe God had any knowledge of them, that he took any notice of their wickedness, or would ever call them to an account. As if because he is Most High, he could not, or would not, see them, Job xxii. 12, 13. Whereas because he is Most High, therefore he can, and will, take cognizance of all the children of men, and of all their doings, and things. What he affords it to the God of infinite knowledge, from whom all knowledge is, to ask, Is there knowledge in him? Well may he say, (v. 12.) Behold, these are the ungodly. (3.) He observed, that, while wicked men thus prospered in their impiety, and were made more impious by their prosperity, good people were in great affliction, and he himself in particular, which very much strengthened the temptation he was in to quarrel with Providence.

[1.] He looked abroad, and saw many of God's people greatly at a loss; (v. 10.) "Because the wicked are so very daring, therefore his people return hither; they are at the same pause, the same plunge, that I am at; they know not what to say to it, any more than I do, and the rather, because waters of a full cup are wrung out to them; they are not only made to drink, and to drink deep, of the bitter cup of affliction, but to drink all; care is taken that they lose not a drop of that unpleasant potion, the waters are wrung out unto them, that they may have the dregs of the cup. They pour out abundance of tears when they hear wicked people blaspheme God, and speak profanely," as David did, cxxix. 135. These are the waters wrung out to them.

[2.] He looked at home, and felt himself under the same temptations, yea, which the wicked used were sunning themselves in its smiles; (v. 14.) "For my part," says he, "All the day long have I been plagued with one affliction or another, and chastened every morning, as duly as the morning comes." His afflictions were great, he was chastened and plagued; the returns of them were constant, every morning with the morning, and they continued, without intermission, all the day long. This he thought was very hard, that, when those who blasphemed God were in prosperity, he, that worshipped God, was under such great affliction. He spake feelingly when he spake of his own troubles; there is that in the affirmative, which he supposed was not in the negative.

[4.] From all this arose a very strong temptation to cast off his religion. [1.] Some, that observed the prosperity of the wicked, especially comparing it with the afflictions of the righteous, were tempted to deny a Providence, and to think that God had forsaken the earth. In this sense some take v. 11. There are these, even among God's professing people, that say,—How does God know? Surely all things are left to blind fortune, and not disposed of by an all-seeing God." Some of the heathen, upon such a remark as this, have asked, Quis frater esse Deos.—Who will believe that there are Gods? [2.] Though the psalmist's feats were not so far gone as to question God's omniscience, yet he was tempted to question the benefit of religion, and to say, (v. 13.) Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain, and have, to no purpose, washed my hands in innocency. So here he tells it to be religious; it is to cleanse our hearts, in the first place, by repentance and regeneration, and then to wash our hands in innocency, by an universal reformation of our lives. It is not in vain to do this; not in vain to serve God and keep his ordinances; but good men have been sometimes tempted to say, "It is in vain, and "Religion is a thing that there is nothing to be got by," because they see wicked people in prosperity. But however the thing may appear now, when they are pure in heart, they that are cleansing ones, shall see God, (Mic. vi. 8.) they will not say that they have closed their hearts in vain.

15. If I say, I will speak thus; behold, I should offend against the generation of thy children. 16. When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me. 17. Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. 18. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction. 19. How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terror. 20. As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awaketh, thou shalt despise their image.

We have seen what a strong temptation the psalmist was in to envy prospering profaneness; now here we are told how he kept his footing, and got the victory.

1. He kept up a respect for God's people, and with that he restrained himself from speaking what he had thought amiss, v. 15. He got the victory by degrees, and this was the first point he gained; he was ready to say, Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain, and thought he had reason to say it; but he kept his mouth with this consideration; "If I say, I will speak thus; behold, I should myself revolt and apostatize from, and so give the greatest offence imaginable to, the generation of thy children." Observe here, 1. Though he thought amiss, he took the trouble to think it over, and he had conceived. Note, It is bad to think ill, but it is worse to speak it, for that is giving the evil thought an Imprimatur.—A public sanction; it is allowing it, giving consent to it, and publishing it.
A. Because light soning;" for this reason, he may think what thing children.
2. The reason why he would not speak it, was, for fear of giving offence to those whom God owned for his children.
Note. (1.) There are a people in the world, that are the generation of God's children, a set of men that hear and love God as their Father. (2.) They must be very careful not to say or do any thing which may justly offend any of these little ones, (Matt. xviii. 6.) especially which may offend the generation of them, may sadden their hearts, or weaken their hands, or shake their interest. (3.) There is nothing that can give more general offence to the generation of God's children, than to say that we have cleansed our heart in vain, or that it is in vain to serve God; for there is nothing more contrary to the most ancient, and approved experience, than that we should have no thing that grieves them more, than to hear God thus reflected on. (4.) Those that wish themselves in the condition of the wicked, do, in effect,quit the tents of God's children.

II. He foresaw the ruin of wicked people; by this he baffled the temptation, as by the former he gave some check to it. Because he durst not speak what he had thought, for fear of giving offence he began to consider whether he had any good reason for that thought; (v. 16.) "I endeavoured to understand the meaning of this unaccountable dispensation of Providence; but it was too painful for me, I could not conquer it by the strength of my own reasoning;" it was a problem, not to be solved by the mere light of nature, for, if there were not another life after this, we could not fully reconcile the prosperity of the wicked with the justice of God; but (v. 17.) he went into the sanctuary of God, he plunged his soul up into the attributes of God, and the things revealed which belong to us and to our children; he consulted the scriptures, and the lips of the priests who attended the sanctuary; he prayed to God to make this matter plain to him, and to help him over this difficulty; and, at length, he understood the wretched end of wicked people, which he plainly foresaw to be such, that, even in the height of their prosperity, they were rather to be pitied than envied, for they were but ripening for ruin.

Note. 1. There are many great things, and things needful to be known, which will not be known otherwise than by going into the sanctuary of God, by the word and prayer. The sanctuary therefore must be the resort of a tempted soul. 2. We must judge of persons and things as they appear by the light of divine revelation, and then we shall judge righteous judgments, particularly of the measure of our own mercies, which are very often, well, everlasting well; but nothing well that ends ill, everlasting ill. The righteous man's afflictions end in peace, and therefore he is happy; the wicked man's enjoyments end in destruction, and therefore he is miserable.

(1.) The prosperity of the wicked is short and uncertain; the high places in which Providence sets them, are slippery places, (v. 18.) where they cannot long keep footing; but when they do climb higher, the very attempt will be the occasion of their sliding and falling. Their prosperity has no firm ground, it is not built upon God's favour or his pleasure, but is of a nature, which no one can call his own. 2. Their destruction is sure, and sudden, and very great. This cannot be meant of any temporal destruction; for they were supposed to spend all their days in wealth, and their death itself had no bands in it; In a moment they go down to the grave, so that even that which could scarcely be called their destruction; it must therefore be meant of eternal destruction. They flourish for a time, but are undone for ever. [1.] Their ruin is sure and inevitable; he speaks of it as a thing done; They are cast down; for their destruction is as certain as if it were already accomplished. He speaks of it as God's doing, and therefore it cannot be resisted; Thou castest them down, it is destruction from the Almighty, (Job i. 15.) from the glory of his power, 2 Thess. ii. 9. Who can support those whom God will cast down, on whom God will lay burdens? [2.] It is swift and sudden; Their damnation slumbers not; for how are they brought into desolation as in a moment! v. 19. It is easily effected, and will be a surprise to themselves and all about them. [3.] It is severe and very dreadful. It is a total, final, ruin; They are utterly consumed with terrors. It is the misery of the damned, that the terrors of the Almighty, the terrors of God; this is the Almighty, that deals with them upon their guilty consciences, which can neither shelter them from them, nor strengthen them under them; and therefore not their being, but their bliss, must needs be utterly consumed by them; not the least degree of comfort or hope remains to them; the higher they were lifted up in their prosperity, the sorier will their fall be when they are cast down into desuctions, (for the word is plural,) and suddenly brought into desolation.

(5.) Their prosperity is therefore not to be envied at all, but despised rather; quad erat demonstrandum—which was the point to be established; v. 20. As a dream when one awaketh, so, O Lord, when thou awaketh, or when they awake, (as some read it,) thou shalt despise their image, their shadow, and make it to vanish. In the day of the great judgment, (so the Chaldee paraphrase reads it,) when they are awaked out of their graves, thou shalt, in that day, despise their image, and make them to rise to shame and everlasting contempt.

See here, [1.] What their prosperity now is; it is but an image, a vain show, a fashion of the world that passes away; it is not real, but imaginary, and it is only a corrupt imagination that makes it a happiness; it is not substance, but a mere shadow; it is not what it seems to be, nor will it prove what we promise ourselves from it; it is as a dream, which may please us a little, while we are asleep, yet, even when we awake, we find it so. A hungry man dreams that he eats, but he awakes, and his soul is empty, Is. xxxix. 8. A man is never the more rich or honourable for dreaming he is so. Who therefore will envy a man the pleasure of a dream? [2.] What will be the issue of it; God will awake to the dream, and make it vanity and vexation of spirit. The sponginess that we now understand, is not because; they shall be made to awake out of the sleep of their carnal security, and then God shall despise their image; he shall make it appear to all the world how despicable it is; so that the righteous shall laugh at them, li. 6, 7. How did God despise that rich man's image, when he said, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee! Luke xii. 18, 20. We ought to be of God's mind, for his judgment is according to truth, and not to adore and envy that which he despises, and will despise; for, sooner or later, he will bring all the world to be of one mind.

21. Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins. 22. So foolish was I and ignorant; I was as a beast before thee. 23. Nevertheless, I am continually with thee; thou hast holden me by my right hand. 24. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory. 25. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. 26. My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever. 27. For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish; thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee. 28. But it is good for me to draw near to God: I have put my trust in the Lord God, that I may declare all thy works.

Behold Samson’s riddle again unriddled, Out the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong sweetness; for we have here an account of the good improvement which the psalmist made of that sordid temptation with which he had been assaulted, and by which he was almost overcome. He that stumples and does not fall, by recovering himself takes so much the longer steps forward. It was so with the psalmist here; divers good lessons he learned from his temptation, his struggles with it, and his victories over it. Nor would God suffer his people to be tempted, if his grace were not sufficient for them, not only to save them from harm, but to make them gainers by it; even this shall work for good.

I. He learned to think very humbly of himself, and to abase and accuse himself before God; (v. 21, 22.) he reflects with shame upon the disorder and danger he was in, and the vexation he gave himself, by entertaining the temptation, and plying with it; My heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins, as one afflicted with the acute pain of the stone in the region of the kidneys. If evil thoughts at any time enter into the mind of a good man, he does not roll them under his tongue as a sweet morse, but they are grievous and painful to him; temptation was to Paul as a thorn in the flesh, 2 Cor. xii. 7. This particular temptation, the working of envy and discontent, is as painful as any other; where it constantly rests, it is the rottenness of the bones, (Prov. xiv. 30.) where it does but occasionally come, it is the pricking of the reins. Fretfulness is a corruption that is its own correction.

Now, in the reflection upon it, 1. He owns it was his folly thus to vex himself; So foolish was I to be my own tormentor. Let peevish people thus reproach themselves for, and shame themselves out of, their discontent; What a fool am I thus to make myself uneasy without a cause! 2. He owns it was his ignorance to vex himself at this; So ignorant was I of that which I might have known, and which, if I had known it aright, would have been sufficient to have silenced my murmurs. I was as a beast, Behemoth, a great beast, before thee. Beasts mind present things only, and never look before at what is to come; and so did I. If I had not been a great fool, I should never have suffered such a senseless temptation to have prevailed over me so far. What to envy wicked men upon account of their prosperity? To be ready to wish myself one of them, and to think of changing conditions with them? So foolish was I. Note, If good men do, at any time, through the surprise and strength of temptation, think, or speak, or act, amiss, when they see their error, they will reflect upon it with sorrow, and shame, and self-abhorrence; will call themselves fools for it; Surely I am more brutish than any man, Prov. xxx. 2. 2. Since David, 2 Sam. xxiv. 10.

II. He took occasion hence to own his dependence on God, and to make to him an act of praise; I. To the grace of God; 2. "Nevertheless, foolish as I am, I am continually with thee, and in thy favour, thou hast holden me by my right hand." This may refer, either, 1. To the care God had taken of him, and the kindness he had showed him, all along from his beginning hitherto. He had said, in the hour of temptation, (v. 14.) All the day long have I been plagued; but here he corrects himself for that passionate complaint. Though, God had, chanced to mark me, he had not cast me oft; notwithstanding all the cresses of my life, I have been continually with thee, I have had thy presence with me, and thou hast nigh unto me in all that I have called upon thee for; and therefore, though perplexed, yet not in despair. Though God has sometimes written bitter things against me, yet he has still holden me by my right hand, both to keep me, that I should not desert, or cast me off from him, and to prevent my sinking and fainting under my burdens, and to lead me by my way in the wilderness through which I have walked. If we have been kept in the way with God, kept close to our duty, and upheld in our integrity, we must own ourselves indebted to the free grace of God for our preservation; Having obtained help of God, I continue hitherto. And if he has thus maintained the spiritual life, the earnest of eternal life, we ought not to complain, whatever calamities of this present time we have met with. Or, 2. In the late experience he had had of the power of divine grace in carrying him through this strong temptation, and bringing him off a conqueror; I was foolish and ignorant, and yet thou hast had compassion on me, and taught me, (Heb. v. 2.) and kept me under thy protection; for the unworthiness of man is no bar to the free grace of God. We must ascribe our safety in temptation, and our victory over it, to the grace of God, not to our own wisdom or prudence. If we have been steadfast in our work, we need not rejoice in it; but in God's grace. If we have been foolish and ignorant, yet not in despair, but that thou hast holden me by my right hand, and so kept me from falling.

III. He encouraged himself to hope that the same God who had delivered him from this evil work, would preserve him to his heavenly kingdom, as St. Paul does; (2 Tim. iv. 18.) I am now upheld by thee, therefore thou shalt guide me with thy counsel; leading me, as thou hast done hitherto, many a difficult step; and, since I am now continually with thee, thou shalt afterward receive me to glory, v. 24. This completes the happiness of the saints, so that they have no reason to envy the worldly prosperity of sinners. Note, 1. All those who commit themselves to God, shall be guided with his counsel, with the counsel both of his Word and of his Spirit, the best Counsellors. The psalmist had like to have paid dear for following his own counsels in this temptation, and therefore resolves, for the future, to take God's advice, which shall never be wanting to those that duly seek it, with a resolution to follow it. 2. All those that are guided and led by the counsel of God in this world, shall be received to his kingdom in a prosperous manner. When God's glory in us the end we aim at, he will make our glory with him the end we shall for ever be happy in. Upon this consideration, let us never envy sinners, but rather bless ourselves in our own blessedness. If God direct us in the way of our duty, and prevent our turning aside out of it, he will afterward, when our state of trial and preparation is over, receive us to his kingdom and glory; the believing hopes and prospects of which will reconcile us to all the dark providences that now puzzle and perplex us, and ease us of the pain we have been put into by some that would have us be unhappy.

IV. He was hereby quickened to cleave the closer to God, and very much confirmed and comforted in the choice he had made of him; (v. 25, 26.) his thoughts here dwell with delight upon his own happiness in God, as much greater than the happiness of the ungodly that prospered in the world. He saw little reason to envy them what they had in the creature, when he found how much more and better, sure and sweeter, comforts he had in the Creator, and what cause he had to congratulate himself on this account. He had complained of his afflictions; (v. 14.) but this makes them very light and easy, All is well, if God be mine. We have here the breathings of a sanctified soul toward God, and its repose in him, as that to a godly man really, which the prosperity of a worldly man is to him in conceit and imagination; Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is not one to desire a soul in heaven in all the psalms, more expressive than this of the perpetual and devout affections of a soul to God; here it soars up toward him, follows hard after him, and yet, at the same time, has an entire satisfaction and complacency in him.

1. It is here supposed that God alone is the Felicity and Chief Good of man. He, and he only, that made the soul, can make it happy; there is none in heaven, none in earth, that can pretend to do it besides him.

2. Here are expressed the workings and breathings of a soul toward God accordingly. If God be our Felicity,

(1.) Then we must have him; (Whom have I but thee?) we must choose him, and make sure to ourselves an interest in him. What will it avail us that he is the Felicity of souls, if he be not the Felicity of our souls, and if we do not by a lively faith make sure to ourselves that we are an everlasting covenant?

(2.) Then our desire must be toward him, and our delight in him; the word signifies both; we must delight in what we have of God, and desire what we yet further hope for. Our desires must not only be offered up to God, but they must all terminate in him; desiring nothing more than God, but still more and more of him; this includes all our prayers, Lord, give us thyself; as that includes all promises, I will be to them a God. The desire of our souls is to thy name.

(3.) We must prefer him in our choice and desire before any other. [1.] There is none in heaven but thee, none to seek to, or trust in, none to court or covet acquaintance with, but thee. God is in himself more glorious than any celestial being, (lxvi. 6.) and must be, in our eyes, infinitely more desirable. Excellent beings there are in heaven, but God only can make them happy. His favour is infinitely more to us than the refreshment of the dews of heaven, or the benign influence of the stars of heaven; more than the friendship of the saints in heaven, or the good offices of the angels there. [2.] I desire none on earth beside thee; not only none in heaven, a place at a distance, which we have but little acquaintance with, but none on earth neither, who have so many friends, and where much of our present interest and concern lies. Earth draws away the desires of most men, and yet I have none on earth, no persons, no things, no possessions, no delights, that I desire beside thee, or with thee, in comparison or competition with thee.

We must desire nothing beside God, but what we desire for him; (Noli proter re, nisi proter re—Nothing be side thee, except for thy sake;) nothing but what we desire from him, and can be content without, so that it be made up in him. We must desire nothing beside God, as needful to be a partner with him in making us happy.

V. This must be our rule in all our ways, and we are to rest ourselves in God with an entire satisfaction, v. 26. Observe here, [1.] Great distress and trouble supposed; My flesh and my heart fail. Note, Others have experienced, and we must expect, the failing both of flesh and heart. The body will fail by sickness, age, and death; and that which touches the bone and the flesh, touches us in a tender part, that part of ourselves which we have been but too fond of; when the flesh fails, the heart is ready to fail too; the conduct, courage, and comfort fail. [2.] So the relief provided in this distress; But God is the Strength of my heart, and my Portion for ever. Note, Gracious souls, in their greatest distresses, rest upon God as their spiritual Strength, and their eternal Portion. First, He is the Strength of my heart: the Rock of my heart, a firm Foundation, which will bear my weight, and not sink under it. God is the Strength of my heart; I have found him, and I do love him; I will not rest satisfied with my God, until I become happy in him. In the distress supposed, he had put the case of a double failure, both flesh and heart fail; but in the relief, he fastens on a single support, he leaves out the flesh and the consideration of that, it is enough that God is the Strength of his heart. He speaks as one careless of the body, (Let that fail, there is no remedy,) but as one concerned about the soul, to be strengthened in the inner man. Secondly, He is my Portion for ever; he will not only support me while I am here, but make me happy when I go hence. The saints choose God for their Portion, they have him for their Portion, and it is their happiness that he will be their Portion; A Portion that will last as long as the immortal soul lasts.

VI. He was fully convinced of the miserable estate of all wicked people. This he learned in the sanctuary, upon this occasion, and he would never forget it; (v. 27.) Lo, they that are far from thee; if we do not apprehend ourselves as in the same state with them, we are not ready for the Almighty to depart from them, shall certainly perish; so shall their doom be; they choose to be far from God, and they shall be far from him for ever; thou shalt justly destroy all them that go a whoring from thee, all apostates, that in profession have been betrothed to God, but forsake him, their duty to him, and their communion with him, to embrace the bosom of a stranger. The doom is severe, no less than perishing, and being destroyed. It is universal; They shall all be destroyed without exception. It is certain; Thou hast destroyed; it is as sure to be done as if done already, and the destruction of some ungodly men is an earnest of the perdition of all. God himself undertakes to do it, into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall; Thus, though infinite in goodness, wilt reckon for thine inured honour and abused patience, and will destroy them that go a whoring from thee.

VI. He was greatly encouraged to cleave to God, and to confide in him, v. 28. If they that are far from God shall perish, then, I. Let this constrain us to live in communion with God; if it fare so ill with those that live at a distance from him, then it is good, very good, the chief good, that good for a man, in this life, which he should most carefully pursue and secure. It is best for me to draw near to God, and to confide in God, and be confided in by him, that the original may take in both. But for my part, I would read it, the approach of God is good for me. Our drawing near to God takes rise from his drawing near to us, and it is the happy meeting that... makes the bliss. Here is a great truth laid down, that it is good to draw near to God; but the life of it lies in the application; “It is good for me.” Those are the wise, who know what is good for themselves; “It is good, says he, (and every good man agrees with him in it,) it is good for me to draw near to God; it is my duty, it is my interest.”

Let us therefore live in a continual dependence upon him; “I have put my trust in the Lord God, and will never go a whoring from him after any creature-confidence.” If wicked men, notwithstanding all their prosperity, shall perish and be destroyed, then let us trust in the Lord God, in him, not in them, (see cxvi. 3-5.) in him, and not in our worldly prosperity; let us trust in God, and neither fret at the evil that may befall them; let us trust in him for a better portion than theirs is. While we do so, let us not doubt but that we shall have occasion to praise his name. Let us trust in the Lord, that we may declare all his works. Note, Those that with an upright heart put their trust in God, shall never want matter for thanksgiving to him.

This psalm does so particularly describe the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, by Nebuchadnezzar and the army of the Chaldeans, and can as well be applied to any other event we meet with in the Jewish history, that interpreters incline to think, either, it was penned by David, or Asaph in David’s time, with a prophetic reference to that sad event. He Kane is not evidently a prophecise; or, that it was penned by another Asaph, who lived at the time of the captivity, or by Jeremiah, (for it is of a piece with his Lamentations,) or some other prophet, and, after the return out of captivity, was the inspired productions of Asaph, who were called by his name, for the public service of the church. That was the most eminent family of the singers in Ezra’s time. See Ezra ii. 41.iii. 10. Neh. xi. 17. 22.-xii. 35. 66. The deplorable case of the people of God, at that time, is here spread before the Lord, and left with him. The prophet, in the name of the church, I. Puts in complaining pleas of the miseries they suffered, for the quickening of their desires in prayer, v. 1. 11. II. He puts in comfortable pleas for the encouraging of their faith in prayer, v. 12. 17. III. He concludes with divers petitions to God for deliverances, v. 18. 23. In singing it, we must be affected with the former desolations of the church, for we are members of the same body, and may apply it to any present distresses or desolations of any part of the Christian church.

Maschil of Asaph.

1. O GOD, why hast thou cast us off for ever? why dost thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture? 2. Remember thy congregation, which thou hast purchased of old: the rod of thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed; this mount Zion, wherein thou hast dwell. 3. Lift up thy feet unto the perpetual desolations: even all that the enemy hath done wickedly in the sanctuary. 4. Thine enemies roar in the midst of thy congregations; they set up their ensigns for signs. 5. A man was famous according as he had lifted up axes upon the thick trees. 6. But now they break down the carved work thereof at once with axes and hammers. 7. They have cast fire into thy sanctuary; they have defiled by casting down the dwelling-place of thy name to the ground. 8. They said in their hearts, Let us destroy them together: they have burnt up all the synagogues of God in the land. 9. We see not our signs: there is no more any prophet: neither is there among us any that knoweth how long. 10. O God, how long shall the adversary reproach! shall the enemy blaspheme thy name for ever! 11. Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand? pluck it out of thy bosom.

This psalm is entitled Maschil, a psalm...give instruction, for it was penned in a day of affliction, which is intended for instruction; and this instruction, in general, it gives us. That, when we are, upon any account, in distress, it is our wisdom and duty to apply ourselves to God by faithful and fervent prayer, and we shall not find it in vain to do so.

I. The displeasure of God against them, as that which was the cause and bitterness of all their calamities. They look above the instruments of their trouble, who, they knew, could have no power against them, unless it were given them from above, and keep their eye upon God, by whose determined counsel they were delivered up into the hands of wicked and unreasonable men. Observe the liberty they take to expostulate with God; (v. 1.) we hope, not too great a liberty, for Christ himself, upon the cross, cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? So the church here, O God, why hast thou forsaken us for ever? Here they speak according to their present dark and melancholy apprehensions; for otherwise, Has God cast away his people? God forbid, Rom. xi. 1. The people of God must not think that because they are cast off, they are therefore cast off; that because men cast them off, therefore God does; and that because he seems to cast them off for a time, therefore they are really cast off for ever: yet this expostulation intimates, that they dreaded God’s casting them off more than any thing, that they desired to be owned of him, whatever they suffered from men, and were desirous to know wherefore he thus contended with them; Why doth thine anger smoke? Why does it burn in thee, and burneth as a fire, so that it cannot be put out? Why doth it set in the body of thy members? Why doth thy anger smoke, or burn in thee, and not be put out? We ask this, and all about us take notice of it, and ask, What means the heat of this great anger? Deut. xxxix. 24. Compare v. 20. where the anger of the Lord and his jealousy are said to smoke against sinners.

Observe what they plead with God, now that they lay under the tokens and apprehensions of his wrath.

1. They plead their relation to him; “We are the sheep of thy pasture, the sheep wherewith thou hast been pleased to stock thy pasture, thy peculiar people, whom thou art pleased to set apart for thyself, and design for thine own glory. That the wolves worry the sheep is not strange; but was ever any shepherd thus displeased at his own sheep? Remember, we are thy congregation, (v. 2.) incorporated by thee and for thee, and devoted to thy praise; we are the rod, or tribe, of thine inheritance, whom thou hast been pleased to claim thine especial property in, above other people, (Deut. xxxix. 9.) and from whom thou hast received the rents and issues of praise and worship, more than from the neighbouring nations. Nay, a man’s inheritance may lie at a great distance, but we are pleading for mount Zion, wherein thou hast dwelt, which has been the place of thy peculiar delight and residence, thy demesne and mansion.”

2. They plead the great things God had done for them, and the greatest expense he had been at upon them; “It is thy congregation, which thou hast not only made with a word’s speaking, but purchased of old by many miracles of mercy, when they were first formed into a people; it is thine inheritance, which then hast redeemed when they were sold into servitude;" God gave Egypt to run for their ransom, gave men for them, and people for their life. Isa. xliii. 3, 4. "Now, Lord, wilt thou now abandon a people that cost thee so dear, and has been so dear to thee?" And if the redemption of Israel out of Egypt was an encouragement to hope that he would not cast them off, much more reason have we to hope that God will not cast off any whom Christ has redeemed with his own blood: but the people of his purchase shall be for ever the people of his praise.

3. They plead the calamitous state that they were in; (v. 3.) "Lift up thy feet; come with speed to repair the desolations that are made in thy sanctuary, which otherwise will be perpetual and irreparable." It has been sometimes said, that the divine vengeance strikes with iron hands, yet it comes with leaden feet; and then those who wait for the day of the Lord, thy, Lord, sit up thy feet. magnify thyself in the outgoings of thy providence. When the desolations of the sanctuary have continued long, we are tempted to think they will be perpetual; but it is a temptation; for God will avenge his own elect, will avenge them speedily, though he bear long with their oppressors and persecutors.

11. They complain of the outrage and cruelty of their enemies; not so much, no not at all, of what they had done to the prejudice of their secular interests; there are no complaints of the burning of their cities and ravaging of their country, but only what they had done against the sanctuary and the synagogue. The concerns of religion should lie nearer our hearts, and affect us more, than any worldly concern whatsoever. The desolation of God's house should grieve us more than the desolation of our houses; for the matter is not great what becomes of us and our families in this world, provided God's name may be sanctified, his kingdom may come, and his will be done.

1. He complains of the desolations of the sanctuary, as Daniel, ch. ix. 17. The temple at Jerusalem was the dwelling-place of God's name, and therefore the sanctuary, or holy place, v. 7. In this, the enemies did wickedly, (v. 3.) for they destroyed it in downright contempt of God and affront to the whole body of God's elect and congregations; there where God's faithful people attend on him with an humble, reverent, silence, or softly speaking, they roared in a riotous, revelling manner, being elated with having made themselves masters of that sanctuary, of which they had sometimes heard formidable things. (2.) They set up their ensigns for signs, the banners of their army they set up in the temple, (Israel's strongest castle, as 'long as they kept close to God,) as trophies of their victory. There where the signs of God's presence used to be, now the enemy had set up their ensigns. This daring defiance of God and his power touched his people in a tender part. (3.) They took a pride in destroying the carved work of the temple. As much as, formerly, men thought it an honour to lend an hand to the building of the temple, and he was thought famous who helped to fell the timber that was then going on, now what have the nations themselves upon their agency in destroying it, v. 5. Thus, as formerly those were celebrated for wise men that did service to religion, so now they are cried up for wits that help to run it down. Some read it thus, They show themselves, as one that lifts up axes on high in a thicket of trees, for so do they break down the carved work of the temple; they make no more scruple of breaking down the rich wainscoat of the temple, than woodcutters do of hewing trees in the forest, such indignation have they at the sanctuary, that the most curious carving that ever was seen is beaten down by the common soldiers, without any regard had to it, either as a dedicated thing, or as a piece of exquisite art. (4.) They set fire to it, and so violated or destroyed it to the ground, v. 7. The Chaldeans burnt the house of God, that stately, costly, fabric, 2 Chron. xxxix. 19. And the Romans left not there one stone upon another (Matt. xxiv. 2.) razing it, razing it even to the foundations, till Zion, the holy mountain, was, by Titus Vespasian, ploughed as a field.

II. The branches of the desolations of the synagogues, or schools of the prophets, which, before the captivity, were in use, though much more after. There God's word was read and expounded, and his name praised and called upon, without altars or sacrifices. These also they had a spite to; (v. 8.) Let us destroy them together; not only the temple, but all the places of religious worship, and the worshippers with them; let us destroy them together, let them be consumed in the same flame. Pursue to this impious resolve, they burst up all the synagogues of God in the land, and laid them all waste. So great was their rage against religion, that the religious houses, because religions, were all levelled with the ground, that God's worshippers might not glorify God, and edify one another, by meeting in solemn assemblies.

III. The great aggravation of all these calamities, was, that they had no prospect at all of relief, nor could they foresee an end of them; (v. 9.) "We see our enemy's sign set up in the sanctuary, but we see not our signs, none of the tokens of God's presence, no hopeful indications of approaching deliverance; there is no more any prophet to tell us how long the trouble will last, and when things concerning us shall have an end; that the hope of an issue, at last, may support us under our troubles." In the captivity in Babylon, they had prophets, and had been told how long the captivity should continue, but the day was cloudy and dark, (Ezek. xxxiv. 12.) and they had not as yet the comfort of these gracious discoveries; God spake once, yea, twice, good words and comfortable words, but they perceived them not. Observe, They do not complain, "We see not our armies, there are no men of war to command our forces, nor any to go forth with our hosts;" but, "no prophets, none to tell us how long."

This is the state upon expostulating with God, as delaying, 1. To assert his honour, (v. 10.) How long shall the adversary reproach, and blaspheme thy name? In the desolations of the sanctuary, our chief concern should be for the glory of God, that that may not be injured by the blasphemies of those who persecute his people for his sake, because they are his; and therefore our inquiry should be, not "How long shall we be troubled," but "How long shall God be blasphemed." (2.) To exert his power; (v. 11.) Why withdrawest thou thy hand, and dost not stretch it out, to deliver thy people, and destroy thine enemies? Pluck it out of thy bosom, and be not as a man astonished, as a man that cannot save, or will not," Jer. xiv. 9. When the power of enemies is most threatening, it is most comfortable to fly to the power of God.

12. For God is my King of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth. 13. Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength; thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters. 14. Thou brakest the heads of Leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness. 15. Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood; thou driedst up mighty rivers
16. The day is thine, the night also is thine: thou hast prepared the light and the sun.

17. Thou hast set all the borders of the earth: thou hast made summer and winter.

The lamenting church fastens upon something here, which she calls to mind, and therefore hath she hope, (as Lam. iii. 21.) with which she encourages herself, and silences her own complaints.

Two things quiet the minds of those that are here assembled for God.

I. That God is the God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people; (v. 12.) God is my King of old. This comes in both as a plea in prayer to God, (xlv. 4. Thou art my King; O God,) and as a prop to their own faith and hope, to encourage them selves to expect deliverance, considering the days of old, lxxxvii. 5. The church speaks as a complex body, the same in every age, and therefore calls God, "My King, my King of old." or, "from everlasting." He of old put himself into that relation to them, and appeared and acted for them in that relation; as Israel's King, he wrought salvation in the midst of the nations of the earth; for what he did, in the government of the world, tended toward the salvation of his church.

Several things are here mentioned, which God had done for his people, as their King of old, which encouraged them to commit themselves to him, and depend upon him. 1. He had divided the sea before them, when they came out of Egypt, not by the strength of Moses or his rod, but by his own strength; and he that could do that could do any thing. 2. He had destroyed Pharaoh and the Egyptians; Pharaoh was the leviathan, the Egyptians were the dragons, fierce and cruel. Observe, (1.) The victory obtained over these enemies; God brake their heads, baffled their plots; as when Israel, the more they were afflicted by them, multiplied the more; God crushed their powers, though complicated, ruined their country by ten plagues, and, at last, drowned them all in the Red sea; This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, Ezek. xxxi. 18. It was the Lord's doing, none besides could do it, and he did it with a strong hand and outstretched arm. This was typical of Christ's victory over Satan and his kingdom, pursuant to the first promise, that the Seed of the woman should break the serpent's head. (Gen. iii. 15.) The improvement of this victory was for the encouragement of the church; Thou gavest him to be meat to the people of Israel, now going to inhabit the wilderness. The spoil of the Egyptians enriched them; they stripped their sin, and so got the Egyptians' arms and weapons, as before they had got their jewels. Or rather, this providence was meat to their faith and hope, to support and encourage them in reference to the other difficulties they were likely to meet with in the wilderness. (2.) God was part of the spiritual meat which they were all made to eat of. Note, The breaking of the heads of the church's enemies, is the joy and strength of the hearts of the church's friends. Thus the companions make a banquet even of leviathan, Job xli. 6. (3.) God had both ways altered the course of nature, both in fetching streams out of the rock, and turning streams into rock, v. 15. [1.] He had dissolved the rock into water, and made, in Leviathan, the sea, wherein the sun and the moon; (so some read it;) and every one knows whence it was brought, out of the rock, out of the flinty rock. Let this never be forgotten, but let it especially be remembered, that the Rock was Christ, and the waters out of it his spiritual drink. [2.] He had concealed the waters into rock: Thou driedst up mighty, rapid, rivers, Jordan particularly, at the time when it overflowed all its banks. He that did these things could now deliver his oppressed people, and break the yoke of the oppressors, as he had done formerly; nay, he would do it, for his justice and goodness, his wisdom and truth, are still the same, as well as his power.

II. That the God of Israel is the God of nature, v. 16. 17. It is he that orders the regular successions and revolutions, 1. Of day and night; he is the Lord of all time; the evening and the morning are of his ordaining; it is he that opens the eyelids of the morning light, and draws the curtains of the evening shadow. He has prepared the moon and the sun; (so some read it;) the two great lights, to rule by day and night alternately. The preparing of them denotes their constant readiness, and exact observance of their time, which they never miss a moment. 2. Of summer and winter; "Thou hast appointed all the bounds of the earth, and the different climates of its several regions, for thou hast made summer and winter, the frigid and the torrid zones; neither, the constant warmth, nor the annual coolness; nor the several seasons." Herein we are to acknowledge God, from whom all the laws and powers of nature are derived; but how does this come in here? (1.) He that had power at first to settle, and still to preserve, this course of nature, by the diurnal and annual motions of the heavenly bodies, has certainly all power both to save and to destroy, and with him nothing is impossible, nor any difficulties or oppositions insuperable. (2.) He that is faithful to his covenant with the day and, with the night, and preserves the ordinances of heaven inviolable, will certainly make good his promise to his people, and never cast off those whom he has chosen, Jer. xxxi. 35. 36. —xxxii. 20. 21. His covenant with Abraham and his seed is as firm as that with Noah and his sons, Gen. viii. 21. (3.) Day and night, summer and winter, being counterchanged in the course of nature, throughout all the borders of the earth, we can expect no other than that peace and peace, prosperity and adversity, should be, in like manner, counterchanged in all the borders of the church. We have, as much reason to expect affliction as to expect night and winter. But we have then no more reason to despair of the return of comfort, than we have to despair of day and summer.

18. Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached, O Lord; and that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name. 19. O deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove unto the multitude of the wicked: forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever. 20. Have respect unto the covenant: for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. 21. O let not the oppressed return ashamed: let the poor and needy praise thy name. 22. Arise, O God, plead thine own cause: remember how the foolish man reproacheth thee daily. 23. Forget not the voice of thine enemies: the tumult of those that rise up against thee increaseth continually.

The psalmist here, in the name of the church, most earnestly begs that God would appear for them against their enemies, and put an end to their present troubles; to encourage his own faith, he in terests God in this matter; (v. 22.) Arise, O God, plead thine own cause. This we may be sure he will do, for he is jealous for his own honour; whatever is his own cause, he will plead it with a strong hand, will appear against those that oppose it, and with and for those that cordially espouse it. He will arise and plead it, though for a time he seems to neglect it; he will stir up himself, will manifest himself, will do his own work in his own time. Note, The cause of religion is God's own cause, and he will certainly plead it.

Nor to make it out that the cause is God's, he pleads,

I. That the persecutors are God's sworn enemies; "Lord, they have not only abused us, but they have been, and are, abusive to thee; what is done against us, for thy sake, does, by consequence, reflect upon thee. But that is not all, they have directly and immediately reproached thee, and blasphemed thy name;" v. 18. This is what they really did, as they triumphed as if they had now got the mastery of the God of Israel, of whom they had heard such great things. As nothing grieves the saints more, than to hear God's name blasphemed, so nothing encourages them more to hope that God will appear against their enemies, than when they are arrived at such a pitch of wickedness as to reproach God himself; this fills the measure of their sins space, and hastens their ruin. The psalmist insists much upon this. We dare not answer their reproaches, Lord, do thou answer them. Remember that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name, (v. 18.) and that still the foolish man reproaches thee daily. Observe the character of those that reproach God; they are foolish. As atheism is folly, (xiv. 1.) profaneness and blasphemy are no less so. Perhaps they are cried up for the wits of the age, that ridicule religion and sacred things; but really they are the greatest fools, and will shortly be made to appear so before all the world. And yet see their malice; They reproach God daily, as constantly as his faithful worshippers pray to him and praise him; see their impudence; They do not hide their blasphemous thoughts in their own bosoms, but proclaim them with a loud voice; (Forget not the voice of thine enemies, v. 23.) and this, with a daring defiance of divine justice; They rise up against thee, and by their blasphemies even wage war with heaven, and take up arms against the Almighty. Their noise and tumult ascend continually, (so some,) as the cry of Sodom came up before God, calling for vengeance, Gen. xviii. 21. It increases continually; (so we read it;) they grow worse and worse, and are hardened in their impieties by their successes. Now, Lord, remember this, do not forget it. God needs not to be put in remembrance by us of what he has to do for us, but thus we must show our concern for his honour, and believe that he will vindicate us.

II. That the persecuted are his covenant-people.

1. See what distress they are in; they are fallen into the hands of the multitude of the wicked, v. 19. How are they increased that trouble them! There is no standing before an enraged multitude, especially like these, armed with power; and as they are numerous, so are they barbarous, and hence the expression, they are full of the habitations of cruelty. The land of the Chaldeans, where there was none of the light of the knowledge of the true God, (though otherwise it was famed for learning and arts,) was indeed a dark place; the inhabitants of it were alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that was in them; and therefore they were cruel; where there was no true divinity, there was scarcely to be found common humanitv; they were especially cruel to the remnant of God, because of their having much knowledge, who eat them up, xiv. 4. They are oppressed, (v. 21.) because they are poor and unable to right themselves; they are oppressed, and so made poor.

2. See what reason they had to hope that God would appear for their relief, and not suffer them to be always thus trampered upon. Observe how the psalmist pleads with God for them; (1.) "It is thy turtle-dove that is ready to be swallowed up by the multitude of the wicked," v. 19. The church is a dove, for harmlessness and mildness, innocency and inoffensiveness, purity and fruitfulness; a dove, for mourningfulness in a day of distress; a turtle-dove for fidelity, and the constancy of it. Less turtle-doves and pigeons were the only fowls that were offered in sacrifice to God. "Shall thy turtle-dove, that is true to thee, and devoted to thine honour, be delivered, its life and soul and all, into the hand of the multitude of the wicked, to whom it will soon become an easy and acceptable prey? Lord, it will be thine honour to help the weak, especially to the humble thing, to their sorrow and distress, and the congregation of thy poor, and they are not the less thin for their being poor; (for God has chosen the poor of this world, Jam. ii. 5.) but they have the more reason to expect thou wilt appear for them, because they are many, it is the congregation of thy poor; let them not be abandoned and forgotten for ever." (3.) "They are in covenant with thee; and wilt thou not have respect unto the covenant? v. 20. wilt thou not perform the promises thou hast, in thy covenant, to thee? Wilt thou not own them whom thou hast brought into the bond of the covenant?" When God delivers his people, it is in remembrance of his covenant, Lev. xxvi. 42. "Lord, though we are unworthy to be respected, yet have respect to the covenant." (4.) "They trust in thee, and boast of their relation to thee, and expectations from thee; O let them not return ashamed of their hope, (v. 21.) as they will be, if thou be delivered to the power of their enemies." If thou deliver them, they will praise thy name, and give the glory of their deliverance. Appear, Lord, for those that will praise thy name, against those that blaspheme it.

PSALM LXXV.

Though this psalm is attributed to Asaph, in the title, yet it does so exactly agree with David's circumstances, at his coming to the crown after the death of Saul, that most interpreters apply it to that juncture, and suppose that either Asaph penned it, in the person of David, as his poet-laureat; (probably, the substance of the psalm was some speech which David made to a convention of the states, at his accession to the government, and Asaph turned it into verse, and published it in a poem, for the better spread abroad its message among the people,) or that David penned it, and delivered it to Asaph as a preconer of the temple. In this psalm, I. David returns God thanks for bringing him to the throne, v. 1, 2. II. He promises to lay out himself for the public good, in the service of God, which power God had given him, v. 2, 3, 10. III. He checks the insolence of those that opposed his coming to the throne, v. 4, 5. IV. He fetches a reason for all this from God's sovereign dominion in the affairs of the children of men, v. 6-8. In singing this psalm, we must give to God the glory of all the revolutions of states and kingdoms, believing that they are all according to his counsel, and that he will make them all to work for the good of his church.

To the chief musician, Al-taschith. A psalm or song of Asaph.

1. UNTO thee, O God, do we give thanks, unto thee do we give thanks for that thy name is near, thy wondrous works declare. 2. When I shall receive the congregation, I will judge uprightly. 3. The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved: I bear up the pillars of it. Selah. 4. I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly; and to the wicked, Lift not up the horn: 5. Lift not up your horn on high: speak not with a stiff neck.
In these verses,
I. The psalmist gives to God the praise of his advancement to honour and power, and the other great things he had done for him and for his people Israel; (v. 1.) Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks, for all the favours thou hast bestowed upon us; and again, unto thee do we give thanks; for our thanksgivings must be often repeated. Did not Moses see the pillar of cloud and fire as an everlasting proof of it; and shall we think it will suffice once or twice to give thanks, when we have obtained it? Not only I do give thanks, but we do; and I and all my friends. If we share with others in their mercies, we must join with them in their praises; "Unto thee, O God, the Author of our mercies; and we will not give that glory to the instruments which is due to thee only. For that thy name is near, that the complete accomplishment of thy promise made to David is not far off, thy wondrous works, which thou hast already done for him, declare." Note. 1. There are many works which God does for his people, that may truly be called wondrous works, out of the common course of providence, and quite beyond our expectation. 2. These wondrous works declare the nearness of his name; they show that he himself is at hand, nigh to us in what we call upon him for, and that his help is nigh unto those that are afraid. 3. This is the ground of our expectation in pursuance of his purpose and promise. 3. When God's wondrous works declare the nearness of his name, it is our duty to give him thanks, again and again to give him thanks.

II. He lays himself under an obligation to use his power well, pursuant to the great trust reposed in him; (v. 2.) When I shall receive the congregation, I will judge uprightly. Here he takes it for granted, that God would, in due time, perfect that which concerned him, that though the congregation was very slow in gathering to him, and great opposition was made to it, yet, at length, he should receive it: for what God has spoken in his holiness, he will perform by his wisdom and power. Being thus in expectation of the mercy, he promises to make conscience of his duty; "When I am a judge, I will judge, and judge uprightly; not as those that went before me, who either neglected judgment, or, which was worse, sold the cause, and would not do the right, the just, the God-determined, and power, or did hurt." Note. 1. Those that are advanced to posts of honour, must remember they are posts of service, and must set themselves with diligence and application of mind to do the work to which they are called. He does not say, "When I shall receive the congregation, I will take my ease, and take state upon me, and leave the public business to others;" but, "I will mind it myself." 2. Public trusts are to be managed with great integrity; they that judge, must judge uprightly, according to the rules of justice, without respect of persons.

III. He promises himself that his government would be a public blessing to Israel, v. 3. The present state of the kingdom was very bad; "The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved; and no marvel, when the former reign was so dissolutive, that all went to rack and ruin. There was a general corruption of manners, for want of putting the laws in execution against vice and profaneness. They were divided one from another, for want of centering, as they ought to do, in the government God had appointed. They were all to pieces, two against three, and three against two, crumbled into factions and parties, which was likely to issue in ruin; but I bear up the pillars of it. Even in Saul's time, he said what he could for the public welfare; but he hoped, that, when he had himself received the congregation, he should do much more, and should not only prevent the public ruin, but recover the public strength and beauty. Now, 1. See the chief of parties; they melt and dissolve a land and the inhabitants of it. 2. See how much one head frequently holds up. The fabric had sunk, if David had not held up the pillars of it. This may well be applied to Christ and his government. The world and all the inhabitants of it were dissolved by sin, man's apostasy threatening the destruction of the whole creation; but Christ bore up the pillars of it, however a whole world flocked against him, saving his people from their sins, and into his hand the administration of the kingdom of Providence is committed, for he upholds all things by the word of his power, Heb. i. 3.

IV. He checks those that opposed his government, that were against his accession to it, and obstructed the administration of it, striving to keep up that vice and profaneness which he had made it his business to suppress; (v. 4, 5.) I said unto the fools, Dealt not foolishly. He had said so to them in Saul's time, when he had not power to restrain them, yet he had wisdom and grace to reprove them, and to give them good counsel; though they bore themselves high, upon the favour of that unhappy prince, he cautioned them not to be too presumptuous. Or rather, he does now say so to them. As soon as he came to the crown, he issued out a proclamation against all foreign kingdoms, and here we have the contents of it. 1. To the simple speaking sinners, the fools in Israel, that corrupted themselves, to them he said, "Dealt not foolishly; do not act so directly contrary both to your reason and to your interest as you do, while you walk contrary to the laws God has given Israel, and the promises he has made to David." Christ, the Son of David, gives us this counsel, issues out this edict, Dealt not foolishly. He who is made of God to us Wisdom, bids us be wise for ourselves, and not make fools of ourselves. 2. To the proud daring sinners, the wicked, that set God himself at defiance, he says, "Lift not up the horn; boast not of your power and prerogatives, persist not in your contempt and contempt of the government set over you; lift not up your horn on high, as though you could have what you will, and do what you will; speak not with a stiff neck, in which is an iron sinew, that will not be broken by the power of reasoning, nor by commands from heaven, but for they that will not bend, shall break; they whose necks are stiffened, are so to their own destruction." This is Christ's word of command in his gospel, that every mountain will be brought low before him, Isa. xl. 4. Let not the anticristian power, with its heads and horns, lift up itself against him, for it shall certainly be broken to pieces; what is said with a stiff neck, must be said again with a broken heart, or we are undone. Pharaoh said with a stiff neck, Who is the Lord? But God made him know, to his cost.

6. For promotion cometh neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south: 7. But God is the judge; he putteth down one, and setteth up another. 8. For in the hand of the Lord there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture, and he poureth out of the same: but the dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them. 9. But I will declare for ever; I will sing praises to the God of Jacob. 10. All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted.

In these verses, we have two great doctrines laid down, and two good inferences drawn from.
them, for the confirmation of what he had before said.

1. Here are two great truths laid down concerning God's government of the world, which we ought to mix faith with, both pertinent to the occasion.

1. That from God alone kings receive their power, (v. 6, 7,) and therefore to God alone David would give the praise of his advancement; having his power from God, he would use it for him, and therefore they were fools that lifted up the horn against him. They were set up in the states and kingdoms, and are surprised at the sudden disgrace of some, and elevation of others; we are all full of such changes, when they happen; but here we are directed to look at the Author of them, and are here taught where the original of power is, and whence promotion comes. Whence comes promotion in kingdoms, to the sovereignty of them? And whence comes preferment in kingdoms, to places of power? The idea of promotion and advancement, not upon the will of the people, nor the latter on the will of the prince, but both on the will of God, who has all hearts in his hands; to him therefore those must look who are in pursuit of preferment, and then they begin right. We are here told, (1.) Negatively; which way we are not to look for the fountain of power: Promotion comes neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south, nor from the north. (2.) Positively; it is from God, and therefore they that are raised not upon the will of men, nor the latter on the will of the prince, but both on the will of God, who has all hearts in his hands; to him therefore those must look who are in pursuit of preferment, and then they begin right. We are here told, (1.) Negatively; which way we are not to look for the fountain of power: Promotion comes neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south, nor from the north. (2.) Positively; it is from God, and therefore they that are raised not upon the will of men, nor the latter on the will of the prince, but both on the will of God, who has all hearts in his hands; to him therefore those must look who are in pursuit of preferment, and then they begin right.

2. That from God alone must all receive their doom; (v. 8.) In the hand of the Lord there is a cup, which he puts into the hands of the children of men, a cup of providence, mixed up (as he thinks fit) of many ingredients; a cup of affliction; the sufferings of Christ are called a cup, Matt. xxv. 30. John xvi. 11. The gods of God's people are the cup of the Lord's right hand, Hab. ii. 16. The wine is red, denoting the wrath of God, which is infused into the judgments executed on sinners, and is the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery. It is red as fire, red as blood, for it burns, it kills. It is full of mixture, prepared in wisdom, so as to answer the end: there are mixtures of mercy and grace in the cup of affliction, when it is put into the hands of God's own people; mixtures of the curse, when it is put into the hands of the wicked; it is wine mingled with gall. These 1. xvi. 1. Where we read of the angels pouring out the vials of God's wrath upon the earth. Some drops of this wrath may light on good people; when God's judgments are abroad, they have their share in common calamities; but, (2.) The dregs of the cup are reserved for the wicked. The calamity itself is but the vehicle into which the wrath and curse is infused, the top of which has little of the bitter wine; but, when that is gone down, and then shall fall to the share of sinners; they have the dregs of the cup now, in the terrors of conscience, and hereafter, in the torments of hell. They shall wring them out, that not a drop of the wrath may be left behind, and they shall drink them, for the curse shall enter into their bowels like water, and like oil into their bones. The cup of the Lord's indignation will be to them a cup of trembling, everlasting trembling, Rev. x. 10. The more the heathens dip in the world, is full of mixture, but the worst is at the bottom. The wicked are reserved unto the day of judgment.

2. Here are two good practical inferences drawn from these great truths, and they are the same purposes of duty that he began the psalm with. This being so, 1. He will praise God, and give him glory, for the power to which he had advanced him; (v. 9.) I will give praise for every good and precious work which he does, v. i. He will praise God for his elevation, not only at first, while the mercy was fresh, but for ever, so long as he lives; the exaltation of the Son of David will be the subject of the saints' everlasting praises. He will give God, not only as his God, but as the God of Jacob; knowing it was for Jacob his servant's sake, and because he loved his people Israel, that he made him king over them. (2.) A host will be prepared, the great ends for which it was put into his hands, (v. 10.) as before, v. 4. According to the duty of the higher powers, (1.) He resolves to be a terror to evildoers, to humble their pride, and break their power; "Though not all the heads, yet all the horns of the wicked will I cut off, with which they push their poor neighbours; I will disable them to do mischief." Thus God promises to raise up carpenters which should fray the horns of the Gentiles that had scattered Judah and Israel, Zech. i. 18.-21. (2.) He resolves to be a Protection and Praise to them that do well; The horns of the righteous shall be exalted; they shall be preferred and put into places of power; and they that are good, and have hearts to do good, shall not want ability and opportunity for it. This agrees with David's resolutions, cf. 3, &c. Herein David was a type of Christ, who with the breath of his mouth shall slay the wicked, and shall exalt the horn of the righteous, cxii. 9.

PSALM LXXXVI.

This psalm seems to have been penned upon occasion of some great victory obtained by the church over some threatening enemy or other, and designed to grace the triumph. 1. xvi. 11. The fallen ones were, it is supposed, when many good interpreters conjecture, that it was penned when Sennacherib's army, then besieging Jerusalem, was entirely cut off by a destroying angel in Hezekiah's time; and several passages in the psalm are very applicable to that work of wonder; but there was a
To the chief musician on Neginoth. A psalm or song of Asaph.

1. In Judah is God known; his name is great in Israel. 2. In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwelling-place in Zion. 3. There brake he the arrows of the bow, the shield, and the sword; Selah. 4. Thou art more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey. 5. The stout-hearted are spoiled, they have slept their sleep; and none of the men of might have found their hands. 6. At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep.

The church is here triumphant, even in the midst of its militant state. The psalmist, in the church’s name, triumphs here in God, the Centre of all our triumphs.

I. In the revelation God had made of himself to them, v. 1. It is the honour and privilege of Judah and Israel, that among them God is known, and whose name is great, and which name he knew, as he pleased to make himself known; and they are happy to whom he discovers himself. Happy people that have their land filled with the knowledge of God; happy persons that have their hearts filled with that knowledge! In Judah God was known, so as he was not known in other nations, which made the favour the greater; inasmuch as it was distinguishing, ex. 19, 20.

II. In the tokens of God’s special presence with them in his ordinances, v. 2. In the whole land of Judah and Israel God was Known, and his name was great; but in Salem, in Zion, were his tabernacle and his dwelling-place; there he kept court, there he received the homage of his people by their sacrifices, and entertained them by the feasts upon the sacrifices; thither they came, to address themselves to him, and thence by his oracles he issued out his orders; there he recorded his name; and of that place he said, Here will I dwell, for I have desired it. It is the glory and happiness of a people to have God among them by his ordinances; but his dwelling-place is a tabernacle, a moveable dwelling; yet a little while is that light with us.

III. In the victories they had obtained over their enemies; (v. 3.) There brake he the arrows of the bow. Observe how threatening the danger was, though Judah and Israel, Salem and Zion, were thus privileged, yet war is raised against them, and the weapons of war are furnished. Here are bow and arrows, shield and sword, and all for battle; but all are broken and rendered useless. And it was done there, 1. In Judah and Israel, in favour of that people near to God. While the weapons of war were used against other nations, they answered their end, but, when turned against that holy nation, they were immediately broken. The Chaldee paraphrases it thus, When the house of Israel did his will, he placed his majesty among them, and there he brake the arrows of the bow; while they kept close to his service, they were great and safe, and every thing went well with them. Or, 2. In the tabernacle and dwelling-place in Zion, there he brake the arrows of the bow; it was done in the field of battle, and yet it is said to be done in the sanctuary, because done in answer to the prayers which God’s people there made to him, and in performance of the promises which he there made to them; of both which, see that instance, 2 Chron. xx. 5, 14. Public successes are owing as much to what is done in the church, as to what is done in the camp.

Now this victory redounded very much. (1.) To the immortal honour of Israel’s God; (v. 4.) Thou art, and hast manifested thyself to be, more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey. [1.] “Than the great and mighty ones of the earth in general, who are high, and think themselves firmly fixed like mountains, but are really mountains of evil, or of no stability at all. It is their glory to destroy; it is thine to deliver.” [2.] “Than our invaders in particular: when they besieged the cities of Judah, they cast up mounts against them, and raised batteries; but thou art able to protect us, than they are to annoy us.” Wherein the enemies of the church deal proudly, it will appear that God is above them.

(2.) To the perpetual disgrace of the enemies of Israel, v. 5. They were stout-hearted, men of great courage and resolution, flushed with their former victories, enraged against Israel, confident of success; they were men of might, robust, and fit for service; they had chariots and horses, which were then greatly valued and trusted to in war, xx. 7. But all this force was of no avail when it was levelled against Jerusalem. [1.] The stout-hearted have despoiled and disarmed themselves; (so some read this verse when it is followed as it should be, v. 7.) They have weakened and destroyed themselves. They have slept, not the sleep of the righteous, who sleep in Jesus, but their sleep, the sleep of sinners, that shall wake to everlasting shame and contempt. [2.] The men of might can no more find their hands, than the stout-hearted can their spirit. As the bold men are cowed, so the strong men are lamed, and cannot so much as find their hands, to save their own heads, much less to hurt their enemies. [3.] The chariots and horses may be truly said to be cast into a dead sleep, when their drivers and their riders were so. God did but speak the word, as the God of Jacob, that commands deliverances for Jacob, and, at his rebuke, the chariot and horse were both cast into a dead sleep; when the men were laid dead upon the spot by the destroying angel, the chariot and horse were not at all formidable. See the power and efficacy of God’s rebukes. With what pleasure may we Christians apply all this to the advantages we enjoy by the Redeemer! It is through him that God is known; it is in him that God’s name is great; to him it is owing that God has a tabernacle and a dwelling-place in his church. He it was that vanquished the strong man armed, spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly.

7. Thou, even thou, art to be feared; and who may stand in thy sight when once thou art angry! 8. Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven; the earth feared, and was still, 9. When God arose to judgment, to save all the meek of the earth. Selah. 10. Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee: the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain. 11. Vow, and pay unto the Lord your God: let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared. 12. He shall cut off the spirit of princes: he is terrible to the kings of the earth.

This glorious victory, with which God had graced and blessed his church, is here made to speak three things.

I. Terror to God's enemies; (v. 7.-9.) "Thou even thou, art to be feared; thy majesty is to be revered, thy sovereignty to be submitted to, and thy justice to be dreaded by those that have offended thee." Let all the world learn by this event to stand in awe of the great God. 1. Let all be afraid of his wrath against the daring impiety of sinners; Who may stand in thy sight, from the minute that thou weekest against him? and be a consuming Fire, how can chaff and stubble stand before him, though his anger be kindled but a little, i. 12. Let all be afraid of his jealousy for oppressed innocency, and the injured cause of his own people; "Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven, then when thou didst arise to save all the meek of the earth; (v. 8, 9.) and then the earth feared, and was still, waiting what would be the issue of those glorious appearances of thine." Note, (1.) God's people are the meek of the earth, (Zeph. ii. 3.) the quiet in the land, (xxxv. 20.) that can bear any wrong, but do none. (2.) Though the meek of the earth are by their meekness exposed to injury, yet God will, sooner or later, appear for their salvation, and plead their cause. (3.) When God comes to save all the meek of the earth, he will cause judgment to be heard from heaven; he will, make the world know that he is angry at the oppressors of his people; and will make some of them, who were once his enemies, as done against himself. The righteous God loneth, keep silence, yet, sooner or later, he will make judgment to be heard. (4.) When God is speaking judgment from heaven, it is time for the earth to compose itself into an awful and reverent silence; The earth feared, and was still, as silence is made by proclamation, when the court sits. Be still, and know that I am God, xlv. 10. Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord, for he is raised up to judgment, Zech. ii. 13. Those that suppose this psalm to have been penned upon the occasion of the routing of Sennacherib's army, take it for granted that the descent of the destroying angel, who did the execution, was accompanied with thunder, by which God caused judgment to be heard from heaven, and that the earth feared, that is, there was an earthquake, but it was soon over. But this is altogether uncertain.

II. Comfort to God's people, v. 10. We live in a very provoking world, we often feel much, and are apt to fear more, from the wrath of man, which seems boundless. But this is a great comfort to us, 1. That, as far as God permits the wrath of man to break forth at any time, he will make it turn to his praise, will bring honour to himself, and serve his own purposes by it; Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee, not only by the checks and given to it, when it shall be forced to confess its own impotency, but even by the liberty given to it for a time. The hardships which God's people suffer by the wrath of their enemies are made to redound to the glory of God and his grace; and the more the heathen rage and plot against the Lord and his Anointed, the more will God be praised for setting his King upon his holy hill of Zion, in spite of them. i. 1, 6. When the heavenly hosts make this the matter of their thanksgiving-songs, that God has taken to him his great power, and has reigned, though the nations were angry, (Rev. xi. 17, 18.) and the voice of man adds lustre to the praises of God. 2. That what will not turn to his praise, shall not be suffered to break out; The remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain. Men must never permit sin, because they cannot check it when they will; but God can. He can set bounds to the wrath of man, as he does to the raging sea; Hitherto it shall come, and no further; here shall its proud waves be stayed. God restrained the remainder of Sennacherib's rage, for he put a hook in his nose, and a bridle in his jaws; (Isa. xxxvii. 29.) and though he permitted him to talk big, he restrained him from doing what he designed.

III. Duty to all, v. 11, 12. Let all submit themselves to this great God, and become his loyal subjects. Observe, 1. The duty required of us all, that are about him, that have any dependence upon him, or any occasion to approach to him; and who is there that is not affected to love, every one of us commanded to do our homage to the King of kings; Vow and pay; take an oath of allegiance to him, and make conscience of keeping it. Vow to be his, and pay what you vow. Bind your souls with a bond to him, (for that is the nature of a vow,) and then live up to the obligations you have laid upon yourselves; for better it is not to vow, than to vow and not to pay. And, having taken him for our King, let us take him for our Lawgiver and our Sovereign, 1 Sam. x. 27. Send ye the lamb to the ruler of the land, Isa. xvi. 1. Not that God needs any present we can bring, or can be benefited by it; but thus we must give him honour, and own that we have our all from him. Our prayers and praises, and especially our hearts, are the presents we should bring to the Lord our God. 2. The reasons to enforce this duty; Render to all their due, fear to whom fear is due; and is it not due to God? Yes; (1.) He ought to be feared; He is the Fear, the word is: his name is glorious and fearful; and he is the proper Object of our fear; with him is terrible majesty. The God of Abraham is called the Fear of Isaac; (Gen. xxxi. 42.) and we are commanded to make him our Fear, Isa. viii. 13. When we bring presents to him, we must have an eye to him as greatly to be feared; for he is terrible in his holy places. (2.) He will be feared, even by them who think it their safety to be feared; (v. 12.) He shall cut off the spirit of princes; he shall slip it off as easily as we slip off a flower from the stalk, or a bunch of grapes from the vine; so the word signifies. He can dispirit those that are most daring, and make them heartless; for he is, or will be, terrible to the kings of the earth; and, sooner or later, if they be not so wise as to submit themselves to him, he will force them to call in; to rocks and mountains to fall on them, and hide them from his wrath, Rev. vi. 16. Since there is no contending with God, it is as much our wisdom as it is our duty to submit to him.

This psalm, according to the method of many other psalms, begins with sorrowful complaints, but ends with comfortable encouragements. The complaints seem to be of personal grievances, but the encouragements relate to the public concerns of the church, so that it is not certain whether it was penned upon a personal or a public account. If they were private troubles that he was my trouble I sought the Lord. Note, Days of trouble must be days of prayer, days of inward trouble especially, when God seems to have withdrawn from us; we must seek him, and seek till we find him. In the day of his trouble, he did not seek for the diversion of business or recreation, to shake off his trouble on any but himself; for, we see, he cast and grace. Those that are under trouble of mind must not think to drink it away, or laugh it away, but must pray it away. My hand was stretched out in the night, and ceased not; so Dr. Hammond reads the following words, as speaking the incessant importunity of his prayers. Compare cxli. 5, 6.

II. His melancholy grief. Grief may then be called melancholy indeed. 1. When it admits of no intermission; such was his; My soul, or wound, ran in the night, and bled inwardly, and it ceased not, no, not in the time appointed for rest and sleep. 2. When it admits of no consolation; and that also was his case; My soul refused to be comforted; he had no mind to hearken to those that would be his comforters. As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs to a heavy heart, Prov. xxxv. 20. Nor had he any mind to think of these things that would be his comforters. He was cut off from them for a long time, and indulged himself in sorrow. Those that are in sorrow, upon any account, do not only prejudice themselves, but affront God, if they refuse to be comforted.

III. His melancholy musings. He pored so much upon the trouble, whatever it was, personal or public, that, 1. The methods that should have relieved him did but increase his grief, v. 3. (1.) One would have thought that the remembrance of God should have comforted him, but it did not; I remembered God, and was troubled, as poor Job; (ch. xxiii. 15.) I am troubled at his presence when I consider, I am afraid of him. When he remembered God, his thoughts fastened only upon his justice, and wrath, and dreadful majesty; and thus God himself became a Terror to him. (2.) One would have thought that pouring out his soul before God should have given him ease, but it did not; he complained, His soul was overwhelmed and drowned in the load. The means of his present relief were denied him, v. 4. He could not enjoy sleep, which, if it be quiet and refreshing, is a parenthesis to our griefs and cares; "Thou holdest mine eyes waking with thy terrors, which make me full of tossings to and fro until the dawning of the day." He could not speak, by reason of the disorder of his thoughts, the tumult of his spirits, and the confusion his mind. In short silence even from good, while his heart was hot within him; he was ready to burst like a new bottle. (Job xlix. 19.) and yet so troubled, that he could not speak and refresh himself. Grief never presys so much upon the spirits as when it is thus smothered and pent up.

IV. His melancholy reflections; (v. 5, 6.) "I have considered the days of old, and compared them with the present days; and our former prosperity does but aggravate the present calamity. "Nay, for we cannot wonder that our fathers told us of." Melancholy people are apt to pore altogether upon the days of old, and the years of ancient times, and to magnify them, for the justifying of their own uneasiness and discontent at the present posture of affairs. But say not thou that the former days were better than these, because it is more than thou knowest whether they were or no. Excl. vii. 10. Neither let the remembrance of the comforts we have lost make us unthankful for those that are left or impatient under our crosses.

Particularly, he called to remembrance his song in the night, the comforts with which he had supported himself in his former sorrows, and entertained himself in his former solitude; these songs he remembered, and tried if he could not sing them over again; but he was out of tune for them, and the remembrance of that pour out his soul in him, xlii. 4. See Job xxx. 10.

V. His melancholy fears and apprehensions: "I communi of mine own heart, v. 6. Come, my soul, what will be the issue of these things? what can I think of them? and what can I expect they will come to at last? I made diligent search into the causes of my trouble, inquiring wherefore God con tended with me, and what would be the end of it. And thus I began to reason, Will the Lord cast off for ever, as he does for the present? He is not now favourable; and will he be favourable no more? His mercy is now gone; and is it clean gone for ever? His promise now fails; and does it fail for evermore? God is not now gracious; but has he forgotten to be gracious? His tender mercies have been withheld, perhaps in wisdom; but are they shut up, shut up in anger?" v. 7.-9. This is the language of a disconsolate deserted soul, walking in darkness, and having no light; a case not uncommon even with those that fear the Lord, and obey the voice of his servant, Isa. i. 10. He may here be looked upon, 1. As groaning under a sore trouble; God hid his face from him, and withdrew the usual tokens of his favour. Note, Spiritual trouble is, of all others, most grievous to a gracious soul; nothing wounds and pierces it like the apprehensions of God's being angry, the suspending of his favour, and the superseding of his promise; this wounds the spirit, and who can bear that? 2. As grappling with a strong temptation. Note, God's own people, in a cloudy and dark day, may be tempted to make desperate conclusions about their own spiritual state, and the condition of God's church and kingdom in the world, and, as to both, to give up all for gone. We may be tempted to think that God has abandoned his desolate, disconsolate servant, has not taken his head, has not taken hold of his hair, has not taken his heart and supersedes of his promise; this wounds the spirit, and who can bear that? 3. As asking such peevish questions, let faith answer them from the scripture; Will the Lord cast off for ever? God forbid, Rem. xi. 1. No, The Lord will not cast off his people, xxiv. 14. Will he be favourable no more? Yes, he will, for though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion: Lxxvi. iii. 32. Is his mercy clean gone for ever? No; his mercy endures for ever; as it is from everlasting, it is to everlasting, cii. 17. DOTH his promise fail for evermore? No; it is impossible for God to lie, Heb. vi. 18. Hath God forgotten to be gracious? No; he cannot deny himself, and his own name, which he hath proclaimed gracious and merciful, Exod. xxxiv. 6. Has he in anger shut up his tender mercies? No; he has mercy on thousands: (Lxxvi. ii. 23.) and therefore, How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? Hos. vi. 8, 9.

Thus was he going on with his dark and dismal apprehensions, when, on a sudden, he first checked himself with that word, Selah; "Stop there, go no further, let us hear no more of these unbelieving surmises;" and he then chid himself; (v. 10.) I said, Truth is hid, until I be brought as a stone, so that it is not well said, and therefore, Why art thou cast down, O my soul? I said, "This is mine affliction" (so some understand it,) "this is the calamity that falls to my lot, and I must make the best of it; every one has his affliction, his trouble in the flesh; and this is mine, the cross I must take." Or rather, "This is my sin, it is mine iniquity, the plague of my own heart." These doubts and fears proceed from the want and weakness of faith, and the corruption of a distempered mind. Note, (1.) We all know that concerning ourselves of which we must say, "This is our infirmity, a sin that most easily besets us." (2.) Despondency of spirit, and distrust of God, under affliction, are too often the infirmities of good people and, as such, are to be reflected upon by us with sorrow and shame, as by the psalmist here; This is my infirmity. When, at any time, it is working in us, we must thus suppress the rising of it, and not suffer the evil spirit to speak. We must argue down the insurrections of unbelief, as the psalmist here; But I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High. He had been considering the years of ancient times, (v. 5.) the blessings formerly enjoyed, the remem brance of which did only add to his grief; but now he considered them as the years of the right hand of the Most High; that those blessings of ancient times came from the Ancient of days, from the power and sovereign disposal of his right hand, who is over all, God blessed for ever; and this satisfied him; for may not the Most High with his right hand make what changes he pleases?

11. I will remember the works of the Lord; surely I will remember thy wonders of old. 12. I will meditate also of all thy work, and talk of thy doings. 13. Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary: who is so great a God as our God! 14. Thou art the God that dost wonders: thou hast declared thy strength among the people. 15. Thou hast with thine arm redeemed thy people, the sons of Jacob and Joseph. Selah. 16. The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee: they were afraid; the depths also were troubled, 17. The clouds poured out water; the skies sent out a sound: thine arrows also went abroad. 18. The voice of thy thunder was in the heaven: the lightnings lightened the world: the earth trembled and shook. 19. Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known. 20. Thou leadest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

The psalmist here recovers himself out of the great distress and plague he was in, and silences his own fears of God's casting off his people, by the remembrance of the great things he had done for them formerly, which, though he had in vain tried to quiet himself with, (v. 5, 6.) yet he tried again, and, upon this second trial, found it not in vain. It is good to remember, that the proverbs are meant for the strengthening of faith, though they do not produce effectual at first; *I will remember, surely I will, what God has done for his people of old, till I can thence infer a happy issue of the present dark dispensations," v. 11, 12. Note, 1. The works of the Lord, for his people, have been wondrous works. 2. They are recorded for us, that they may be remembered by us. 3. That we may have benefit by the remembrance of them, which shall come upon them, and dwell upon them in our thoughts, and must talk of them, that we may inform ourselves, and others, further concerning them. 4. The due remembrance of the works of God will be a powerful antidote against distrust of his promise and goodness; for he is God, and changes not. If he begin, he will finish his work, and bring forth the top-stone.

Two things, in general, satisfied him very much.
I. That God's way is in the sanctuary, v. 13. It is in holiness, so some. When we cannot solve the particular difficulties that may arise in our constructions of the Divine Providence, this we are sure of, in general, That God is holy in all his works, that they are all worthy of himself, and consonant to the eternal purity and rectitude of his nature. He has holy ends in all he does, and will be sanctified in them. This is the great reason why his way is according to his promise, which he has spoken in his holiness, and made known in the sanctuary; what he has done is according to what he has said, and may be interpreted by it; and, from what he has said, we may easily gather that he will not cast off his people for ever. God's way is for the sanctuary, and for the benefit of it. All he does is intended for the good of his church.

II. That God's way is in the sea; though God is holy, just, and good, in all he does, yet we cannot give an account of the reasons of his proceedings, nor make any certain judgment of his designs; His path is in the great waters, and his footsteps are not known, v. 19. God's ways are like the deep waters, which cannot be fathomed; (xxxvi. 6.) like the way of a ship in the sea, which cannot be tracked; Prov. xxx. 18, 19. God's proceedings are always to be acquiesced in, but cannot always be accounted for.

He specifies some particulars, for which he goes as far back as the infancy of the Jewish church, and from which he gathers, 1. That there is no God to be compared with the God of Israel; (v. 13.) Who is so great a God as our God? Let us first give to God the glory of the great things he has done for his people, and acknowledge him therein great above all comparison; and then we may proceed to the dispensation of Himself; he has done, and encourage ourselves with it. 2. That he is a God of almighty power; (v. 14.) Thou art the God that alone dost wonders, above the power of any creature; thou hast, visibly, and beyond any contradiction, declared thy strength among the people.

What God has done for his church, has been a standing declaration of his almighty power, for the church has made bare his everlasting arm.

(1.) God divided the Red sea before them; (v. 16.) The waters gave way, and a lane was made through that crowd instantly, as if they had seen God himself at the head of the armies of Israel, and had retired for fear of him. Not only the surface of the waters, but the depths, were troubled, and opened to the right and to the left, in obedience to his word of command.

(2.) He divided the Red sea before them; (v. 16.) The waters gave way, and a lane was made through that crowd instantly, as if they had seen God himself at the head of the armies of Israel, and had retired for fear of him. Not only the surface of the waters, but the depths, were troubled, and opened to the right and to the left, in obedience to his word of command.

(3.) He destroyed the Egyptians; (v. 15.) The cloud and the fire, which was a pillar of fire, like an umbrella over the camp of Israel, sheltered it from the shower, in which, as in the deluge, the waters that were above the firmament concurred with those that were beneath the firmament to destroy the rebels. Then the skies sent out a sound, thine arrows also went abroad; which is explained, (v. 18.) The voice of thy thunder was heard in the heaven, that is, the sound which the skies sent forth; The lightnings lightened the world; those are the arrows which went abroad, by which the host of the Egyptians was discomfited with so much terror, that the earth of the adjacent coast trembled and shook. Thus God's way was in the sea, for the destruction of Egypt. There was not only renovation for the salvation of his people; and yet, when the waters returned to their place, his footsteps were not known; (v. 19.) there was no mark set upon the place, as there was afterward in Jordan, Josh. iv. 9. We do not read, in the story of Israel's passing through the Red sea, that there were thunder and lightnings, and an earthquake; yet there might be, and Josephus says there were, such displacements of the waters, as God laid open the way, that it may refer to the thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes, that were at mount Sinai; when the law was given.

(4.) He took his people Israel under his own guidance and protection; (v. 20.) Thou leidest thy people like a flock. They being weak and helpless, and apt to wander like a flock of sheep, and lying exposed to the beasts of prey, God went before them with an eye of care and tenderness of a Shepherd, that they might not fail. The pillar of cloud and fire led them, yet that is not here taken notice of, but the agency of Moses and Aaron, by whose hand God led them; they could not do it without God, but God did it with and by them. Moses was their governor, Aaron their high-priest; they were guides, overseers, and rulers, to Israel, and by them God led them. The right and happy administration of the two great ordinances of magistracy and religion, the one of the one, and the other, as it were, a double pillar of cloud and fire, was to Israel in the wilderness.

The psalm concludes abruptly, and does not apply those ancient instances of God's power to the present distresses of the church, as one might have expected. But, as soon as the good man began to meditate on these things, he found he had gained his point; his very entrance upon this matter gave him light, and he saw that it was but a strange miracle, yet as great a mercy, to any people, as the pillar of cloud and fire was to Israel in the wilderness.

PSALM LXXVIII.

This psalm is historical; it is a narrative of the great mercy God shewed unto his people, of the great sins with which they had provoked him; and the many tokens of his displeasure they had been under for their sins. The psalmist began, in the foregoing psalm, to relate God's wonders of old, for his own encouragement in a difficult time; there he broke off abruptly, but here resumes the subject, for the edification of the church, and enlarges much upon it; showing not only how good God had been to them, which was an earnest of further finishing mercy, but how the church, basely, and unmercifully, went on in sin, and provoked him in their sins toward God, which justified him in correcting them as he did at this time, and forbade all complaints. Here is, I. The preface to this church-history, commanding the attention of the present age to it, and recommending it to the study of the generations to come, v. 1-8. II. The history itself from Moses to David; it is put into a psalm or song, that it might be the better remembered, and transmitted to posterity, that it might be a monument of the sins he bore with the people here related, more than they would be with a bare narrative of them. The general scope of this psalm we have, v. 9-11. where notice is taken of the present rebukes they were under, (v. 9.) the sin which they sinned in, and the rebukes, (v. 10.) and the mercies of God to them formerly, which aggravated that sin, v. 11. As to the particulars, we are here told, 1. What wonderful works God had wrought for them in bringing them out of Egypt, (v. 12...16.) providing for them in the wilderness, (v. 23...29.) plaguing and ruining their enemies, (v. 43...53.) and, at length, putting them in possession of the land of promise, v. 54, 55. 2. How ungrateful they were to God for his favours to them; how many and great provocations they were guilty of. How they murmured against God, and distrusted him, (v. 17, 20.) and did but counteract repentance and submission when he punished them, (v. 54, 55.) grieving and tempting him, v. 40, 42. How they affronted God with their idolatries, after they came to Canaan, v. 56, 58. 3. How God had justly punished them for their sins, (v. 21, 22.) in the wilderness where he led them to the sweet-singer of their praises, v. 29, 30, and now, of late, when the ark was taken by the Philistines, v. 39, 64. 4. How graciously God had spared them, and returned in mercy to them, notwithstanding their provocations. He had forgiven them formerly, (v. 58, 59;) and now, of late, had removed the judgments they had brought upon themselves, and brought them under a happy establishment, both in church and state, v. 65, 72. As the general scope of this psalm may be of use to us, in the singing of it, to put us upon recollecting what God has done for us, and for his church formerly, and what we have done against him, so the particulars also may be of use to us, for warning against those sins of unbelief and ingratitude which Israel of old was notoriously guilty of, and the record of which was preserved for our learning. These things happened unto them for examples, 1 Cor. x. 11. Heb. iv. 11.

Maschil of Asaph.

1. GIVE ear, O my people, to my law: incline your ears to the words of my mouth. 2. I will open my mouth in a parable; I will utter dark sayings of old, which our fathers have told us, v. 3. They are the words of the most ancient of our fathers, whom our fathers heard and knew, and are the records of works that he hath done. 5. For he established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers, that they should make them known to their children; 6. That the generation to come might know them, even the children which should be born, who should arise and declare them to their children: 7. That they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God; but keep his commandments: 8. And might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation; a generation that set not their heart aright, and whose spirit was not steadfast with God.

These verses, which contain the preface to this history, show that the psalm answers the title; it is indeed Maschil, a psalm to give instruction; if we receive not the instruction it gives, it is our own fault. Here,

1. The psalmist demands attention to what he wrote; (v. 1.) Give ear, O my people, to my law. Some make these the psalmist's words; David, as a king, or Asaph, in his name, as his secretary of state, and Deut. x. 19, which speaks of all Israel, here calls upon the people, as his people committed to his charge, to give ear to his law. He calls his instructions his law or edict, such was their commanding force in themselves; every good truth, received in the light and love of it, will have the power of the law upon the conscience; yet that was not all, David was a king, and he would interpose his royal power for the edification of his people. If God, by his grace, make great men good men, they will be capable of doing more good than others, be-tribe of Levi and the house of Aaron, so he appointed that parents should train up their children in the knowledge of his law; and when they were grown up, they must arise, and declare them to their children, (v. 6.) that, as one generation of God's servants and worshippers passes away, another generation may arise, and the promises and forms of the earth, may be fulfilled even and thus God's name among men may be as the days of heaven.

(2.) The providences of God concerning them, both in mercy and in judgment. The former seem to be mentioned for the sake of this; since God gave order that his laws should be made known to posterity, it is requisite that with them his works also should be made known, the fulfilling of the promises made to the obedient, and the threatenings denounced against his disobedient. Let these be told to our children and our children's children.

[1.] That they may take encouragement to conform themselves to the will of God, v. 7. That, not forgetting the works of God wrought in former days, they might set their hope in God, and keep his commandments, might make his command their rule, and his covenant their stay; those only may with confidence hope for God's salvation, that make conscience of obeying his commandments. The works of God, duly considered, will very much strengthen our resolution both to set our hope in him, and to keep his commandments, for he is able to bear us out in both.

[2.] That they may take warning not to conform themselves to the example of their fathers; (v. 8.) That they might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation. See here, First, What was the character of their fathers; though they were the seed of Abraham, taken into covenant with God, and, for aught we know, the only professing people he had then in the world, yet they were stubborn and rebellious, and walked contrary to God, in direct opposition to his will; they did indeed profess relation to him, but they did not set their hearts right, they were not cordial in their engagements to God, nor inward with him in their worship of him, and therefore their spirit was not steadfast with him, but upon every occasion they flew off from him. Note, Hypocrisy is the high road to apostasy; those that do not set their hearts right, will not be steadfast with God, but play fast and loose. Secondly, What was a charge to the children; That they be not as their fathers. Note, Those that are descended from wicked and ungodly ancestors, if they will but consider the word and works of God, may see reason enough not to tread in their steps. It will be no excuse for a vain conversation, that it was received by tradition from our fathers; (1 Pet. i. 18.) for what we know of them, that was evil, must be an admonition to us, that we dread that which was so pernicious to them, as we would shun those courses which they took, that were ruining to their health or estates.

9. The children of Ephraim, being armed, and carrying bows, turned back in the day of battle. 10. They kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his law; 11. And forgot his works, and his wonders that he had showed them. 12. Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zaan. 13. He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through; and he made the waters to stand as a heap. 14. In the day-time also he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire. 15. He clave the rocks in the wilderness, and gave them drink as out of the great depths. 16. He brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers. 17. And they sinned yet more against him, by provoking the Most High in the wilderness. 18. And they tempted God in their heart, by asking meat for their lust. 19. Yea, they spake against God: they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness?

Behold, he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed; can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people? Therefore the Lord heard this, and was wroth: so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel. 22. Because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation; 23. Though he had commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven, 24. And had rained down manna upon them to eat, and had given them of the corn of heaven. 25. Man did eat angels' food: he sent them meat to the full. 26. He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven; and by his power he brought in the south wind. 27. He rained flesh also upon them as dust, and feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea; 28. And he let it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitations. 29. So they did eat, and were well filled: for he gave them their own desire; 30. They were not estranged from their lust: but while their meat was yet in their mouths, 31. The wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel. 32. For all this they sinned still, and believed not for his wondrous works. 33. Therefore their days did he consume in vanity, and their years in trouble. 34. When he slew them, then they sought him; and they returned and inquired early after God: 35. And they remembered that God was their Rock, and the high God their Redeemer. 36. Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues: 37. For their heart was not right with him, neither were they stedfast in his covenant. 38. But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath: 39. For he remembered that they were but flesh; a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again.

In these verses,

1. The psalmist observes the late rebukes of Providence that the people of Israel had been under, which they had brought upon themselves by their dealing treacherously with God, v. 9-11. The children of Ephraim, in which tribe Shiloh was, though they were well armed, and shot with bows, yet turned back in the day of battle. This seems to refer to that shameful defeat which the Philistines gave them in Eh's time, when they took the ark prisoner, 1 Sam. iv. 10, 11. Of this the psalmist here begins to speak, and, after a long digression, returns to it again, v. 61. Well might that event be thus fresh in mind, in David's time, above forty years after, for the ark, which in that memorable battle was seized by the Philistines, though it was quickly recovered, did never again come into the temple nor the king's presence, but was carried away out of obscurity, till David fetched it from Kirjath-jearim to his own city. Observe, 1. The shameful cowardice of the children of Ephraim, that warlike tribe, so famed for valiant men, Joshua's tribe; the children of that tribe, though as well armed as ever, turned back, when they came to face the enemy. Note, Weapons of war stand men in little stead without a martial spirit, and that is gone, if God be gone. Sin dispirits man, and saith away the heart. 2. The causes of their cowardice, which were no less shameful; and these were, (1.) A shameful violation of God's law, and their covenant with him; (v. 10.) they were basely treacherous and perfidious, for they kept not the covenant of God, and basely stubborn and rebellious, (as they were described, v. 8.) for they peremptorily refused to walk in his law, and, in effect, told him to his face that they would not heartily seek him. This shameful ingratitude to God for the favours he had bestowed upon them; they forgot his works and his wonders, his works of wonder which they ought to have admired, v. 11. Note, Our forgetfulness of God's works is at the bottom of our disobedience to his laws. II. He takes occasion hence to consult precedents, and to compare this with their fathers' case; who were not unmindful of God's kindnesses to them, and ungrateful to their Founder and great Benefactor, and were therefore often brought under his displeasure. The narrative in these verses is very remarkable, for it relates a kind of struggle between God's goodness and man's badness, and mercy, at length, rejoices against judgment. 1. God did great things for his people Israel, when he first incorporeized them, and formed them into a people, and gave them the land of their fathers, and not only in their sight, but in the sight of their children, and for their benefit; so strange, so kind, that one would think they should never be forgotten. What he did for them in the land of Egypt is barely mentioned here, (v. 12.) but afterward resumed, v. 43. He proceeds here to show, (1.) How he made a lane for them through the Red sea, and caused them, gave them courage, to pass through, though the waters stood over their heads, as a heap, v. 13. See Isa. lxiii. 12, 13. Where God is said to lead them by the hand, as it were, through the deep, that they should not stumble. (2.) How he provided a guide for them through the untried paths of the wilderness; (v. 14.) he led them step by step, in the day-time, by a cloud, which also sheltered them from the heat, and all the night with a light of fire, which perhaps warmed the air, at least, made the darkness of night less frightful, and perhaps kept off wild beasts. Zach. ii. 5. (3.) How he furnished their camp with fresh water, in a dry and thirsty land where no water was; not by opening the bottles of heaven, (that had been a common way,) but by broaching a rock; (v. 15, 16.) He clave the rocks in the wilderness, which yielded water, though they were not capable of receiving it either from the clouds above, or the springs beneath. Out of the dry and hard rock he gave them drink, not distilled as out of an alembic, drop by drop, but in streams running down like rivers, and as out of the great depths. God gives abundantly, and is rich in mercy; he gives seasonably, and sometimes makes us to feel the want of mercies, that we may the better know the worth of them. This water, which God gave Israel out of the rock, was the more valuable, because it was spiritual drink, and that Rock was Christ. 2. When God began thus to bless them, they began to affront him; (v. 17.) They sinned yet more against him, more than they had done in Egypt, though there they were bad enough, Ezek. xx. 8. They bore the miseries of their servitude better than the difficulties of their deliverance. (1.) They dissembled at their task-masters, so as they did at Moses and Aaron; as if they were delivered to do all these abominations, Jer. vii. 10. As sin sometimes takes occasion by the commandment, so at other times it takes occasion by the deliverance, to become more exceeding sinful; They provoked the Most High; though he is Most High, and they knew themselves an unequal match for him, yet they provoked him, and even bid defiance to his justice. And this in their badness, where he had them at his mercy, and therefore they were bound in interest to please him; and where he showed them so much mercy, and therefore they were bound in gratitude to please him; yet there they said and did that which they knew would provoke him; They tempted God in their heart, v. 18. Their sin began in their heart, and thence it took its malignity; They do always err in their heart, Heb. iii. 8. (2.) They also wrought their patience to the utmost, whether he would bow with them or no; and, in effect, bid him do his worst. Two ways they provoked him; (1.) By desiring, or rather demanding, that which he had not thought fit to give them; They asked meat for their lust. God had given them meat for their hunger, in the manna, wholesome pleasant food, and in abundance; he had given them meat for their fathers' sake, and the manna, which he brake in pieces, ixxx. 14. But all this had been in vain, it could not serve; they must have meat for their lust, dainties and varieties to gratify a luxurious appetite. Nothing is more provoking to God than our quarrelling with our allotment, and indulging the desires of the flesh. (2.) By distrusting his power to give them what they desired. This was tempting God indeed! They charged him to give them flesh; and if he did not, they would not go up, v. 23. This was a kind of insolence because he could not see what would not serve; they must have meat for their lust, dainties and varieties to gratify a luxurious appetite. What an unreasonable, insatiable, thing is luxury! Such a mighty thing did these epicures think a table well furnished to be, that they thought it was more than God himself could give them in that wilderness; whereas, the beasts of the forest, and all the fowls of the mountains, are his, I. 10, 11. Their disbelief of God's power was so much the worse, in that they did at the same time own that he had done as much as that came to; (v. 20.) Behold, he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, which they and their cattle drank of. And whether is it easier to furnish a table in the wilderness, which a rich man can do, or to fetch water out of a rock, which the greatest potentate on the earth cannot do? Never did unbelief, though always unreasonable, ask so absurd a question; "Can he that melted down a rock into streams of water, give bread also?" Or, can he, that has given bread, provide flesh also? Is any thing too hard for Omnipotence? When once the ordinary powers of nature are exceeded, God has made bare his arm, and we must conclude nothing is impossible with him. Be it ever so great a thing that we ask, it becomes us to own, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst.

3. God justly resented the provocation, and was much displeased with them; (ver. 21.) The Lord heard this, and was wrath. Note, God is a Witness to all our murmurings and distrusts; he hears them, and threatens vengeance against them. A fire was kindled for this against Jacob, the fire of the Lord burnt among them, Numb. xi. 1. Or, it may be understood of the fire of God's anger which came up against Israel. To unbelievers our God is himself a consuming Fire. Those that will not believe the power of God's mercy, shall feel the power of his indignation, and be made to confess, that it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands. Nowhere are we told,

(1.) Why God thus resented the provocation, ver. 22. Because by this it appeared that they believed not in God, they did not give credit to the revelation he had made of himself to them, for they durst not commit themselves to him, nor venture themselves with him; They trusted not in the salvation he had begun to work for them; for then they would not thus have questioned its progress. Those cannot be said to trust in God's salvation as their felicity at last, who do not trust in his providence for food convenient in the way to it. That which aggravated their unbelief, was, the experience they had of the power and goodness of God, ver. 23-25. He had given them undeniable proofs of his power, not only on earth beneath, but in heaven above; for he commanded the clouds from above, as one that had created them, and commanded them into being; he made what use he pleased of them. Usually, by their showers, they contributed to the earth's producing corn; but now, when God so commanded them, they showered down corn themselves, which is therefore called here the corn of heaven; for heaven can do the work without the earth, but not the earth without heaven. God, who has the key of the clouds, opened the doors of heaven, that is more than opening the windows, which yet is spoken of as a great blessing, Mal. iii. 10. To all that by faith and prayer, ask, seek, and knock, these doors shall not be shut, and the corn will be showered down upon the earth, Ps. ciii. 18. The providence of God for the heaven is rich in mercy to all that call upon him; he not only keeps a good house, but keeps open house. Justly might God take it ill that they should distrust him, when he had been so very kind to them, that he had rained down manna upon them to eat, substantial food, daily, duly, enough for all, enough for each; Man did eat angels' food, such as angels, if they had occasion for food, would eat and be thankful; or rather such as was given by the ministry of angels, and (as the Chalder rends it) such as descended from the dwelling of angels. Every one, even the least child in Israel, did eat bread of the mighty; (so the margin reads it;) the weakest stomach could digest it, and yet it was so nourishing, that it was strong meat for strong men. And though the provision was so good, yet they were not stinted, nor ever reduced to short allowance; for he sent them meat to the full; if they gathered little, it was to the full, over and above; and even then, there was no lack, Exod. xvi. 18. The daily provision God makes for us, and has made ever since we came into the world, though it has not so much of miracle as this, has no less of mercy, and is therefore a great aggravation of our distrust of God.

(2.) How he expressed his resentment of the provocation; not in denying them what they so importunately asked, but in granting it to them. [1.] Did they question his power? He soon gave them a sensible conviction that he could furnish a table in the wilderness. Though the winds seem to blow where they list, yet, when he pleased, he could make them his caterers to fetch in provisions, ver. 26. He caused an east-wind to blow, and a south-wind, either a south-east-wind, or an east-wind, first to bring in the quails from that quarter, and then a south-wind to bring in more from that quarter; so that he rained flesh upon them, and that of the most delicious sort, more than they had ever before known; but they could not abide the abundance of it, as dust, as the sand of the sea, (ver. 27.) so that the meanest Israelite might have sufficient; and it cost them nothing, no, not the pains of fetching it from the mountains, for He let it fill in the midst of their camp, round about their habitation, ver. 28. We have the account, Numb. xi. 31, 32. See how good God is, even to the evil and unthankful, and wonder that his goodness does not overcome their base ingratitude. See what little reason we have to judge of God's love by such gifts of his bounty as these; dainty bits are no tokens of his peculiar favour; Christ gave dry bread to the disciples that he loved, but a sop dipped in the sauce to Judas that betrayed him. [2.] Did they defy his justice, and boast that they had gained their point? He made them pay dear for their quails, for, though he gave them their own desire, they were not estranged from their lusts; (ver. 29, 30,) their appetite was insatiable, they were more than filled, and yet they were not satisfied; for they knew not what it was that they would have. If it were mere lust, it is content with nothing, and the more it is humoured, the more humourous it grows. They that indulge their lust will never be estranged from it. Or it intimates that God's liberality did not make them ashamed of their ungrateful lustings, as it would have done, if they had had any sense of honour. But what came of it? While the meat was yet in their mouth, rolled under the tongue as a sweet morsel, the wrath of God came upon them, and they lusted, (Ezek. xxviii. 18) the fattest of them, (ver. 31) those that were most luxurious, and most daring. See Numb. xi. 33, 34. They were fed as sheep for the slaughter: the butcher takes the fattest first. We may suppose there were some pious and contented Israelites, that did eat moderately of the quails, and were never the worse; for it was not the meat that poisoned them, but their own lust. Let epicures and sensualists here read their doom; the end of those who make a god of their own lust is destruction. Phil. iii. 13. The prosperity of fools shall destroy them, and their ruin will be the greater.

4. The judgments of God upon them did not reform them, nor attain the end, any more than his mercies; (ver. 32.) For all this, they sinned still, they murmured and quarrelled with God and Moses as much as ever. Though God was wrath, and smote them, yet they went on forwardly in the way of their heart; (Isa. lvii. 7,) they believed not for his wonderful works. Though his works of justice were as wondrous, and as great proofs of his power as his works of mercy, yet they were not wrought upon them to wondrous, nor convinced how much it was their interest to make him their Friend. These hearts are hard indeed, that will neither be melted by the mercies of God, nor broken by his judgments.

5. They persisting in their sins, God proceeded in his judgments, but they were judgments of another sort, rather of punishment than of correction. They had been there two days. He punished them, not now with such acute diseases as that which slew the fattest of them, but a lingering chronic distemper; (ver. 33,) Therefore their days did he consume in vanity, in the wilderness, and their years in trouble. By an irreversible doom they were condemned to wear out thirty-eight tedious years in the wilderness, which, indeed, were consumed in vanity; for in all those years there was not a step taken nearer Canaan, but they were turned back again, and wandered to and fro as in a labyrinth, not one stroke straught toward the conquest of which they had not erring, but in trouble, for their carcasses were condemned to fall in the wilderness, and there they all perished, but Caleb and Joshua.
Note, Those that sin still, must expect to be in trouble still. And the reason why we spend our days in so much vanity and trouble, why we live with so little comfort, and to so little purpose, is, because we do not live by faith.

6. Under these rebukes, they professed repentance, but they were not coryndal and sincere in it. (1.) Their profession was plausible enough; (ν. 34, 35.) When he slew them, or condemned them to be slain, then they sought him, they confessed their fault, and begged his pardon. When some were slain, others in a fright cried to God for mercy, and promised they would reform, and be very good; then they returned to God, and inquired early after him. So one would take them to be such as desired to find him. And they pretend thus far, because they had forgotten it formerly, now they remembered that God was their Rock, and therefore, now that they needed him, they would fly to him, and take shelter in him; and now they remembered that the high God was their Redeemer, who brought them out of Egypt, and to whom, therefore, they might come with boldness. Afflictions are sent to put us in mind of God as our Rock and our Redeemer; for, in prosperity, we are apt to forget him. They were not sincere in his professions. (ν. 36, 37.) They did but flatter him with their mouth, as if they thought by fair speeches to prevail with him to revoke the sentence, and remove the judgment, with a secret intention to break their word when the danger was over; they did not return to God with their whole heart, but feignedly, Jer. iii. 10. All their professions, prayers, and promises, were extorted by the rack; it was plain that they did not mean as they said, for they did not adhere to it; they thawed in the sun, but froze in the shade; they did but lie to God with their tongues, for their heart was not with him, nor was right with him, as appeared by the issue, for they were not steadfast in his covenant. They were not sincere in their reformation, for they were not constant; and, by thinking thus to impose upon a heart-searching God, they really put as great an affront upon him as by any of their reflections.

They pitched not to the right of the judgments which were threatened, and in part executed; (ν. 38, 39.) But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity. One would think this counterfeit repentance should have filled up the measure of their iniquity. What could be more provoking than to lie thus to the holy God, than thus to keep back part of the price, the chief part? Acts v. 3. And yet, he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity thus far, that he did not destroy them, and cut them off from being a people, as he justly might have done, but spared their lives till they had reared another generation which should enter into the promised land. Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it, Isa. lxv. 8. Many a time he turned his anger away, for he is Lord of his anger, and did not stir up all his wrath, to deal with them as they deserved. And why did he not? Not because their rage could not have turned any lose; for, if it did not cause he was full of compassion, and, when he was going to destroy them, his repentings were kindled together, and he said, How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? Hos. xi. 8. (2.) Because, though they did not rightly remember that he was their Rock, he remembered that they were but flesh. He considered the corruption of their nature, which inclined them to evil, and was pleased to make that an excuse for his sparing them, though it was really no excuse for their sin. See Gen. vi. 3. He considered the weakness and frailty of their nature, and what an easy thing it would be to crush them; They are as a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again. They may soon be taken off; but, when they are gone, they are gone irrecoverably, and then what will become of the covenant with Abraham? They are flesh, they are wind; whence it was easy to argue, they may justly, they may immediately, be cut off, and there would be no loss of them; but God argueth on the contrary, therefore he will not destroy them; for the true reason is, He is full of compassion.

40. How oft did they provoke him in the wilderness, and grieve him in the desert! 41 Yea, they turned back, and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel. 42. They remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy: 43. How he had wrought his signs in Egypt, and his wonders in the field of Zaan: 44. And had turned their rivers into blood; and their floods, that they could not drink. 45. He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them; and frogs, which destroyed them. 46. He gave also their increase unto the caterpillar, and their labour unto the locust. 47. He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore-trees with frost. 48. He gave up their cattle also to the hail, and their flocks to hot thunderbolts. 49. He cast upon them the fierceness of his anger, wrath, and indignation, and trouble, by sending evil angels among them. 50. He made a way to his anger; he spared not their soul from death, but gave their life over to the pestilence; 51. And smote all the first-born in Egypt; the chief of their strength in the tabernacles of Ham: 52. But made his own people to go forth like sheep, and guided them in the wilderness like a flock. 53. And he led them on safely, so that they feared not: but the sea overwhelmed their enemies. 54. And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain, which his right hand had purchased. 55. He cast out the heathen also before them, and divided them an inheritance by line, and made the tribes of Israel to dwell in their tents. 56. Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God, and kept not his testimonies; 57. But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: they were turned aside like a deceitful bow. 58. For they provoked him to anger with their high places, and moved him to jealousy with their graven images. 59. When God heard this, he was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel: 60. So that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which he placed among men; 61. And delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemy's hand. 62. He gave his people over also unto the sword; and was wroth with his inheritance. 63. The fire consumed their young men; and their maidens were not given to marriage. 64. Their priests fell by the sword; and their widows made no amentation. 65. Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine. 66. And he smote his enemies in the hinder parts; he put them to a perpetual reproach. 67. Moreover, he refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim: 68. But chose the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion, which he loved. 69. And he built his sanctuary like high palaces, like the earth which he hath established for ever. 70. He chose David also his servant, and took him from the sheep-folds: 71. From following the ewes great with young, he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. 72. So he fed them according to the integrity of his heart, and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands.

The matter and scope of this paragraph are the same with the former, showing what great mercies God had bestowed upon Israel, how provoking they had been, what judgments he had brought upon them for their sins, and yet how, in judgment, he remembered mercy at last. Let not those that receive mercy from God be thereby imboldened to sin, for the mercies they receive will aggravate their sin, and hasten the punishment of it; yet let not those that are under divine rebukes for sin be discouraged from repentance, for their punishments are means of repentance, and shall not prevent the mercy God has yet in store for them. Observe,

1. The sins of Israel in the wilderness again reflected on him; they were the unquenchable thirst for enjoyment; (v. 41.) How often did they provoke him in the wilderness? Not once, or twice, but many a time; and the repetition of the provocation was a great aggravation of it, as well as the place; (v. 17.) God kept an account how often they provoked him, though they did not; (Num. xiv. 22.) They have tempted me these ten times. By provoking him they did not so much anger him as grieve him, for he looked upon them as his children, Israel is my son, my first-born; and the unblуд, disrespectful, behaviour of children does more grieve than anger the tender parents; they lay it to heart, and take it unkindly, Isa. i. 2. They grieved him, because they put him under a necessity of afflicting them; which he did not willingly. After they had humbled themselves before him, they turned back and tempted God, as before, and limited the Holy One of Israel, prescribing to him what proofs he should give of his power and presence with them, and what methods he should take in leading them, and providing for them. They limited him to their way, and their time, as if he did not observe that they quarrelled with him. It is presumption for us to limit the Holy One of Israel; for, being the Holy One, he will do what is most for his own glory; and, being the Holy One of Israel, he will do what is most for their good; and we both imitate his wisdom, and betray our own pride and folly, if we go about to prescribe how he shall do with him. This which occasions their limiting God for the future, was, their forgetting of his former favours; (v. 42.) They remembered not his hand, how strong it is, and how it had been stretched out for them, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy, Pharaoh, that great enemy who sought their ruin. There are some days made remarkable by signal deliverances, which might never to be forgotten, for the remembrance of them would encourage us in our greatest straits.

2. The mercies of God to Israel, which they were unmindful of when they tempted God, and limited him; this catalogue of the works of wonder which God wrought for them, begins higher, and is carried down further, than that before, v. 12, &c.

1. This begins with their deliverance out of Egypt, and the plagues with which God compelled the Egyptians to let them go: these were the signs God wrought in Egypt, (v. 43.) the wonders he wrought in the field of Zoan, that is, in the country of Zoan, as we say, in Agro N. meaning in such a place.

Divers of the plagues of Egypt are here specified, which speak aloud the power of God, and his favour to Israel, as well as terror to his and their enemies. As, (1.) The turning of the waters into blood: they had made themselves drunk with the blood of God’s people, even the infant’s, and now God gave them blood to drink, for they were worthy, v. 44. (2.) The flies and frogs which infected them, mixture of insects in swarms, in shoals, which destroyed them; (v. 45.) For God can make the weakest and most despicable animals instruments of his wrath, when he pleases; what they want in strength may be made up in number. (3.) The plague of locusts, which devoured their increase, and that which they had labour’d for, v. 46. They are called God’s great army, Joel ii. 25. (4.) The hail, which destroyed their trees, especially their vines, the weakest of trees, (v. 47.) and their cattle, in work, of their flocks of sheep, the weakest of their cattle, which were killed with hot thunderbolts; (v. 48.) and the frost, or concealed rain, (as the word signifies,) was so violent, that it destroyed even the sycamore trees. (5.) The death of the first-born was the last and sorest of the plagues of Egypt, and that which perfected the deliverance of Israel; it was first in intention, (Exod. iv. 23.) but last in execution; for, if it had been prevented; but it is here largely described, v. 49-51. [1.] The anger of God was the cause of it; wrath was now come upon the Egyptians to the uttermost; Pharaoh’s heart having been often harden’d after lesser judgments had softened it, God now stirred up all his wrath; for he cast upon them the fierceness of his anger, anger in the highest degree; wrath and indignation the cause, and trouble, tribulation, and anguish, (Rom. ii. 8, 9.) the effect. This from on high he cast upon them, and did not spare, and they could not fleer out of his hands, Job xxvii. 22. He made a way, or, as the word is, He weighed a path, to his anger; he did not cast it upon them uncertainly, but by weight; his anger was weighed with the greatest exactness in the balances of justice; for, in his greatest displeasure, he never did, nor ever will do, any wrong to any of his creatures; the path of his anger was always weighed. [2.] The angels of God were the instruments employed in this execution; He sent evil angels among them; not evil in their own nature, but in respect to the errand upon which they were sent; they were destroying angels, or angels of punishment, which passed through all the land of Egypt, with orders, according to the weighed paths of God’s anger, not to kill all, but the first-born only. Good angels become evil angels, to execute vengeance on the children of their enemies, must never expect the holy angels to be their friends. [3.] The execution itself was very severe; He spared not their soul from death but suffered death to ride in triumph among them and gave their life over to the pestilence, which cut the thread of life off immediately; for he smote all the first-born in Egypt (v. 51.) the chief of their strength, the hopes of their respective families; children are the parents’ strength, and the first-born the defense of them. Hence it became Israel was precious in God’s sight, he gave men for them, and people for their life, Isa. xiii. 4.

By these plagues on the Egyptians, God made a way for his own people to go forth like sheers; distinguishing between them and the Egyptians, as the shepherd divides between the sheers and the goats, having set his own mark on those sheep, by the blood of the lamb sprinkled on their door-posts. He made them go forth like sheers, not knowing what they went, and guided them in the wilderness, like as a shepherd guides his flock, with all possible care and tenderness, v. 52. He led them on safely, though in dangerous paths, so that they feared not, that is, they needed not to fear; they were indeed frightened at the Red sea, (Exod. xiv. 10.) but that was said to them, and done for them, which effectually silenced their fears. But the sea overwhelmed their enemies, that ventured to pursue them into it, v. 53. It was a lane to them, but a grave to their persecutors.

2. It is carried on as far as their settlement in Canaan; (v. 54.) He brought them to the border of his sanctuary, to that land, in the midst of which he set up his sanctuary, which was, as it were, the centre and metropolis, the crown and glory, of it; that is a happy land which is the border of God’s sanctuary. This was the happiness of that land, that there God was known, and there were his sanctuary and dwelling-place, lxvi. 1, 2. The whole land in general, and Zion in particular, was the mountain which his right hand had purchased, which by his own power he had set apart for himself. See xxiv. 3. He made them to ride on the high places of the earth, Isa. lxi. 14. Deut. xxxii. 13. They found the Canaanites in the full and quiet possession of that land, but God cast out the heathen from them, not only took away their title to it, as the Lord of the whole earth, but himself executed the judgment given against them, and, as Lord of hosts, turned them out of it, and made his people Israel tread upon their high places, dividing each tribe an inheritance by line, and making them to dwell in the houses of those whom they had destroyed. God could have turned the unhinged, uncultivated, wild land which Canaan was now, as we may say, the same extent as Canaan) into fruitful soil, and have planted them there; but the land he designed them was to be a type of heaven, and therefore must be the glory of all lands; it must likewise be fought for, for the kingdom of heaven suffers violence.

III. The sins of Israel after they were settled in Canaan; (v. 56-58.) The children were like their fathers, and brought their old corruptions into their new land; though God had shown them his way, yet they tempted and provoked the most high God still. He gave them his testimonies, but they did not keep them; they began very promisingly, but when they turned back, gave God good words, but dealt unfaithfully, and were like a deceitful bow, which seemed likely to send the arrow to the mark, but, when it is drawn, breaks, and drops the arrow at the archer’s foot, or, perhaps, makes it recoil in his hand. There was much of their iniquity; no evidence to be put in their promises or professions. They seemed sometimes devoted to God, but they presently turned aside, and provoked him to anger with their high places and their graven images. Idolatry was the sin that did most easily beset them, and which, though they often professed their repentance for, they as often relapsed into. It was spiritual adultery either to worship idols, or to worship God by images, as if he had been an idol, and therefore by it they are said to move him to jealousy, Deut. xxxii. 16, 21.

IV. The judgments God brought upon them for these sins. Their place in Canaan would no more secure them in a sinful way, than their descent from Israel; You only have I known among all the earth, therefore I will punish you, Amos iii. 2. Idolatry is winked at among the Gentiles, but not in Israel. 1. God was displeased with them; (v. 59.) When God heard this, when he heard the cry of their iniquity, which came up before him, he was wrath, he took it very heinously, as well he might, and he greatly abhorred Israel, whom he had greatly loved; and delighted in them. That had been the people of his own choice, because of the Abode of his wrath. Presumptuous sins, idolatries especially, render even Israelites odious to God’s holiness, and obnoxious to his justice. 2. He deserted his tabernacle among them, and removed the defence which was upon that glory, v. 60. God never leaves us till we leave him, never withdraws till we have driven him from us. His name is Jealous, and he is jealous God; and therefore no marvel if a people whom he had so tendered to himself be loathed and rejected, and he refuse to conhabit with them any longer, when they have embraced the bosom of a stranger. The tabernacle at Shiloh was the tent God had placed among men, in which God would in very deed dwell with men upon the earth; but when his people treacherously forsook it, he justly forsook it, and then all its glory departed. Israel has small joy of the tabernacle without the presence of God in it. 3. He gave up all into the hands of the enemy. Those whom God forsakes become an easy prey to the destroyer. The Philistines are sworn enemies to the Israel of God, and no less so to the God of Israel, and yet God will make use of them to be a scourge to his people.

(1.) God permits them to take the ark prisoner, and carry it off as a trophy of their victory, to show that he had not only forsaken the tabernacle, but even the ark itself, which shall now be no longer a token of his presence; (v. 61.) He delivered his strength into captivity, as if it had been weakened and overcome, and his glory fell under the disgrace of being abandoned into the enemy’s hand. We have the story, 1 Sam. iv. 11. When the ark is become as a stranger among Israelites, no marvel if it soon be made a prisoner among Philistines. (2.) He suffers the armies of Israel to be routed by the Philistines; 1 Sam. v. 26, 27. He carried over unto the sword, to the sword of his own justice, and of the enemy’s rage, for he was wrath with his inheritance; and that wrath of his was the fire which consumed their young men in the prime of their time, by the sword or sickness, and made such a devastation of them, that their maidens were not praised, were not given in marriage, which is honourable in all; because there were no young men left to them to carry on the race, to, and hence the distresses and calamities of Israel were so mighty and various, that the joys of marriage-solemnities were judged unseasonable; and it was said, Blessed is the womb that beareth not. General destructions produce a scarcity of men; (Isa. xiii. 12.) I will make a man more fierce than fine gold, so that seven women shall take hold of one man, Isa. iv. 1.—iii. 25. Yet this was not the worst. (3.) Even their priests, who had placed the ark between the altar, and Phinehas; justly they fell, for they were an iniquity, a reproach, and a stench before the Lord exceedingly; and their priesthood was so far from being their protection, that it aggravated their sin, and hastened their fall; justly did they fall by the sword, because they exposed themselves in the field of battle, without call or warrant; we throw ourselves out of God’s protection, when we go out of our place, and out of the way of our duty. When the priests fell, their words made no lamentation, v. 64. All the ceremonies of mourning were lost and buried in substantial grief; the widow of Phinehas, instead of lamenting her husband's death, died herself, when she had called her son Ichabod, 1 Sam. iv. 19, &c.

V. God's return. Joshua, and his gracious appearance for them after this. We read not of their repentance and return to God, but God was grieved for the miseries of Israel, (Judg. xvi.) and concerned for his own honour, fearing the wrath of the enemy, lest they should behave themselves strangely, Deut. xxxii. 27. And therefore then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, (v. 65.) and like a mighty man that shouldest by reason of wine; not only like one that is roused out of a sleep, but who had recovered himself from the slumber which, by drinking, he was overcome with, who then regards that which before he seemed wholly to neglect, but like one that is refreshed with sleep, and whose heart is made glad by the sober and moderate use of wine, and therefore the more lively and vigorous, and fit for business. When God had delivered the ark of his strength into captivity, as one jealous of his honour, he soon put forth the arm of his strength to rescue it; starting up his strength to do great things for his people.

1. He plagued the Philistines who held the ark in captivity, v. 66. He smote them with emerods in the hinder parts, wounded them behind, as if they were fleeing from him, even then when they thought themselves more than conquerors. He put them to reproach, and they themselves helped to make it a perpetual reproach, by the golden images of their emerods, which they returned with the ark for a thank-offering. (1 Sam. vi. 5.) to remain in perpetuum rememoriam—as a perpetual memorial. Note, Sooner or later, God will glorify himself by putting disgrace upon his enemies, then when they are most elevated with their successes.

2. He provided a new settlement for his ark, after it had, been some months in captivity, and some years in obscurity. He did indeed refine the tabernacle of Joseph, he never sent it back to Shiloah, in the year of the jubilee, p. 67. The ruins of Gath place were standing monuments of divine justice. Go, see what I did to Shiloh, Jer. vii. 12. But he did not wholly take away the glory from Israel; the moving of the ark is not the removing of it; Shiloah has lost it, but Israel has not; God will have a church in the world, and a kingdom among men, though this or that place may have its candlestick removed; nay, the rejection of Shiloh is the election of Zion, as, long after, the fall of the Jews was the riches of the Gentiles, Rom. xi. 12. When God chose not the tribe of Ephraim, of which tribe Joshua was, he chose the tribe of Judah, (v. 68.) because of that tribe Jesus was to be, who is greater than Joshua. Kirjath-jearim, the place to which the ark was brought after its rescue out of the hands of the Philistines, was in the tribe of Judah; there it took possession of that tribe; and throne was removed to a place of eminence. Solomon which he loved, (v. 68.) which was beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth; there it was, that he built his sanctuary like high palaces, and like the earth. David indeed erected only a tent for the ark, but a temple was then designed and prepared for, and finished by his son; and that was, (I.) A very stately place. It was built like the palaces of princes, and the great men of the earth, nay, it was like to the temple which Solomon built it, and yet here it is said, God built it, for his father had taught him, perhaps with reference to this undertaking, that except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it, cxxvii. 1. which is a psalm for Solomon. (2.) A very stable place, like the earth; though not to continue as long as the earth, yet, while it was to continue, it was as firm as the earth, which God upheld by the word of his power, and it was not finally destroyed till the gospel-temple was erected, which is to continue as long as the sun and moon endure. (lxxxix. 36, 37.) Against which the gates of hell shall not prevail.

3. He set a good government over them; a monarch, and a monarch after his own heart. He chose David his servant out of all the thousands of Israel, and put the sceptre into his hand, out of whose loins Christ was to come, and who was to be a type of him, v. 70. Concerning David, observe here,

(1.) The meanness of his beginning. His extraction indeed was great, for he descended from the prince of the tribe of Judah, but his education was poor: he was bred, not a scholar, not a soldier, but a shepherd, he was taken from the sheep-folds, as Moses was, for God delights to put honour upon the humble and diligent, to raise the poor out of the dust, and to set them among princes; and some times finds those most fit for public action that have been the last in their time in solitude and contemplation. The Son of man came not in the glory of kings, but in meekness and humility.

(2.) The greatness of his advancement. God preferred him to feed Jacob his people, v. 71. It was a great honour that God put upon him, in advancing him to be a king, especially to be king over Jacob and Israel, God's peculiar people, near and dear to him; but withal it was a great trust reposed in him, when he was charged with the government of those that were God's own inheritance. God advanced him to the throne, that he might feed them, not that he might feed himself; that he might do good, not that he might make his family great. It is the charge given to all the under-shepherds, both magistrates and ministers, that they feed the flock of God.

(3.) The happiness of his management. David, having so great a trust put into his hands, obtained mercy of the Lord, to be found both skilful and faithful in the discharge of it; (v. 72.) So he fed them, he ruled them and taught them, guided and protected them. [1.] Very honestly; he did it according to the integrity of his heart, aiming at nothing but the glory of God, and the good of the people committed to his charge; the principles of his religion were the maxims of his government, which he uniformly observed and maintained with carnel policy, but with godly sincerity, by the grace of God. In every thing he did, he meant well, and had no by-end in view. [2.] Very discreetly; he did it by the skilfulness of his hands; he was not only very sincere in what he designed, but very prudent in what he did, and chose out the most proper means in pursuit of his end, for his God did instruct him to discretion. Happy the people that are under such a government! and praise God, he did not cease to show them his finishing, crowning, instance of God's favour to Israel; for David was a type of Christ, the great and good Shepherd, who was humbled first, and then exalted, and of whom it was foretold, that he should be filled with the spirit of wisdom and understanding, and should judge and reprove with equity.
Isa. xi. 3, 4. On the integrity of his heart and the skilfulness of his hands all his subjects may entirely rely, and of the increase of his government and people there shall be no end.

PSALM LXXIX.

This psalm, if penned with any particular event in view, is with most probability made to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, and the woesful havoc made of the Jews under Nebuchadnezzar. It is set to the same tune, as I may say, with the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and that weeping prophet borrow s two verses out of it, (v. 6, 7.) and makes use of them in his prayer, Jer. x. 25. Some think it was penned long before, by the spirit of prophecy, prepared for the use of the church in that cloudy and dark day. Others think that it was penned then by the spirit of prayer, set forth by a prophet named Asaph, probably written for the sons of Asaph. Whatever the particular occasion was, we have here, I. A representation of the very deplorable condition that the people of God were in at this time, v. 1.-5. II. A petition for God's succour and relief; that their enemies might be reckoned with, (v. 6, 7, 10, 12.) that their sins might be pardoned, (v. 8, 9.) and that they might be delivered, v. 11. III. A plea taken from the readiness of his people to praise him, v. 12. In lines of the church's peace and prosperity, this psalm may, in the singing of it, give us occasion to bless God that we are not thus trampled on and insulted. But it is especiallyseasonable in a day of treading down, and perplexity, for the exciting of our desires toward God, and the encouragement of our faith in him, as the church's Patron.

A psalm of Asaph.

1. O GOD, the heathen are come into thine inheritance; thy holy temple have they defiled; they have laid Jerusalem on heaps. 2. The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven, the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth. 3. Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them. 4. We are become a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us. 5. How long, LORD? wilt thou be angry for ever? shall thy jealousy burn like fire?

We have here a sad complaint exhibited in the court of heaven. The world is full of complaints, and so is the church too, for it suffers, not only with it, but from it, as a lily among thorns. God is complained of; whither should children go for their grievances, but to their father, to such a father as is able and willing to help? The heathen are complained of, who, being themselves aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, were sworn enemies to it. Though they knew not God, nor owned him, yet God having them in a chain, the church very justly appeals to him against them, for he is King of nations, to overrule them, to judge among the heathen, and the King of saints, to favour and protect them.

I. They complain here of the anger of their enemies, and the outrageous fury of the oppressor, exerted,

1. Against places, v. 1. They did all the mischiefs could, (1.) To the holy land; they invaded that, and made inroads into it; "The heathen are come into thine inheritance, to plunder that, and lay it waste." 2. Against the king, v. 2, 3. "The king was dearer to the heathen Israelites, as it was God's inheritance, than as it was their own; as it was the land in which God was known, and his name was great, than as it was the land in which they were bred and born, and which they and their ancestors had been long in possession of. Note, Injuries done to religion should grieve us more than even those done to common right, nay, to our own right. We should better bear to see our own inheritance wasted than God's inheritance. This psalmist had mentioned it in the foregoing psalm, as an instance of God's great favour to Israel, that he had cast out the heathen before them, Lxxviii. 55. But see what a change sin makes; now the heathen are sorrowed to pour out in upon them. (2.) Against their city: "They have reduced Jerusalem to heaps, heaps of rubbish, such heaps as are raised over graves, so some. The inhabitants were buried in the ruins of their own houses, and their dwellingplaces became their sepulchres, their long homes. (3.) To the holy house; that sanctuary which God had built like high palaces, and which was thought to be established as the earth, was now laid level with the ground; Thy holy temple have they defiled, making it waterless, by casting into it, and laying it waste. God's own people had defiled it by their sins, and therefore God suffered their enemies to defile it by their insolence. 2. Against persons, against the bodies of God's people; further their malice could not reach. (1.) They were prodigal of their blood, and killed them without mercy; their eye did not spare, nor did they give any quarter; (v. 3.) Their blood have they shed like water, wherever they met with them, round about Jerusalem, in all the avenues to the city; whoever went out, or entered, was drenched in the blood of the sword. Abundance of human blood was shed, so that the channels of water ran with blood. And they shed it with no more reluctance or regret than if they had spilt so much water, little thinking that every drop of it will be reckoned for in the day when God shall make inquisition for blood. (2.) They were abusive to their dead bodies; when they had killed them, they would let none bury them. Nay, even that very express charitable offering of the dead, even God's servants, the flesh of his saints, whose names and memories they had a particular spite at, they digged up again, and gave them to be meat to the fowls of the heaven, and to the beasts of the earth; or, at least, they left those so exposed, whom they slew, they hung them in chains, which was in a particular manner grievous to the Jews to see, because God had given them an express law against it, Ex. xxi. 14, as a breach of their oath. (3.) They made a most abominable human usage of Christ's witnesses is foretold; (Rev. xi. 9.) and thus even the dead bodies were witnesses against their persecutors. This is mentioned, (says Austin, De Civitate Dei, lib. 1. cap. 12.) not as an instance of the misery of the persecuted, (for the bodies of the saints shall rise in glory, however they became meat to the birds and the fowls,) but of the malice of the persecutors.

3. Against their names; (v. 4.) "We that survive are become a reproach to our neighbours, they all study to abuse us, and load us with contempt, and represent us as ridiculous, or odious, or both; upbraiding us with our sins and with our sufferings, or giving the lie to our relation to God, and expectations from him; so that we are become a scorn and derision to them that are round about us." If God's professing people degenerate from what they profess and from what others are, they must expect to be told of it; and it is well if a just reproof will help to bring us to a true repentance. But it has been the lot of the gospel-Israel to be made unjustly a reproach and derision; the apostles themselves were counted as the offscouring of all things.

II. They wonder more at God's anger, v. 5. They discern in the anger of their neighbours, and this they complain most of, "How long, LORD, wilt thou be angry? Shall it be, for ever? This intimates, that they desired no more than that God would be reconciled to them, that his anger might be turned away, and then the remainder of men's wrath would be restrained. Note, Those who desire God's favour as better than life, cannot but dread and deprecate his wrath as worse than death.

6. Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen that have not known thee, and upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name: 7. For they have devoured Jacob, and laid waste his dwelling-place. 8. O remember not against us former iniquities: let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us; for we are brought very low. 9. Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name; and deliver us, and purge away our sins, for thy name's sake. 10. Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God? let him be known among the heathen in our sight, by the revenging of the blood of thy servants which is shed. 11. Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee; according to the greatness of thy power preserve thou those that are appointed to die: 12. And render unto our neighbours seven-fold into their bosom their reproach, wherewith they have reproached thee, O Lord. 13. So we thy people, and sheep of thy pasture, will give thee thanks for ever; we will show forth thy praise to all generations.

The petitions here put up to God, are very suitable to the present distresses of the church, and they have pleas to enforce them, interwoven with them, taken mostly from God's honour. 1. They pray that God would so turn away his anger from them, as to turn it upon those that persecuted and abused them; (v. 6.) "Pour out thy wrath, the full vials of it, upon the heathen; let them wring out their fears and tears of grief, and drink them." This prayer is, in effect, a prophecy, in which the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Observe here, (1.) The character of those he prays against; they are such as have not known God, nor called upon his name. The reason why men do not call upon God, is, because they do not know him, how able and willing he is to help them. They that persist in ignorance of God, and neglect of prayer, are the ungodly, who live without God in the world. There are kingdoms that know not God, and obey not the gospel, but neither their multitude, nor their force united, will secure them from his just judgments. (2.) Their crime; they have devoured Jacob, v. 7. That is crime enough, in the account of Him, who reckons that those who touch his people, touch the apple of his eye. They have not only disturbed, but devoured Jacob; not only reproached upon his dwelling-place, the land of Canaan, but have laid it waste by plundering and depopulating it. (3.) Their condemnation. "Pour out thy wrath upon them; do not only restrain them from doing further mischief, but reckon with them for the mischief they have done." 2. They pray for the pardon of sin, which they own to be the procuring cause of all their calamities. How inequitable soever men were, God was righteous in permitting them to do what they did. They pray, (1.) That God would not remember against them their former iniquities; (v. 8.) either their own former iniquities, that now, when they were old, they might not be made to possess the iniquities of their youth; or the former iniquities of their people, the sins of their ancestors. In the captivity of Babylon, former iniquities were brought to account; but God purposed to do so not (Jer. xxxi. 29, 30), so they pray, "Remember not against us our first sins;" which some make to look as far back as the golden calf, because God said, In the day when I visit, I will visit for this sin of theirs upon them, Exod. xxxii. 34. If the children by repentance and reformation cut off the enmity of the parents' sin, they may in faith pray that God will not remember them, against them. When God pardons sin, he blots it out of remembrance. (2.) That he would purge away the sins they had been lately guilty of, by the guilt of which their minds and consciences had been defiled; Deliver us, and purge away our sins, v. 9. Then deliverances from trouble are granted in love, and are mercies indeed, when they are grounded upon the pardon of sin, and flow from that; we should therefore be more earnest with God in prayer for the removal of our sins, than for the removal of our afflictions, and the pardon of them is the foundation and sweetness of our deliverances.

3. They pray that God would work deliverance and salvation for them, and bring their troubles to a good end, and that speedily; Let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us, v. 8. They had no hopes but from God's mercies, his tender mercies; their case was so deplorable, that they looked upon themselves as the proper objects of divine compassion, and so near to despair, that, unless divine mercy did our need interpose to prevent their ruin, they were undone. This whets their importunity, "Lord, help us; Lord, deliver us; help us under our troubles, that we bear them well; help us out of our troubles, that the spirit may not fail. Deliver us from sin, from sinking." Three things they plead, (1.) The great distress they were reduced to; "We are brought very low, and, being low, shall be lost, if thou help us not. The lower we are brought, the more need we have of help from heaven, and the more will divine power be magnified in raising us up. (2.) Their dependence upon him; "Thou art the God of our salvation, who alone canst help; salvation belongs to the Lord, from whom we expect help, for in the Lord alone is the salvation of his people." They who make God the God of their salvation, shall find him so. (3.) The interest of his own honour in their case; they plead merit for theirs, He is the Lord thy name; pardon us for thy name's sake. The best encouragements in prayer are those that are taken from God only, and those things whereby he has made himself known. Two things are insinuated in this plea. [1.] That God's name and honour would be greatly injured, if he did not deliver them; for those that derided them, blasphemed God, as if he were weak and could not help them, or were not the same God; (v. 10.) "Wherefore should the heathen say; Where is their God? He has forsaken them, and forgotten them; and this they get by worshippershipping a God whom they cannot see." N'il fretster nubes, et cali numeri adorant. Juv.—They adore no other Divinity than the clouds and the sky. That which was their praise, (That they served a God that is everywhere,) was now turned to their reproach, as if they needed a God they could not see. [2.] "Lord," say they, "Make them appear that thou art, by making it to appear that thou art with us and for us; that when we are asked, Where is your God? we may be able to say, He is nigh unto us in all that which we call upon him for; and you see he is so by what he doth for us." [2.] That God's name and honour would be greatly advanced, if he did deliver them; his mercy would be glorified in delivering them that were so miserable.
and helpless. By making bare his everlasting arm on their behalf, he would make unto himself an everlasting name; and their deliverance would be a type and figure of the great salvation, which, in the fulness of time, Messiah the Prince would work out, to the glory of God's name.
4. They pray that God would avenge them on their adversaries, (1.) For their cruelty and barbarity; (v. 10.) Let the avenging of our blood
'answer to our content' (v. 9.) to let it be known among the heathen; let them be made sensible that what judgments are brought upon them are punishments of the wrong they have done to us; let this be in our sight, and 'by this means let God be known among the heathen, as the God to whom vengence belongs,' (xxv. 1.) and the God that espouses his people's cause." Those that have intoxicated themselves with the blood of the saints, shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy (2.) For their insolence and scorn; (v. 12.) "Render to them their reproach. The indignities which by word and deed they have done to the people of God, himself, and his name, let them be repaid to them with interest." The reproach wherewith men have reproached us only, we must leave it to God, whether he will render it to them or no, and must pray that he would forgive them; but the reproach wherewith they have blasphemed God himself, we may in faith pray that God would render it seven-fold into their bosoms, so as to strike at their hearts, to humble them, and bring them to repentance. This prayer is a prophesy of the same import with that of Ezekiel, That God will convince sinners of all their hard speeches which they have spoken against him, (Jude xvi.) and will return them into their own bosoms by everlasting terrors at the remembrance of them.
5. They pray that God would make a way for the prisoners, especially the condemned prisoners, v. 11. The case of their brethren, who were fallen into the hands of the enemy, was very sad; they were kept close prisoners, and because they durst not be heard to bemoan themselves, they vented their griefs in deep and silent sighs. All their breathing was sighing, and so was their praying. They were appointed to die, as sheep for the slaughter, and had received the sentence of death without appeal: this declares the case, and the poet, and priest recommends, (1.) To the divine pity; "Let their sighs come up before thee," and be thou pleased to take cognizance of their moans. (2.) To the divine power; "According to the greatness of thy arm, which no creature can contest with, preserve thou those that are appointed to die, from the death to which they are appointed." Man's extremity is God's opportunity to appear for his people. See 2 Cor. 1. 5-10.
Lastly, They promise the returns of praise for the answers of prayer; (v. 13.) So we will give thee thanks for ever. Observe, (1.) How they please themselves with their relation to God; "Though we are oppressed and brought low, yet we are the sheep of thy pasture, not disowned and cast off by thee for all this; We are thine, save us." (2.) How they promise themselves an opportunity of praising God for their deliverance, which they therefore desire, and would bid welcome, because it would furnish them with matter for thanksgiving, and put their hearts in tune for that excellent work, the work of heaven. (3.) How they oblige themselves not only to give God thanks at present, but to show forth his praise unto all generations, that is, to do all they could, both to perpetuate the remembrance of God's favours to them, and to engage their posterity to keep up the work of praise. (4.) How they plead this with God; "Lord, appear for us, against our enemies; for, if we get the better, they will blaspheme thee; (v. 12.) but if we de-covered, we will praise thee. Lord, we are that people of truce, which thou hast formed for those to show forth thy praise; if we be cut off, whence shall that rent, that tribute, be raised?" Note, These lives that are entirely devoted to God's praise are assuredly taken under his protection.

PSALM LXXX.
This psalm is much to the same purport with the foregoing.
Some think it of the captivity of David, between the sep-tation and captivity of the ten tribes, as the foregoing psalm of the face. But many were the distresses of the Israel of God, many perhaps which are not recorded in the sacred history, some whereof might give occasion for the drawing up this psalm, which is proper to be sung in the day of Jacob's trouble; and if, in singing it, we express a true love to the church, and a hearty concern for its interest, with a firm confidence in God's power to be to us all, it is owing to the great celebration, it shall be sung among his people, and with our hearts to the Lord. The psalmist here, 1. Begs for the tokens of God's presence with them, and favour to them, v. 1-3. II. He complains of the present rebores they were under, v. 4-7. III. He illustrates the present desolations of the church, by the comparison of a vine and a vineyard, which had flourished, but was now destroyed, v. 8-16. IV. He concludes with prayer to God for the preparing of mercy for them, and the preparing of his people for mercy; and a prayer of praise, as many psalms before and after, relates to the public interests of God's Israel, which ought to lie nearer to our hearts than any secular interest of our own.

To the chief musician upon Shoshannim-Eduth.
A psalm of Asaph.

1. GIVE ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock; thou that dwellest between the cherubims, shine forth.

2. Before Ephraim, and Benjamin, and Manasseh, stir up thy strength, and come and save us. 3. Turn us again, O God, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

4. O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry against the prayer of thy people?

5. Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; and givest them tears to drink in great measure.

6. Thou makest us a strife unto our neighbours; and our enemies laugh among themselves.

7. Turn us again, O God of hosts, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.
The psalmist here, in the name of the church, appliex himself to God by prayer, with reference to the present afflicted state of Israel.

He entreats God's favour for them; (v. 1, 2.)
that is all in all to the sanctuary when it is desolate, and is to be sought in the first place. Observe, (1.) How he eyes God in his address, as the Shepherd of Israel, whom he had called the sheath of his pasture, (lxix. 13.) under whose guidance and care Israel was, as the sheep under the care and conduct of the shepherd. Christ is the great and good Shepherd, to whom we may in faith commit the custody of his sheep that were given to him.
He leads Joseph like a flock, to the best pastures, and out of the way of danger; if Joseph follow him not as obsequiously as the sheep do the shepherd, it is his own fault. He dwells between the cherubims, where he is ready to receive petitions, and to give directions; the mercy-seat was between the cherubims; and it is very comfortable, in prayer, to lock up to God as sitting on a throne of grace, and that It is so, as if he shewed the mansion of the God whence the mercy-seat was the propitiatory.

(2.) What he expects and desires from God; that he would give ear to the cry of their miseries, and of their prayers; that he would shine forth both in his own glory, and in favour and kindness to his people; that he would show himself, and smile on them; that he would stir up his strength, that he would excite it, and exert it: it had seemed to slumber; so Lord, awaken it,” his cause met with great opposition, but that is because he is able to overpower it; “Lord, put forth thy strength so much the more, and come for salvation to us; be to thy people a powerful Help, and a present Help; Lord, do this before Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh,” that is, “in the sight of all the tribes of Israel, let them see it to their satisfaction.” Perhaps these three tribes are named, because they were the tribes which formed that squadron or army which passed through the wilderness, followed next after the tabernacle; so that before them the ark of God’s strength rose to scatter their enemies.

2. He complains of God’s displeasure against them. God was angry, and he dreads that more than any thing, v. 4. (1.) It was great anger; he apprehended that God was angry against the prayer of his people; not only that he was angry notwithstanding the prayers of his people, but he was so angry that he was ready to turn away his wrath from them; but that he was angry with their prayers, though they were his own people that prayed. That God should be angry at the sins of his people, and at the prayers of his enemies, is not strange; but that he should be angry at the prayers of his people, is strange indeed. He not only delayed to answer them, (that he often does, in love,) but he was displeased at them. If he be really angry at the prayers of his people, we may be sure it is because they ask amiss, Jam. v. 3. They pray, but they do not wrestle in prayer, their ends are not right, or there is some secret sin harboured and indulged in them; they do not lift up pure hands, but they lift up hands with wrath and doubting. But perhaps it is only in their own apprehension; he seems angry with their prayers, when really he is not; for thus will he try their patience and perseverance in prayer; as Christ tried the woman of Canaan when he said, It is not meet to take the children’s bread and cast it to dogs. (2.) It was anger that had continued a great while; “How long wilt thou be angry? We have still continued praying, and yet are still under thy frowns.”

Now the tokens of God’s displeasure, which they had been long under, were both their sorrow and shame. [1.] Their sorrow; (v. 5.) Thou feedest them with the bread of tears, they eat their meat from day to day in tears, this is the vinegar in which they dipped their morsel, xli. 3. They had tears given them to drink, not now and then a taste of that bitter cup, but in great measure. Note, There are many that spend their time in sorrow, who yet shall spend their eternity in joy. [2.] It was their shame, v. 6. God, by frowning upon them, made them a strife unto their neighbours, each strake which should expose them most; and such a cheap and easy pray, were they made to them, that all the strife was, who should have the stripping and plundering of them. Their enemies laughed among themselves to see the frights they were in, the straits they were reduced to, and the disappointments they met with. When God is displeased with his people, we must expect to see them in tears, and their enemies in triumph.

3. He exhorts them earnestly for prevailing grace, in order to their access with God, and their salvation: Turn us again, O God, v. 3. Turn us again, O God of hosts; (v. 7.) and then cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved. It is the bithorn of the song, for we have it again, v. 19. They are conscious to themselves that they have gone astray from God and their duty, and have turned aside into sinful ways, and that this was it that provoked God to hide his face from them, and to give them up into the hand of their enemies; and therefore they desire to begin their work at the right end; “Lord, turn us to thee in a way of repentance and reformation, and then, no doubt, thou wilt return to us in a way of mercy and deliverance.”

Observe, (1.) No salvation but from God’s favour; “Cause thy face to shine, let us have thy love and the light of thy countenance, and then we shall be saved.” (2.) No obtaining favour with God unless we be converted to him. We must turn again to God from the world and the flesh, and then he will cause his face to shine upon us. (3.) No conversion to God but by his own grace, that we frame our doings to turn to him, (Hos. v. 4.) and then pray earnestly for his grace, Turn thou me, and I shall be turned, pleading that gracious promise, (Prov. i. 23.) Turn you at my reproof; behold, I will pour out my Spirit unto you. The prayer here is for a national conversion; in this method we must pray for national mercies, what that is amiss may be amended, and then our grievances would be soon redressed. National holiness would secure national happiness.

8. Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt; thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it. 9. Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land. 10. The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. 11. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river. 12. Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her? 13. The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it. 14. Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts, look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine; 15. And the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted, and the branch that thou madest strong for thyself. 16. It is burnt with fire; it is cut down: they perish at the rebuke of thy countenance. 17. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the son of man whom thou madest strong for thyself. 18. So will not we go back from thee: quicken us, and we will call upon thy name. 19. Turn us again, O Lord God of hosts; cause thy face to shine, and we shall be saved.

The psalmist is here presenting his suit for the Israel of God, and pressing it home at the throne of grace, pleading with God for mercy and grace for them. The church is here represented as a vine, (v. 8, 14.) and a vineyard, v. 15. The Root of this vine is Christ, Rom. xi. 18. The branches are believers, John xv. 5. The church is like a vine, weak, and needing support, unsightly, and having an unpromising outside, but spreading and fruitful, and its fruit most excellent; the church is a choice and noble tree; we have reason to acknowledge the goodness of God, that he has planted such a vine in the wilderness of this world, and preserved it to this day. Now observe here.

1. How the vine of the Old Testament church was planted at first. It was brought out of Egypt with a high hand, the heathen were cast out of Canaan to make room for it; seven nations to make room for that one. Thou didst sweep before it; so some read, (v. 9.) to make clear work; the nations were swept away as dirt with the besom of destruction. God, having made room for it, and planted it, caused it to take deep root by a happy establishment of their government both in church and state; and yet it was not overstocked, v. 10. The hills of Canaan were covered with their shadow, and the branches, though they extended themselves far, like those of the vine, yet were not weak like them, but as strong as those of the goodly cedars. Israel not only had abundance of men, but those mighty men of valour.

2. They extended their conquests and dominion to the neighbouring countries; (v. 11.) She sent out her boughs to the sea, the great sea westward, and her branches to the river southward, the river of Damascus northward, or rather, the river Euphrates eastward, Gen. xxv. 18. Nebuchadnezzar's greatness is represented by a flourishing tree, Dan. iv. 20, 21. But it is observable here concerning this vine, that it is praised for its shadow, its boughs, and its branches, but not a word of its fruit, for Israel was an empty vine, Hos. x. 1. God came, looking for grapes, but behold, wild grapes, Isa. v. 2. And if a vine do not bring forth fruit, no tree so useless, so worthless, Ezek. xx. 2, 6.

III. How it was wasted and ruined; "Lord, thou hast done great things for this vine, and why shall it be all undone again? If it were a plant not of God's planting, it were not strange to see it rooted up; but shall God desert and abandon that which he himself gave to be?" (v. 12.) Why hast thou then broken down her hedges? There was a good reason for this change in God's way toward them; this noble vine was become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, (Jer. ii. 21.) to the reproach of its great Owner, and then no marvel if he took away its hedge; (Isa. v. 5.) yet God's former favours to this vine are urged as pleas in prayer to God, and improved as encouragements to faith, that for all this God would not wholly cast them off. Observe, 1. The malice and enmity of the Gentile nations against Israel; as soon as ever God broke down their hedges, and left them exposed, troops of enemies presently brake in upon them, that waited for an opportunity to destroy them. Thy that passed by the way, plucked at them; the bough out of the wood and the wild beast of the field were ready to ravage it, v. 13. But, 2. See also the restraint which these cruel enemies were under, for, till God had broken down their hedges, they could not pluck a leaf of this vine. The Duke of Buckingham, though this was God's broken hedge round about him, Jb. i. 10. See how much it is the interest of our people to keep themselves in the favour of God, and then they need not fear any wild beast of the field, Jb. xxv. 23. If we provoke God to withdraw, our defence is started from us, and we are undone. The displeasing state of Israel is described; (v. 16.) It is burnt with fire, it is cut down; the people are treated like thorns and briars, that are cut down at the end; it is burnt to ashes; and nor longer like vines that are protected and cherished; they perish not through the rage of the wild beast and the bower, but at the rebuke of thy countenance; that was it which they dreaded, and to which they attributed all their calamities. It is well or ill with us, according as we are under God's smiles or frowns.

IV. What their requests were. To God hereupon. That God would help the vine; (v. 14, 15.) that he would graciously take cognizance of its case, and do for it as he thought fit; "Return, we beseech thee, O Lord of hosts, for thou hast broken down our hedges, v. 15. *Look down from heaven, to which thou hast returned, on this place of prospect, whence thou seest all the wrongs that are done us; that place of power, whence thou canst send effectual relief; from heaven, where thou hast prepared thy throne of judgment, to which we appeal, and where thou hast prepared a better country for those that are Israelites indeed; thence give a gracious look, thence make a gracious visit, to this vine. Take our woful condition into thy compassionate consideration, and for the pure fruits of thy pity we refer ourselves to thee. Only behold the vineyard, or rather the root, which thy right hand hath planted, and which therefore we hope thy right hand will protect; that branch which thou madest strong for thyself, to show forth thy praise, (Isa. xliii. 21.) that with the fruit of it then mightest be honoured, Lord, it is formed by thyself, and for thyself, and therefore it may with observable repetition claim its own, and be thine own care;" As for God, his work is in order. What we read the Branch, in the Hebrew is the Son, (Ben.) whom in thy counsel thou hast made strong for thyself. That branch was to come out of the stock of Israel; My servant the Branch, Zech. iii. 8. And therefore, till he was come, Israel in general, and the house of David in particular, must be preserved and upheld, and kept in being. He is in the vine, John xv. 1. Isa. xi. 2. *Destroy it not, for that a blessed branch;" (v. 16.)

2. That he would help the vine-dresser; (v. 17, 18.) "Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand," that king (whoever it was) of the house of David, that was now to go in and cut before them; "let thy hand be upon him, not only to protect and cover him, but to own him, and strengthen him, and give him success. We have this phrase, Ezra vii. 9. And I was strengthened as the hand of the Lord my God was with me. Then the king of the house of God's right hand, as he was the representative of their state, which was dear to God, as his Benjamin, the son of his right hand; as he was president in their affairs, and an instrument in God's right hand of much good to them, defending them from themselves and from their enemies, and directing them in the right way; and as he was under-shepherd for him who was the great Shepherd of Israel. Prince, who have power, must remember that they are sons of men; of Adam, so the word is; that, if they are strong, it is God that has made them strong, and he has made them so for himself, for they are his ministers to serve the interest of his Kingdom, any men; which if they do in sincerity, his hand shall be upon them; and we should pray in faith that it may be so, adding this promise, that, if God will adhere to our governors, we will adhere to him, and will not go back from thee; we will never desert a cause which we see that God espouses, and is the Patron of. Let God be our Leader, and we will follow him. Adding also this prayer, "Quick en us, put life into us, revive our dying interests, revive our drooping spirits, and then we will call upon thy name. We will continue to do so upon all occasions, having found it not in vain to do so." We cannot call upon God's name in a right manner, unless he can be called upon us; but we cannot have him come into our souls, that puts liveliness into our prayers.

But many interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, apply this to the Messiah, the Son of David, the Protector and Saviour of the church, and the KeePER of the vineyard. (1.) He is the Man of God's right hand, to whom he has srawn by his right hand, so the Chaldees; whom he has exalted to his right hand, and who is indeed his right hand, the Arm of the Lord, for all power is given to him. (2.) He is that Son of man whom he made strong for himself for the glorifying of his name, and the advancing of the interests of his kingdom among men. (3.) God's hand is upon him throughout his whole undertaking, to bear him out and carry him on, to protect and animate him, that the good pleasure of the Lord might prosper in his hand. (4.) The stability and constancy of believers are entirely owing to the grace and strength which are laid up for us in Jesus Christ, lxviii. 28. In him is our strength found, by which we are sustained and preserved to the end. Let thy hand be upon him, on him let our help be laid, who is mighty, let him be made able to save to the uttermost, and that will be our security; so will not we go back from thee.

Lastly, the Psalm concludes with the same petition that had been put up twice before, and yet it is no vain repetition; (v. 13.) Turn us again. The title given to God rises, (v. 3.) O God, v. 7.) O God of our fathers, (v. 13.) O Lord of hosts. When we come to God for his grace, his good will towards us, and his good work in us, we should earnestly, continue instant in prayer, and pray more earnestly.

PSALM LXXXI.

This Psalm was penned, as is supposed, not upon occasion of any particular proceeding but for the solemnity of a particular ordinance, either that of the new moon in general, or that of the feast of trumpets, on the new moon of the seventh month, Lev. xxiii. 24. Num. xxix. 1. When David, by the Spirit, introduced the singing of psalms into the temple-service, this psalm was intended for that day, to excite and assist the proper devotions of it. All the psalms are profitable; but if one psalm be more suitable than another to the day, and the observations of it, we should choose that. The two great intentions of our religious assemblies, and which we ought to have in our eye in our attendance on them, are answered in this psalm, which are, to give glory to God, and to receive instruction from God; to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple: accordingly, by this psalm we are assisted, on our solemn feast-days, in praising God for what he is to his people, (v. 1. -3.) and for what he has done, (v. 4.) pruning and mortifying one another concerning the obligations we lie under to God, (v. 8. -10.) the danger of revolting from him, (v. 11, 12.) and the happiness we should have, if we would but keep close to him, v. 13. -16. This, though spoke primarily of Israel of old, is written for our learning, and is therefore to be sung with application.

To the chief musician upon Gittith. A psalm of Asaph.

1. SING aloud unto God our strength: make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob. 2. Take a psalm, and bring hither the timbrel, the pleasant harp with the psaltery. 3. Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast-day. 4. For this was a statute for Israel, and a law of the God of Jacob. 5. This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony, when he went out through the land of Egypt; where I heard a language that I understood not. 6. I removed his shoulder from the burden: his hands were delivered from the pots. 7. Thou calledst in trouble, and I delivered thee; I answered thee in the secret place of thunder; I proved thee at the waters of Meribah. Selah.

When the people of God were gathered together in the solemn day, the day of the feast of the Lord, they must be told that they had business to do, for we do not go to church to sleep, or to be idle; no, there is that which the duty of every day requires; work of the day, which is to be done in its day. And hence...

I. The worshippers of God are excited to their work; and are taught, by singing this psalm, to stir up both themselves and one another to it, v. 1. -3. Our errand is, to give unto God the glory due unto his name, and in all our religious assemblies we must mind this as our business. 1. In doing this, we must eye God as our Strength, and as the God of Jacob, v. 1. He is the Strength of Israel, as a people, for he is a God in covenant with them, who will powerfully protect, support, and deliver them, who fights their battles and makes them valiantly and victoriously. He is the Strength of every Israelite; by his grace we are enabled to go through all our services, sufferings, and conflicts; to him, as our Strength, we must pray, and we must sing praise to him, as the God of all the wrestling seed of Jacob, with whom we have a spiritual communion. 2. We must do this by all the expressions of holy joy and triumph. It was then to be done by musical instruments, by all the psalms, and especially this psalm; playing the trumpet, some think, in remembrance of the sound of the trumpet on mount Sinai, which waxed louder and louder; it was then, and is now, to be done, by singing psalms, singing aloud, and making a joyful noise. The pleasantness of the harp, and the awfulness of the trumpet, intimate to us that God is to be worshipped with cheerfulness and holy joy, with reverence and godly fear. Singing aloud, and making a noise, imply that we must be warm and affectionate in praising God; that we must with a hearty good will show forth his praise, as those that are not ashamed to own our dependence on him, and obligations to him; and that we should join many together in this work, the more the better, it is the more like heaven. 3. This must be done in the time appointed. No time is amiss for praising God; (Seven times a day will I praise thee; nay, at midnight will I sing praise.) But when the assembly are together, it is prescribed, and especially as there are times appointed, not for God to meet us, (he is always ready,) but for us to meet one another, that we may join together in praising God. The solemn feast-day must be a day of praise; when we are receiving the gifts of God's bounty, and rejoicing in them, then it is proper to sing here his praises.

II. They are here directed in their work.

1. They must look up to the divine institution, which is the foundation of all religious worship, as we have an eye to the command, (v. 4.) This was a statute for Israel, for the keeping up of a face of religion among them; it was a law of the God of Jacob, which all the seed of Jacob are bound by, and must be subject to. Note, Praising God is not only a good thing, which we do well to do, but it is our indispensable duty, which we are obriged to do, as it is at our peril if we neglect it; and in all our religious exercises we must be subject to the institution, as our warrant and rule; "This I do, because God has commanded me; and therefore I hope he will accept me;" then it is done in faith.

2. They must look back upon those operations of Divine Providence, which is the memorial of. This solemn service was ordained for a testimony, (v. 5.) a standing traditional evidence, for the attesting of the matters of fact. It was a testimony to Jacob, which was to show that God had done for their fathers, and would be a testimony against them, if they should be ignorant of them, and forget them.

(1.) The psalmist, in the people's name, puts himself in mind of the general work of God on Is-
I gave them up unto their own hearts' lust; and they walked in their own counsels. 13. Oh that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways! 14. I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries. 15. The haters of the Lord should have submitted themselves unto him: but their time should have endured for ever. 16. He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat: and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee.

God, by the psalmist, here speaks to Israel, and, in them, to us, on whom the ends of the world are come.

I. He demands their diligent and serious attention to what he was about to say; (v. 8.) "Hear, O my people; who should hear me, if my own people will not? I have heard and answered thee; now, wilt thou hear me? Hear what is said with the greatest solemnity, and the most unquestionable certainty, for it is what I will testify unto thee. Do not only give me the hearing, but hearken unto me, and be advised by me, be ruled by me." Nothing could be more reasonably or more justly expected, and yet God puts an if upon it. "If thou hearken unto me, it is thine interest to do so, and yet it is questionable whether thou wilt or no, for thy neck is an iron sinew."

II. He puts them in mind of their obligation to him, as the Lord their God and Redeemer; (v. 10.) I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, this is the preface to the ten commandments, and a powerful reason for the keeping of them, showing that they are bound to it in duty, interest, and gratitude, all which bonds we break at our peril, as we shall be disoblige

III. He gives them an abstract both of the precepts and of the promises which he gave them as the Lord, and their God, upon their coming out of Egypt. 1. The great command was, That they should have no other gods before him; (v. 9.) There shall no strange god be in thee, none beside me. Other gods might be called strange gods, for it was very strange that any person, who had the true and living God for their God, should hanker after any other. God is jealous in this matter, for he will not suffer his glory to be given to another; and therefore in this matter they must be circumspect, Exod. xxi. 13. 2. The great promise was, That God himself, as a God all-sufficient, would be nigh unto them in all that which they called upon him for, Deut. iv. 7. That, if they would adhere to him as their powerful Protector and Ruler, they should always find him their bountiful Benefactor. Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it, as the young ravens that cry open their mouths wide, and the old ones fill them. See here, (1.) What is our duty; to raise our expectations from God, and enlarge our desires toward him. We cannot look for too little from the creature, nor too much from the Creator. They are not straitened in him; why therefore should we be straitened in our own bosoms? (2.) What is God's promise; I will fill thy mouth with good things, cii. 5. There is enough in God to fill our treasures, (Prov. viii. 21.) to replenish every hungry soul, (Jer. xxxi. 25.) to supply all our wants, to answer all our desires, and to make us completely happy. The pleasures of sense will surfeit, and never satisfy; (Is. lv. 2.) divine pleasures will satisfy, and never surfeit. And we may have enough from God, if we pray for it in faith; Ask, and it shall be given you; he gives liberally, and upbraids not. God assured his people Israel, that it should be their own fault, if he did not do as great and kind things for them as he had done for their fathers. Nothing should have been thought too good, too much, to give them, if they would but have kept close to God. He would none of me have given them such and such things, 2 Sam. xii. 8.

IV. He charges them with a high contempt of his authority as their Lawgiver, and his grace and favour as their Benefactor, v. 11. He had done much for them, and designed to do more; but all in vain: “My people would not hearken to my voice, but turned a deaf ear to all I said.” Two things he complains of: 1. Their disobedience to his commandings and his voice, so as never any people did; but they would not hearken to it, they would not be ruled by it, neither by the law, nor by the reason of it. 2. Their dislike of his covenant-relation to them; They would none of me. “They acquiesced not in my word,” so the Chaldee. God was willing to be to them a God, but they were not willing to be to him a people; they did not like his terms. “I would have gathered them, but they would not.” They had none of him; and why had they not? It was not because they were not, they were fairly invited into covenant with God; it was because they could not, for the word was nigh them, even in their mouth and in their heart: but it was purely because they would not. God calls them his people, for they were bought by him, bound to him, by a thousand ties, and yet even they have not hearkened, have not obeyed; Israel, the seed of Jacob my friend, set me at nought, and would have none of me. Note, All the wickedness of God’s wicked world is owing to the wilful rejection of the word of life. The reason why people are not religious, is, because they will not be so.

V. He justifies himself with this, in the spiritual judgments he had brought upon them; (v. 12.) So I gave them up unto their own hearts’ lusts, which would be more dangerous enemies, and more mischievous oppressors, to them, than any of the neighbouring nations ever were. God withdrew his Spirit from them, took off the bridle of his grace, left them to themselves, and justly; they will do as they will, and therefore let them do as they will: Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone.

It is a righteous thing with God to give those up to their own hearts’ lusts that indulge them, and give up themselves to be led by them; for why should his Spirit always strive? His grace is his own, and he is Debor to no man, and yet, as he never gave his grace to any that could say they deserved it, so he never took it away from any, but such as had first forfeited it; They would none of me, so I gave them up, let them take their course; and see what follows; they walked in their own counsels, in the way of their heart, and in the sight of their eye, both in their worship, and in their conversations. I left them to do as they would, and then they did all they were ill; they walked in their own counsels, and not according to the counsel of God and his advice. God therefore was not the Author of their sin, he left them to the lusts of their own hearts, and the counsels of their own heads; if they do not well, the blame must lie upon their own hearts, and the blood upon their own heads.

VI. He testifies his good will to them, in wishing they had done well for themselves. He saw how sure their ruin was, when they were delivered up to their own lusts, and how much worse than being given up to Satan, which may be in order to reformation, (1 Tim. i. 20.) and to salvation, 1 Cor. v. 5. But to be delivered up to our own hearts’ lusts, is to be sealed under condemnation. He is filthy, let him be filthy still; what fatal precipices will not these hurry a man to? Now, here God looks upon them with pity, and shows that it was with reluctancy he thus abandoned them to their folly and fate; How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? Hos. xi. 8, 9. So here, Oh that my people had hearkened! See Isa. lviii. 18. Thus Christ lamented the obstinacy of Jerusalem; If you had been wise, how gladly have I have walked in the light of my countenance! Luke xxi. 42. The expressions here are very affecting, (v. 13.-16.) designed to show, 1. How unwilling God is that any should perish, and desires that all should come to repentance. He delights not in the ruin of sinful persons or nations. 2. What enemics sinners are to themselves, and what an aggravation it will be of their misery, that they might have been happy upon such easy terms.

Observe here, (1.) The great mercy God had in store for his people, and which he would have wrought for them, if they had been obedient. [1.] He would have given them victory over their enemies, and would soon have completed the reduction of them. They should not only have kept their ground, but have gained their point, against the remaining Canaanites, and their encroaching vexatious neighbours; (v. 14.) I should have subdued their enemies; and it is God only that is to be depended on for the success of our undertakings. [2.] If God had put them to the expense and fatigue of a tedious war, he would soon have done it; for he would have turned his hand against their adversaries, and then they had not been able to stand before them. It intimates how easily he would have done it, and without any difficulty; with the turn of a hand; nay, with the breath of his mouth shall he slay the wicked, Isa. xi. 4. If he but turn his right hand, the nations of the wicked will submit themselves to him; (v. 15.) and though they are not disposed to love him, yet they shall be made to fear him, and to confess that he is too hard for them, and that it is in vain to contend with him. God is honoured, and so is his Israel, by the submission of those that have been in rebellion against them, though it be but a forced and feigned submission. [3.] He would have confirmed and perpetuated their posterity, and established it upon sure and lasting foundations. In despite of all the attempts of the enemies of God against them, their time should have endured for ever, and they should never have been disturbed in the possession of the good land God had given them, much less evicted, and turned out of all possession. [4.] He would have given them great plenty of all good things; (v. 16.) He should have fed them with the finest of the wheat, with the best grain, and best of all the kind. Wheat was the staple-criminality of Canaan, and they expected a deal of it, Ezek. xxvii. 17. He would not only have profited for them the best sort of bread, but with honey out of the rock would he have satisfied them. Beside the precious products of the fruitful soil, that there might not be a barren spot in all their land, even the cloths of the rock should serve for bee-hives, and in them they should find honey in abundance. See Deut. xxxii. 13, 14. In short, God designed to make them every way easy and happy.

(2.) The duty God required from them as the condition of all this mercy. He expected no more then that they should hearken to him, as a scholar to his teacher, to receive his instructions; as a servant to his master, to receive his commands; and that they should walk in his ways, those ways of the Lord which are right and pleasant, that they should observe his statutes and his ordinances, and attend the intimations of his providence, there was nothing unreasonable in this.

(3.) Observe how the reason of the withholding of the mercy is laid in their neglect of the duty; If they had hearkened to me, I would soon have subdued their enemies. Note, National sin and disobedience is the great and only thing that retards and obstructs national salvation and deliverance.

When I would have healed Israel, and set every thing to rights among them, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, and so a stop was put to the cure, Hos. vii. 1. We are apt to say, "If such a method had been taken, such an instrument employed, with such a show of power, and such an appearance, but we mistake; if we had hearkened to God, and kept to our duty, the thing had been done, but it is sin that makes our troubles long, and salvation slow. And this is that which God himself complains of, and wishes it had been otherwise. Note, Therefore God would have us do our duty to him, that we may be qualified to receive favour from him. He therefore delights in our serving him, not because he is the better for it, but because we shall be.

PSALM LXXXII.

This psalm is calculated for the meridian of princes' courts, and courts of justice, not in Israel only, but in other nations; yet it was probably penned particularly for the use of the magistrates of Israel, the great Sanhedrim, and their other elders, who were in places of power, and perhaps by David himself at that time. This psalm is designed to make kings wise, and to instruct the judges of the earth, as ii. 10. to tell them their duty, as 2 Sam. xxiii. 3. and to tell them of their faults, as lvi. 1. We have here, I. The dignity of magistrates, and their dependence on God. II. The duty of magistrates, v. 3. 4. III. The degeneracy of bad magistrates, and the mischief they do, v. 2. 5. IV. Their doom read, v. 6. 7. V. The desire and prayer of all good people, that the kingdom of God may be set up more and more, v. 8. Though magistrates may most closely apply this psalm to themselves, yet we may any of us sing it with understanding, when we give glory to God in singing it, as presiding in all public affaires, not as judges over the people, but in the name of God, and ready to punish the most powerful in justice, and when we comfort ourselves with the belief of his present government, and with the hopes of his future judgment.

A psalm of Asaph.

1. GOD standeth in the congregation of the mighty: he judgeth among the gods. 2. How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Selah. 3. Defend the poor and fatherless: do justice to the afflicted and needy. 4. Deliver the poor and needy: rid them out of the hand of the wicked. 5. They know not, neither will they understand; they walk on in darkness: all the foundations of the earth are out of course.

We have here, 1. God's supreme presidency and power in all councils and courts, asserted and laid down, as a great truth necessary to be believed both by princes and subjects; (v. 1.) God stands, as chief Director, in the congregation of the mighty, the mighty One in council—for in the council of the prince, the supreme Magistrate, and he judges among the gods, the inferior magistrates; both the legislative and the executive power of princes is under his eye and his hand. Observe here, 1. The power and honour of magistrates, they are the mighty; they are so in authority, for the public good; it is a great power that they are intrusted with, and they ought to be mighty in wisdom and courage. They are, in the Holy testament, God's agents; and God is used for these subordinate governors, that is, under him, for the sovereign Ruler of the world. They are Elohim; angels are so called, both because they are great in power and might, and because God is pleased to make use of their service in the govern-
The pains told that it was as great an evil as any Solomon saw under the sun, when he observed the place of judgment, that iniquity was there, Ecc. iii. 16. Isa. v. 7. They not only accepted the persons of the rich, because they were rich, though that is bad enough, but (which is much worse) they accepted the persons of the wicked, because they were wicked; they not only countenanced them in their wickedness, but loved them the better for it, and fell in with their interests. Woe unto thee, O land, when thy judges are such as these!

2. What was the cause of this sin. They were told plainly enough that it was their office and duty to protect and deliver the poor, it was many a time given them in charge, yet they judge unjustly, for they know not, neither will they understand. They do not care to hear their duty, they will not take pains to study it, they have no desire to take things right; and if things wrong be done, it is often done by the persons of interest, not by reason or justice; a gift in secret blinds their eyes. They know not, because they will not understand; none so blind as those that will not see. They have baffled their own consciences, and so they walk on in darkness, not knowing or caring what they do or whither they go. They that walk on in darkness are walking on to everlasting darkness.

3. What were the consequences of this sin; All the foundations of the earth, or of the land, are out of order when justice is perverted, what good can be expected? The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved, as the psalmist speaks in a like case, Lxxv. 3. The miscarriages of public persons are public mischiefs.

6. I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the Most High: 7. But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes. 8. Arise, O God, judge the earth: for thou shalt inherit all nations.

We have here,

1. Earthly gods abased and brought down. v. 6.
2. The dignity of their character is acknowledged; (v. 6.) I have said, ye are gods. They have been honoured with the name and title of gods; God himself called them so in the statute against treasonable words; (Exod. xxii. 28.) Thou shalt not revile the gods. And if they have this style from the Fountain of honour, who can dispute it? But what is man, that he should be thus magnified? He called them gods, because unto them the word of God came, so our Saviour expounds it; (John x. 35.) they had a commission from God, and were delegated and appointed by him to be the shields of the earth, the conservators of the public peace, and revenue-givers to execute wrath upon those that disturb it, Rom. xii. 4. All of them are in this sense children of the most High. God has put some of his honour upon them, and employs them in his providential government of the world, as David made his sons chief rulers. Or, "Because I said, Ye are gods, ye have carried the honour further than was intended, and have imagined yourselves to be the children of the most High," as the king of Babylon, (Dan. iv. 25.) made himself to be god of the Babylonian empire, and the king of Tyre, (Ezek. xxviii. ii.) Thou hast set thy heart as the heart of God. It is a hard thing for men to have so much honour put upon them by the hand of God, and so much honour paid them, as ought to be by the children of men, and not to be proud of it and puffed up with it, and so to think of themselves above what is meet. But here follows a mortifying consideration; Ye shall die like men. This may be taken, either, (1.) As the punishment of bad magistrates, such as judged unjustly, and by their miserable rule. The origin of the word is of course; God will reckon with them, and will cut them off in the midst of their pomp and prosperity; they shall die like other wicked men, and fall like one of the heathen princes, and their being Israelites shall not secure them, any more than their being judges; or like one of the angels that sinned; or like one of the giants of the old world. Compare this with that which Elishu observed concerning the mighty oppressors in his time; (Job xxxiv. 26.) He striketh them as a parent strikes his children, and as the king of the world ordains. Let those that abuse their power, know that God will take both it and their lives from them; for wherein they deal proudly, he will show himself above them. Or, (2.) as the period of the glory of all magistrates in this world; let them not be puffed up with their honour, or neglect their work, but let the consideration of their mortality, be both mortifying to their pride, and quickening of their duty. It is no security for the public to ensure for immortality, ye shall die like men, like common men, and, like one of them, ye, O princes, shall fall. Note, Kings and princes, all the judges of the earth, though they are gods to us, are men to God, and shall die like men, and all their honour shall be laid in the dust. Mors secptra ligonibus requat—Death mingles sceptres with shades.

2. The God of heaven exalted and raised high. v. 8. The psalmist finds it requisite to reason with these cruel oppressors, they turned a deaf ear to all he said, and walked on in darkness, and therefore he looks up to God, appeals to him, and begs of him to take unto himself his great power; Arise, O God, judge the earth; and, when he prays that he would do it, he believes that he will do it; Thou shalt inherit all nations. This has respect, (1.) To the kingdom of providence; God governs the world, sets up and puts down whom he pleased; he inherits all nations, he robs the conquerors of their dominion over them, to dispose of them as a man does of his inheritance; this we are to believe, and to comfort ourselves with, that the earth is not given so much into the hands of the wicked, the wicked rulers, as we are tempted to think it is, Job xix. 24. But God has reserved the power to himself, and overrules them. In this faith we must pray, "Arise, O God, judge the earth, appear against those that judge unjustly; set up their eyes over all the nations, and be the Governor over them, i. 8.—xxxi. 28. Let the second coming of Christ set to rights all these disorders. There are two words with which we may comfort ourselves and one another, in reference to the mismanagements of power among men; one is, (Rev. xix. 6.) Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth; the other is, (Rev. xxi. 20.) Surely, I come quickly.

PSALM LXXXIII.

This psalm is the last of those that go under the name of Asaph. It is composed, as most of the others, by a publice account, with reference to the insults of the church’s enemies, who sought its ruin. Some think it was penned.
upon occasion of the threatening descent which was made upon the land of Judah, in Jeoshaphat's time, by the Moabites and Ammonites, those children of Lot here spoken of, (v. 8.) who were at the head of the alliance, and to whom all the other states had their auxiliaries. We have the story, 2 Chron. xx. 1. where it is said, The children of Moab and Ammon, and others besides them, invaded the land. Others think it was penned with reference to all the confederacies of the heathen nations against Israel, from first to last. The psalmist here makes an appeal and application, I. To God's knowledge, by a presentation of their designs and endeavours to destroy Israel, v. 1.-8. II. To God's justice and jealousy, both for his church, and for his own honour, by an earnest prayer for the defeat of their attempt, that the church might be preserved, the enemies humbled, and God glorified, v. 9. 18. This, in the singing of it, we may apply to the enemies of the gospel-church, all antichristian powers and factions, representing to God their confederacies against Christ and his kingdom, and rejoicing in the hope that all their projects will be baffled, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church.

A song or psalm of Asaph.

1. KEEP not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God. 2. For, 'Jo thine enemies do a tumult; and they that hate thee have lifted up the head. 3. They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thine hidden ones. 4. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. 5. For they have consulted together with one consent; they are confederate against thee: 6. The tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites: of Moab, and the Hagarenes 7. Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines, with the inhabitants of Tyre; 3. Assur also is joined with them: they have helped the children of Lot. Selah.

The Israel of God were now in danger and fear, and great distress; and yet their prayer is called, A song or psalm, for singing psalms is not unseasonable, no, not when the harps are hung upon the willow-trees.

I. The psalmist here begs of God to appear on the behalf of his injured threatened people; (v. 1.) "Keep not thou silence, O God, but give judgment for us against those that do us an apparent wrong." Thus Jeoshaphat prayed upon occasion of that invasion; (2 Chron. xx. 11.) Behold, how they reward us, to come to cast us out of thy possession. Sometimes God seems to connive at the unjust treatment which is given to his people; he keeps silence, as one that either did not observe it, or did not concern himself in it; he holds his peace, as if he would observe an exact neutralit, and let them fight it out; he is still, and gives not the enemies of his people any disturbance or opposition, but seem to sit by, as a man astonished, or as a mighty man that cannot save. Then he gives us leave to call upon him, as here, "Keep not thou silence, O Lord, speak to us by thy prophets, for our encouragement against our fears;" (as he did in reference to that invasion, 2 Chron. xx. 14, &c.) "Lord, speak for us by thy providence, and speak against our enemies special deliverance to us, and disappointment to them." God's speaking is his acting; for with him saving and doing are the same thing.

II. He here gives an account of the grand alliance of the neighbouring nations against Israel, which he begs of God to break, and blast the projects of.

Now observe here,

1. Against whom this confederacy is formed; it is against the Israel of God, and so, in effect, against the God of Israel. Thus the psalmist takes care to interest God in their cause, not doubting but that, if it appeared that they were for God, God would make it to appear that he was for them, and then they might know that their enemies were out of their power who then could be against them? "Lord," says he, "they are thine enemies, and they hate thee." All wicked people are God's enemies, (the carnal mind is enmity against God,) but especially wicked persecutors; they hated the religious worshippers of God, because they hated God's holy religion, and the worship of him. This was that which made God's people so zealous against them—that they fought against them; "They are confederate against thee," v. 5. Were our interest only concerned, we could the better bear it, but when God himself is struck at, it is time to cry, Help, Lord! Keep not thou silence, O God. He proves that they are confederate against God, for they are so against the people of God, who are near and dear to him, his son, his first-born, his portion, and the lot of his inheritance; he may truly be said to fight against me, this confederacy for the destruction of his church, to destroy my family, and ruin my estate. "Lord," says the psalmist, "they are thy enemies, for they consult against thy hidden ones." Note, God's people are his hidden ones; hidden, (1.) In respect of secrecy; their life is hid with Christ in God; the world knows them not; if they knew them, they would not hate them as they do. (2.) In respect of safety; God takes them under his special protection, hides them in the hollow of his hand; and yet, in defiance of God and his power, and promise to secure his people, they will consult, and ruin them, and cast them down from their excellency, (lxxi. 4.) and so make a prey of those whom the Lord has set apart for himself; iv. 3. They resolve to destroy those whom God resolves to preserve.

2. How this confederacy is managed; the Devil is at the bottom of it, and therefore it is carried on, (1.) With a great deal of heat and violence; Thine enemies make a tumult together, their tumultuous cries reach the heavens; v. 2. The nations are angry, Rev. xi. 18. They are noisy in their clamours against the people, whom they hope to run down with their loud calumnies; this comes in as a reason why God should not keep silence: "The enemies talk big, and talk much; Lord, let them not talk all, but do thou speak to them in thy wrath," ii. 5. (2.) With a great deal of pride and insolence; They have lifted up the head in confidence of their success, they are so elevated, as if they could overtop the Most High, and overpower the Almighty. (3.) With a great deal of art and policy; They have taken crafty counsel, v. 3. The subtility of the old serpent appears in their management, and they contrive, by all possible means, though ever so base, ever so bad, to gain their point. They are profound to make slaughter. (Hos. v. 2.) as if they could cut off Infinite Wisdom. (4.) With a great deal of uniomity; whatever separate clashing interest they have among themselves, against the people of God they consult with one consent, (v. 5.) nor is Satan's kingdom divided against itself. To push on this unholy war, they lay their heads together, and their horns, and their hearts too. "Fas est et ab hoste docteri—Even an enemy may instruct. Do the enemies of the church act with one consent to destroy it? Are the kings of the earth of one mind to give their power and honour to the beast? And shall not the church's friends be unanimous in serving her interests? If Herod and Pilate are made friends, that they may join in crucifying Christ, surely Paul and Barnabas, Paul and Peter, will soon be made friends, that they may join in preaching Christ.

3. What it is that is aimed at in this confederacy; they consult not like the Gibeonites to make a league with Israel, that they might strengthen themselves by such a desirable alliance, which had been their wisdom: they consult, not only to the wings of Israel, to recover their new conquests, and check the progress of their victorious arms; not only to keep the balance even between them and Israel, and to prevent their power from growing exertivant; this will not serve; it is no less than the utter ruin and extirpation of Israel that they design; (v. 4.) "Come, let us cut them off from being a nation, as they cut off the seven nations of Canaan; let us leave them neither root nor branch, but lay their country so perfectly waste, that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance, no not in history;" for with them they would destroy their Bibles, and burn all their records. Such is the enmity of the serpent's seed against the seed of the woman. It is the secret wish of wicked men, that the church of God might not have a being in the world, that there might be no such thing as religion among mankind; having banished the light of God's world, they would gladily see the whole earth as well rid of it; all its laws and ordinances abolished, all its restraints and obligations shaken off, and all that preach, profess, or practise it, cut off; this they would bring it to, if it were in their power; but he that sits in heaven shall laugh at them.

4. Who they are that are drawn into this confederacy; the nations that entered into this alliance are here mentioned; (v. 6.-8.) the Edomites and Ishmaelites, both descendants from Abraham, lead the van, for the apostates from the church have been its most bitter and spiteful enemies, witness Julian. These were allied to Israel in blood, and yet in alliance against Israel. There are no bonds of nature so strong, but the spirit of persecution has broken through them; The brother shall betray the brother to death. Moab and Ammon were the children of righteous Lot; but are incestuous, so a descendant. The Philistines were long a thorn in Israel's side, and very vexatious; how the inhabitants of Tyre, who, in David's time, were Israel's firm allies, come in among their enemies, I know not, but that Assur, that is, the Assyrian, also is joined with them, is not strange, or that (as the word is) they were an arm to the children of Lot. See how numerous the enemies of God's church have always been; Lord, how are they increased that trouble it! God's heritage was a speckled bird, all the birds round about were against her; (Jer. xii. 9.) which highly magnifies the power of God in preserving to himself a church in the world, in despite of the combined force of earth and hell.

9. Do unto them as unto the Midianites; as to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook of Kison: 10. Which perished at En-dor; they became as dung for the earth. 11. Make their nobles like Oreb and like Zeeb; yea, all their princes as Zebah and Zalmunna: 12. Who said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession. 13. O my God, make them like a wheel; as the stubble before the wind. 14. As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame seteth the mountains on fire, 15. So persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm. 16. Fill their faces with shame; that they may seek thy name, O Lord. 17. Let them be confounded and troubled for ever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish: 18. That men may know that thou, whose name alone is Jehovah, art the Most High over all the earth.

The psalmist here, in the name of the church, prays for the destruction of these confederate forces, and, in God's name, foretells it: for this prayer, that it might be so, amounts to a prophecy that it shall be so; and this prophecy reaches to all the enemies of the gospel-church; whoever they be that oppose the kingdom of Christ, here they may read their doom.

The prayer is, in short, that these enemies, who were confederate against Israel, might be defeated in all their attempts, and that they might prove their own ruin, and so God's Israel might be preserved and perpetuated. Now this is here illustrated, 1. By some precedents; let that be their punishment which has been the fate of others who have combined with them. 2. The defeat and desolation of former confederations may be pleaded in prayer to God, and improved for the encouragement of our own faith and hope; because God is the same still that ever he was, the same to his people, and the same against his and their enemies; with him is no variableness. 1. He prays that their armies might be destroyed as the armies of former enemies had been; (v. 9, 10.) Do to them as to the Midianites; let them be routed, and routed as the Midianites were, more than by Gideon's 300 men. Do to them as to the army under the command of Sisera, who was general under Jabin king of Canaan, which God discomfitted (Judg. iv. 15.) at the brook Kishon, near to which was Endor; they became as dung on the earth, their dead bodies were thrown like dung, laid in heaps, or spread, to fertilize the ground; they were trodden to dust by Barak's small, but victorious, army; and this was fittingly made a precedent here, because Deborah made it so to aftertimes when it was fresch; (Judg. v. 31.) So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord, that is, So they shall perish. 2. He prays that their leaders might be destroyed as they had been formerly; the common people would not have been so mischievous, if their princes had not set them on, and therefore they are particularly prayed against, v. 11, 12. Observe, (1.) What their malice was against the Israel of God; they said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession, (v. 12.) the pleasant places of God, so the word is, by which we may understand the land of Canaan, which was a pleasant land, and was Emmanuel's land; or, the temple, which was indeed God's pleasant place; (Isa. lxiv. 11.) or, (as Dr. Hammond suggests,) the pleading of sins, which these Arabians, who traded in cattle, did, in a particular manner, seek after. The princes and nobles aimed to enrich themselves by this war; and their arms must be made as dung for the earth, to serve their covetousness and their ambition. (2.) What their lot should be; they shall be made like Oreb and Zeeb, two princes of the Midianites, who, when their forces were routed, were taken in their flight by the Ephraimites, and slain, Zeeb and Zalmunna, whom Gideon himself slew, Judg. viii. 21. "Let these enemies of ours be made as easy a prey to us, as they were to the conquerors then." We may not prescribe to God, but we may pray to God that he will deal with the enemies of his church in our days, as he did with those in the days of our fathers.

II. He illustrates it by some similitudes, and prays,

1. That God would make them like a wheel, (v. 13.) that they might be in continual motion, unquiet, unsettled, and giddy, in all their counsels and resolves; that they might roll down easily and speedily to their own ruin. Or, as some think, that they might be broken by the judgments of God, as the wheel is broken, and so defeated by God, which was then used in threshing. Thus, when a wise king scattereth the wicked, he is said to bring the wheel over them, Prov. xx. 26. They that trust in God have their hearts fixed; they that fight against him are unfixed, like a wheel.

2. That they might be chased as stubble, or chaff, before the fierce wind. The wheel, though it continually turn round, is fixed on its own axis; but let them have no fixation but the light stubble; which has, which the wind hurries away, and nobody desires to save it, but is willing it should go, Ps. i. 4. Thus shall the wicked be driven away in his wickedness, and chased out of the world.

3. That they might be consumed, as wood by the fire, or as briars and thorns, as fern or furze, upon the mountains, by the flames, v. 14. When the stubble is dry, it will consume itself; but at last, under some hedge, in some ditch or other, he prays that they might not only be driven away as stubble, but burnt as stubble. And this will be the end of wicked men, (Heb. vi. 8.) and particularly of all the enemies of God's church. The redemption of these comparisons we have; (v. 15.) So persecute them with thy temppest, persecute them to their utter ruin, and make them afraid with thy storm. See how sinners are made miserable; the storm of God's wrath raises terrors in their own hearts, and so they are made completely miserable.

God can deal with the proudest and most daring sinner that has bid defiance to his justice, and can make him afraid as a grasshopper. It is the torment of devils, that they tremble.

III. He illustrates it by the good consequences of their confusion, v. 16-18. He prays here that God, having filled their hearts with terror, would thereby fill their faces with shame, that their persons might be ashamed of their enmity to the people of God, (Isa. xxxvi. 11.) ashamed of their folly in acting both against Omnipotence itself, and their own true interest. They did what they could to put God's people to shame, but the shame will, at length, return upon themselves.

Now, 1. The beginning of this shame might be a means of their conversion: "Let their limbs work and baffled in their attempts, that they may seek thy name, O Lord. Let them be put to a stand, that they may have both leisure and reason to pause a little, and consider who it is that they are fighting against, and what an unequal match they are for him, and may, therefore, humble and submit themselves, and desire conditions of peace. Let them be made to fear thy name, and perhaps that will bring them to seek thy name." Note, That which we should earnestly desire and beg of God for our enemies and persecutors, is, that God would bring them to repentance, and we should desire their abasement in order to this; no other confusion to them, than what may be a step toward their conversion.

2. If it did not prove a means of their conversion, the perfecting of it would redound greatly to the honour of God; if they will not be ashamed and repent, let them be put to shame and perish; if they will not be troubled and burned, which would soon put an end to all their trouble, a happy end, let them be troubled for ever, and never have peace; this will be for God's glory; (v. 18.) that other men may know and own, if they themselves will not, that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH, (that incomunicable, though not ineffable, name,) art the Most High over all the earth. God's triumphs over his and his church's enemies, will be incontestable proofs, (1.) That he is, according to his name JEHOVAH, a self-existent, self-sufficient, being, that has all power and perfection in himself. (2.) That he is the most high God, sovereign Lord of all, above all gods, above all kings, above all that exalt themselves, and pretend to be high. (3.) That he is so, not only over the land of Israel, but over all the earth, even those nations of the earth that do not know him, or own him, for his kingdom rules over all. These are great and unquestionable truths, but men will hardly be persuaded to know and believe them; therefore the psalmist prays that the destruction of some might be the conviction of others. The final ruin of all God's enemies, in the last day, will be the effectual proof of this, before angels and men; when the everlasting shame and contempt to which sinners shall rise, (Dan. xii. 2.) shall redound to the everlasting honour and praise of that God to whom vengeance belongs.

PSALMS, LXXXIV.

Though David's name be not in the title of this psalm, yet we have reason to think he was the penman of it, because it becribes the state of his excellent spirit, and is so like to the 63d psalm, which he composed before it. It is supposed that David penned this psalm when he was forced, by Absalom's rebellion, to quit his city, which he lamented his absence from, not so much because it was the royal palace, as because it was his seat of worship. This psalm, which contains the pious breathings of a gracious soul after God, and communion with him. Though it be not entitled, yet it may fitly be looked upon, as a psalm or song for the sabbath-day, the day of our solemn assemblies. The psalmist here with great devotion expresses his affection, I. To the ordinances of God; his value for them, (v. 1.) his desire toward them, (v. 2, 3.) his conviction of the happiness of those that did enjoy them, (v. 4, 7.) and his placing of his hopes and happiness so very much in the enjoyment of them, v. 10. II. To the God of the ordinances: his desire toward him, (v. 8, 9.) his faith in him, (v. 11.) and his conviction of the happiness of those that put their confidence in him, v. 12. In singing this psalm, we should have the same devout affections working toward God, that David had, and then the singing of it will be very pleasant.

To the chief musician upon Gittith. A psalm for the sons of Korah.

1. HOW amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! 2. My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth, for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God. 3. Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosi, my King, and my God. 4. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house: they will be still praising thee. Selah. 5. Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are the ways of them. 6. Who passing through the valley of Baca, make it a well: the rain also filleth the pools. 7. They go from strength to strength; every one of them in Zion appeareth before God.

The psalmist here, being by force restrained from waiting upon God in public ordinances, by the want of them is brought under a more sensible conviction than ever of the worth of them. Observe, I. The wonderful beauty he saw in holy institu ts; (v. 1.) How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! Some think that he here calls God the Lord of hosts, that is, in a special manner of the angels, the heavenly hosts, because of the presence of the angels in God's sanctuary; they attended the Shechinah, and were (as some think) signified by the 473 tabernacle. God's house was a building, and his temple is it: it is spoken of as more than one, (thy tabernacles,) because there were divers courts in which they were accommodated, and because the tabernacle itself consisted of a holy place, and a most holy. How amiable are these! How lovely is the sanctuary in the eyes of all that are truly sanctified! Gracious souls see a wonderful, an inexpressible, beauty in holiness, and in holy work. A tabernacle was a mean habitation, but, the distinction of external circumstances makes holy ordinances not at all the less amiable, for the beauty of holiness is spiritual, and their glory is within.

II. The longing desire he had to return to the enjoyment of public ordinances, or rather of God in them, v. 2. It was an entire desire; body, soul, and spirit, concurred in it, he was not conscious to himself of any rising thought to the contrary; it was an intense desire; it was like the desire of the ambti-hermeneut of a hare, and of a more proper hare, that he is seen to be a hare by his eyes, he is taken into his place in God's courts, and almost impatient of delay. Yet it was not so much the courts of the Lord that he coveted, but he cried out, in prayer, for the living God himself. Oh that I might know him, and be again taken into communion with him! 1 John i. 3. Ordinances are empty things, if we meet not with God in the ordinances.

III. His gratitude, the happiness of the little birds that made their nests in the buildings that were adjoining to God's altars, v. 3. This is an elegant and surprising expression of his affection to God's altars; The sparrow has found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself. These little birds, by the instinct and direction of nature, provide habitations for themselves in houses, as other birds do in the woods, both for their own repose, and in which to lay their young; some such David supposes there were in the buildings for God's courts of God's house, and wishes himself with them. He would rather live in a bird's nest high God's altars, than in a palace at a distance from them. He sometimes wished for the wings of a dove, on which to fly into the wilderness; (iv. 6.) here for the wings of a sparrow, that he might fly undiscovered into God's courts; and, though to watch as a sparrow alone upon the house-top, is the description of a very melancholy state and spirit, (cii. 7.) yet David would be glad to trade it for his lot, provided he might be near God's altars. It is better to be serving God in solitude, than serving sin with a multitude. The word for a sparrow signifies any little bird, and (if I may offer a conjecture) perhaps, when, in David's time, music was introduced so much into the sacred service, both vocal and instrumental, to complete the harmony, they had singing-birds in cages hang about the court, and sang while Zion's ministers took notice of to the glory of God, civ. 12.) and David envies the happiness of these, and would gladly change places with them. Observe, David envies the happiness not of those birds that flew over the altars, and had only a transient view of God's courts, but of those that had nests for them-cells there; David will not think it enough to sojourn in God's house as a way-faring man that turns as he pleases, (iv. 6.) but he will have his nest, and his repose, (cii. 7.) and that near God, in his house, here he will dwell. And he takes notice that these birds not only have nests for themselves there, but that there they lay their young; for those who have a place in God's courts themselves, cannot but desire that their children also may have in God's house, and within his walls, a place and a name, that they may feed their kids beside the shepherds' tents. Some give another sense of this verse; "Lord, by thy providence thou hast furnished the birds with nests and resting-places, agreeable to their nature, and to them they have free recourse, but that altar, which is my nest, my resting-place, of which an amorous bird was of her nest, I cannot have access to. Lord, wilt thou provide better for thy birds than for thy babes? As a bird that wanders from her nest, so am I, now that I wander from the place of God's altars, for that is my place; (Prov. xxvi. 8.) I shall never be easy till I return to my place again." Note, Their souls are at home, at rest, in God, cannot but desire a settlement near his ordinances. Those who are in the courts of God's house, have the other eye, as well as we, must in all our attendance on God, have an eye both to the satisfaction and to the intercession of Christ. And, lastly, Observe how he eyes God in this address; Thou art the Lord of hosts, my King, and my God. Where should a poor dis tressed subject seek for protection but with his king? There should we hope for a happy progress in God's house, for the King of kings is there, and all his attendants, that serve him. His house is furnished with all things necessary for the work, and furnished to them of every want as we desire, he takes them by infinite grace. His house is furnished with infinite grace. There is that in the house of God, which will enable those that desire it to keep a good table, because they have good work; (Prov. xxxi. 6.) they will be still praising thee; and if there be a heaven upon earth, it is in praising God, in continually praising him. Apply this to his house above; blessed are they that dwell there, angels and glorified saints, for they rest not day nor night from praising God. Let us therefore spend as much of our time as may be in that blessed work in which we hope to spend a joyful eternity.

IV. His acknowledgment of the happiness both of the ministers and of the people that had liberty of attendance on God's altars; "Blessed are they; oh when shall I return to the enjoyment of that blessedness?

1. Blessed are the ministers; the priests and Levites, who have their residence about the tabernacle, and are, in their courses, employed in the service of it; (v. 4.) Blessed are they that dwell in thy house, that are at home there, and whose business lies there. He is so far from pitying them as confined to a constant attendance, and obliged to perpetual serious ness, that he would sooner envy them than the greatest princes in the world. There are those that bless the covetous, but he blesses the religious. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house; (not because they have good wages, a part of every sacrifice for themselves, which would enable them to keep a good table, because they have good work;) they will be still praising thee; and if there be a heaven upon earth, it is in praising God, in continually praising him. Apply this to his house above; blessed are they that dwell there, angels and glorified saints, for they rest not day nor night from praising God. Let us therefore spend as much of our time as may be in that blessed work in which we hope to spend a joyful eternity.

2. Blessed are the people, the inhabitants of the country, who, though they do not constantly dwell in God's house, as the priests do, yet have liberty of access to it, at the times appointed for their solemn feasts, the three great feasts, at which all the males were obliged to give their attendance; Deut. xvi. 16. David was so far from receiving this for a heavy task, that he doth not only commend it to those that are there, but pronounces blessed those that shall thus spend their time, that he envies the happiness of those who might thus attend, v. 5.-7.

Those whom he pronounces blessed, are here described; (1.) They are such as act in religion from a rooted principle of dependence upon God, and devotedness to him; Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee, who makes thee his Strength, and strongly stays himself upon thee; (cii. 7.) he who is thus fortified in his strength, which he runs for safety, Prov. xviii. 10. Happy is the man whose hope is in the Lord his God, Ps. x. 4.—cxliv. 5. Those are truly happy, who go forth, and go on, in the exercises of religion, not in their own strength, (for then the work is sure to miscarry,) but in the strength of the grace of Jesus Christ, from whom all our sufficiency is. David wished to return to God's tabernacles again, that he might strengthen himself in the Lord, for fear and suffering.

(2.) They are such as have a love for holy ordinances, in whose heart are the ways of them, that is, who, having placed their happiness in God as their End, rejoice in all the ways that lead to him, all those means by which their graces are strengthened, and their communion with him kept up. They not only walk in these ways, but they have them in their hearts, they lay them near their hearts; no pleasure or delight, no pleasure or delight, lies nearer than this. Note, Those who have the new Jerusalem in their eye, must have the ways that lead to it in their heart, must mind them, their eyes must look straight forward in them, must ponder the paths of them, must keep close to them, and be afraid of turning aside to the right hand or to the left. If we make God's promise our strength, we must make God's word our rule, and walk by it.

(3.) They are such as will break through difficulties and discouragements, in waiting upon God in holy ordinances, v. 6. When they come up out of the country to worship at the feasts, their way lies through many a dry and sandy valley, (so some,) in which they are ready to perish for thirst; but, to guard against that inconveniency, they dig little pits to receive and keep the rain water, which is ready to fall, and so profit by their reception. When they make the pools, the rain of heaven fills them; if we be ready to receive the grace of God, that grace shall not be wanting to us, but shall be sufficient for us at all times; their way lay through many a weeping valley, so Baca signifies, that is, as others understand it, many watery valleys, which, in wet weather, when the rain filled the pools, either through the rising of the waters, or through the dryness of the way, were impassable; but, by draining and trenching them, they made them passable, and thus prepared for the benefit of those who went up to Jerusalem. Care should be taken to keep those roads in repair that lead to church, as well as those that lead to market. But all this is intended to show, [1.] That they had a good will to the journey. When they were to attend the solemn feasts at Jerusalem, they would not be kept back by bad weather, or bad ways, nor make their journey only for the sake of the delights of the way, but, by mending the roads, and so preparing for the way of duty, and for the reception of those who went up to Jerusalem, and he that observes the wind shall not sow, [2.] That they made the best of the way to Zion, contrived and took pains to mend it where it was bad, and bore, as well as they could, the inconveniences that could not be removed. Our way to heaven lies through a valley of Baca, but even that way may be made a well, if we make a due improvement of the comforts God has provided for the pilgrims to the heavenly city.

(4.) They are such as are still pressing forward till they come to their journey's end, at length, and do not take up short of it; (v. 7.) They go from strength to strength; their company increases by the accession of more out of every town they pass through, till they become very numerous; those that were near said till those that were further off called on them and said, Look unto me, and let us go to the house of the Lord; (cxxii. 1, 2.) that they might go together in a body, in token of their mutual love. Or, the particular persons, instead of being fatigued with the tediousness of their journey, and the difficulties they met with, the nearer they came to Jerusalem, were the more lively and cheerful, and so went stronger and stronger, Job xvii. 9. Thus it is promised that they that wait on the Lord, shall renew their strength, Isa. xl. 31. Even where they are weak, there they are strong. They go from virtue to virtue; (so some;) it is the same word that is used for the virtuous woman; they that press forward in their Christian course, shall find God adding grace to their graces, John i. 16. They shall be changed from glory to glory, 2 Cor. iii. 18, from one degree of glorious grace to another; till, at length, every one of them appear before God in Zion, to give glory to him, and receive blessings from him. Note, They who grow in grace, shall, at last, be perfect in glory. The Chaldee reads it, They go from the house of the sanctuary to the house of doctrine; and the pains which they have taken about the law shall appear before God, whose majesty dwells in Zion. We must go from one duty to another; from prayer to that word, from practising what we have learned to learn more; which, if we do, the benefit of it will appear, to God's glory, and our own everlasting comfort.

8. O Lord of hosts, hear my prayer: give ear, O God of Jacob. Selah. 9. Behold, O God, our shield, and look upon the face of thine anointed. 10. For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. 11. For the Lord God is a sun and shield: the Lord will give grace and glory: no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. 12. O Lord of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee.

I. The psalmist prays for audience and acceptance with God, not mentioning particularly what he desired God would do for him; he needed to say no more, when he had professed such an affectionate desire to attend for the ordinances of God, which now he was restrained and besought from all his desire was, in that profession, plainly before God, and his longing, his groaning, were not hid from him; therefore he prays, (v. 8, 9.) only that God would hear his prayer, and give ear, that he would behold his condition, behold his good affection, and look upon his face, which way it was set, and how his countenance discovered the longing desire he had toward God's courts; he calls himself (as many think) God's servant, or God's anointed, and anointed by God, and anointed for him. In this petition, 1. He has an eye to God, under several of his glorious titles. As the Lord God of hosts, who has all the creatures at his command, and therefore has all power both in heaven and earth; as the God of Jacob, a God in covenant with his own people, a God who never said to the praying seed of Jacob, Seek ye me, in vain; and as God our Shield, who takes his people under special protection, pursuant to his covenant with Abraham his father, (Gen. xv. 1.) Fear not, Abraham, I am thy Shield. When David could not be hid in the secret of God's tabernacle, (Ps. xxxvii. 5.) being at a distance from it, yet he hoped to find God his shield ready to him, wherever he was. 2. He has an eye to the Mediator; for of him I rather understand those words, Look upon the face of thy Messiah, thine Anointed One; for of his anointing David speaks strongly. In all our addresses to God, we must desire that he would look upon the face of Christ, accept us for his sake, and be well-pleased with us in him; we must look with an eye of faith, and then God will have an eye of favour look upon the face of the Anointed, who does show his face, when we, without him, dare not show ours.

II. He pleads his love to God's ordinances, and his dependence upon God himself.

1. God's courts were his choice, v. 10. A very great regard he had for holy ordinances, he valued them above any thing else, and he expresses his value for them. (1.) By preferring the time of God's worship before all other time; A day spent in thy courts, in attending on the services of religion, wholly abstracted from all secular affairs, is better than a thousand, not a thousand in thy courts, but any where else in this world, though in the midst of all the delights of the children of men. Better than a thousand, he does not say days, you may supply it with years, with ages, if you will, and yet David will set his hand to it. "A day in thy courts, a sabbath-day, a holy-day, a fast-day, though but one day, would be very welcome to me; nay," (as some of the rabbins paraphrase it,) "though I were to die for it the next day, yet that would be more sweet than years spent in the business and pleasure of this world. One of these days shall, with its pleasure, chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, to shame, as not worthy to be compared." (2.) By preferring the place of worship before any other place; and to be a door-keeper, rather be in the meanest place and office, in the house of my God, than dwell in state, as master, in the tents of wickedness. Observe, He calls even the tabernacle a house, for the presence of God in it made even those curios more stately than a palace, and more strong than a castle. It is the house of my God; the covenant-interest he had in God as his God, was the sweet string on which he laid his hand; this was the covenant, I, upon good ground, call God theirs, delight in the courts of his house. I would rather be a porter in God's house, than a prince in those tents where wickedness reigns; rather lie at the threshold, so the word is; that was the beggar's place, Acts iii. 2. "No matter," (says David,) "let that be my place rather than none." The Pharisees loved synagogues well enough, provided they might have the uppermost seats there, (Matthew xxi. 23.) but that many David is not solicitous about that, if he may but be admitted to the threshold, he will say, Master, it is good to be here. Some read it, I would rather be fixed to a post in the house of my God, than live at liberty in the tents of wickedness, alluding to the law concerning servants, who, if they would not go out free, were to have their ear bored to the door-post, Exod. xxii. 5, 6. David loved his house, and preferred it to all else, that was desired to be tied to this service for ever, to be more free to it, but never to go out free from it, preferring bonds to duty far before the greatest liberty to sin. Such a superlative delight have holy hearts in holy duties; no satisfaction in their account comparable to that in communion with God.

2. God himself was his Hope, and Joy, and all. Therefore he loved the house of his God, because his expectation was from his God, and there he used to communicate his. (1.) What God is, and will be, to his people. The Lord God is a Sun and Shield; we are here in darkness, but if God be our God, he will be to us a Sun, to enlighten and enliven us, to guide and direct us; we are here in danger, but he will be to us a Shield, to secure us from the fiery darts that fly thick about us; with his favour he will compass us as with a shield. Let us therefore always walk in the light of the Lord, and never throw ourselves out of his protection, and we shall find him a Sun to supply us with all good, and a Shield to shelter us from all evil. (2.) What he does, and will, bestow upon them; The Lord will give grace and glory. Grace signifies both the good will of God towards us, and the good work of God in us; glory signifies both the honour which he now puts upon us, in giving us the adoption of sons, and that which he has prepared for us in the inheritance of sons. God will give them grace in this world as a preparation for glory, and glory in the other world as the perfection of grace; both are God's gift, his free gift. And as, on the one hand, wherever God gives grace, he will give glory, (for grace is glory begun, and is an earnest of it,) so, on the other hand, he will give glory hereafter to none to whom he does not give grace now, or who receive his grace in vain. And if God will give grace and glory, which are the two great things that concur to make us happy in both worlds, we may be sure that no good thing will be withheld from them that walk uprightly. (3.) It is the character of all good people, that they walk uprightly, that they worship God in spirit and in truth, and have their conversation in the world in simplicity and godly sincerity; and such may be sure that God will withhold no good thing from them, that is requisite to their comfortable passage through this world; make sure grace and glory and other things shall be added; this is a comprehensive promise, and is such an assurance of the present comfort of the saints, that, whatever they desire and think they need, they may be sure, that, either Infinite Wisdom sees it is not good for them, or Infinite Goodness will give it them in due time. Let it be our care to walk uprightly, and then let us trust God to give us every thing that is good for us.

Lastly, He pronounces them blessed, who put their confidence in God, as he did, v. 12. They are blessed, who have the liberty of ordinances, and the privilege of God's house. But though we should be debarred from being there as we would be, therefore debarred from blessedness, if we trust in God. If we cannot go to the house of the Lord, we may go by faith to the Lord of the house, and in him we shall be happy, and may be easy.

PSALM LXXXV.

Interpreters are generally of opinion that this psalm was penned after the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, when they still remained under some tokens of God's displeasure, which they here pray for the removal of. And nothing appears to the contrary, but that it might be penned then, as well as Ps. cxxxvii. They are the public interests that lie near the psalmist's heart here, and the psalm is penned for the great congregation. The church was here in a deluge; above, there were clouds, below were waves, everything was dark and dismal; the church is like Noah in the ark, between life and death, between hope and fear; being so, I. Here is the dove sent forth in prayer. The petitions here, against sin and wrath, (v. 4.) and for mercy and grace, v. 7. The pleas are taken from former favours, (v. 1., 3.) and present distresses, v. 5, 6. II. Here is the dove returning with an olive-branch of peace, and good tidings, the psalmist returns his benefactor, (v. 8.) and then recounts the favours to God's Israel, which, by the spirit of prophecy, he gave assurance of to others, and, by the spirit of faith, he took the assurance of to himself, v. 9., 13. III. Here, in this psalm, we may be assisted in our prayers to God both for his church in general, and for the land of our nativity in particular. The former part will be of use to direct our desires; the latter to encourage our faith and hope in those prayers.

To the chief musician. A psalm for the sons of Korah.

1. LORD, thou hast been favourable unto thy land: thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob. 2. Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people; thou hast covered all their sin. Selah. 3. Thou hast taken away all thy wrath: thou hast turned thyself from the fierceness of thine anger. 4. Turn us, O God of our salvation, and cause thine anger toward us to cease. 5. Wilt thou be angry with us for ever? wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations? 6. Wilt thou not revive us again, that thy people may re-joyce in thee? 7. Show us thy mercy, O Lord, and grant us thy salvation.

The church, in affliction and distress, is here, by direction from God, making her application to God; so kindly he is pleased, to give relief to the poor and afflicted. The distressed he sets upon their knees, and hearkens to their prayers. He consults with his Spirit in the heart, and in the heart, he indites their petitions, and puts words into their mouths. The people of God, in a very low and weak condition, are here taught how to address themselves to God.

1. They are to acknowledge with thankfulness the great things God had done for them; (v. 1-3.) "Thou hast done so, and so for us and our fathers." Not only the people, but all the privileges, which would not drown the remembrance of former mercies; but even then when we are brought very low, we must call to remembrance past experiences of God's goodness, which we must take notice of, with thankfulness, to his praise. They speak of it here with pleasure, 1. That God had showed himself propitious to their land, and had smiled upon it as his own; "Thou hast clothed with favour thy land, as thine, with distinguishing favours." Note, The God of all grace is the spring-head of all good, and the fountain of happiness, to nations, as well as to particular persons. It was by the favour of God that Israel got, and kept possession of, Canaan; (xlv. 3.) and if he had not continued very favourable to them, they had been ruined a many time. 2. That he had rescued them out of the hands of their enemies, and restored them to their liberty; "Thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob, and settled those converts in their own land again, that had been driven out, and were strangers in a strange land, prisoners in the land of their oppressors." The captivity of Jacob, though it may continue long, will be brought back in due time. 3. That he had not dealt with them according to the desert of their provocation; (v. 2.) "Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people, and not punished them as in justice thou mightest." Thou hast covered all their sin." When God forgives sin, he covers it; and when he covers the sin of his people, he covers it all. The bringing back of their captivity was then an instance of God's favour to them, when it was accompanied with the pardon of their iniquity. 4. That he had not continued his anger against them so far, and so long, as they had reason to fear; (v. 3.) "Having covered all their sin, thou hast taken away all thy wrath against them;" God's anger ceases; God is pacified, if we are purged. See what the pardon of sin is; "Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people, that is, "Thou hast turned thine anger from waxing hot, so as to consume us in the flame of it. In compassion to us, thou hast not stirred up all thy wrath; but, when an intercessor has stood before thee in the gap, thou hast turned thine anger." II. They pray to God for grace and mercy, in reference to their present distress; this is inferred from the former; "Thou hast done well for our fathers; do well for us, for we are the children of the same covenant. 1. They pray for converting grace; "Turn us, O God of our salvation, in order to the turning of our captivity; turn us from iniquity; turn us to thyself, and to our duty; turn us, and we shall be turned. All those whom God will save will turn, and will turn to the good; there is no salvation. 2. They pray for the removal of the tokens of God's displeasure which they were under; "Cause thine anger towards us to cease, as thou didst many a time a cause to cease in the days of our fathers, when thou didst take away thy wrath from them." Observe the method, "First turn us to thee, and then cause thine anger to turn from us." When we are reconciled to God, then, and not till then, we may expect the comfort of his being reconciled to us. 3. They pray for the manifestation of God's good will to them; (v. 7.) "Show us thy mercy, O Lord; show thyself merciful to us: not only have mercy on us, but let us have the comfortable evidences of that mercy; let us know that thou hast mercy on us, and mercy in store for us." 4. They pray that God would, graciously to them, and gloriously to himself, appear on their behalf; "Grant us thy salvation: grant it by thy promise, and then, no doubt, thou wilt work it by thy providence." Now, The vessels of God's mercy are the heirs of his salvation; he shows mercy to these to whom he grants salvation; for salvation is of mere mercy.

III. They are taught humbly to expostulate with God concerning their present troubles, v. 5, 6. Where observe, 1. What they dread and deprecate; "Wilt thou be angry with us for ever? We are undone if thou art, but we hope thou wilt not. Wilt thou draw out thine anger unto all generations? No; that art gracious, slow to anger, and swift to show mercy, and wilt not contend for ever. Thou wast not angry with our fathers for ever, but didst soon turn thyself from the fierceness of thy wrath; why then wilt thou be angry with us for ever? Are not thy mercies and compassions as plentiful and powerful as ever they were? Impenitent sinners will be angry with for ever; for, what is hell but the wrath of God drawn out unto endless generations? But shall a bowstring be drawn so long? But wilt thou be angry with us for ever? 2. What they desire and hope for; "Wilt thou not revive us again; (v. 6.) revive us with comforts spoken to us, revive us with deliveries wrought for us? Thou hast been favourable to thy land formerly, and that revived it; wilt thou not again be favourable, and so revive it again?" God had granted to the children of the captivity some reviving in their bondage, Ezra ix. 8. Their return out of Babylon was as life from the dead. Ezek. xi. 11, 12. Now, Lord, (say they,) wilt thou not revive us again, and put thy hand again the second time to gather us in? Isa. xi. 11. Ps. cxxvi. i, 4. Revive thy work in the midst of the years, Hab. iii. 2. "Re..." (1.) "That thy people may rejoice; and so we shall have the comfort of it," Ps. xiv. 7. Give them life, that they may have joy. (2.) "That they may rejoice in thee; and so thou wilt have the glory of it." If God be the Fountain of all our mercies, he must be the Centre of all our joys.

8. I will hear what God the Lord will speak: for he will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints: but let them not turn again to folly. 9. Surely his salvation is nigh them that fear him; that glory may dwell in our land. 10. Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other. 11. Truth shall spring out of the earth; and righteousness shall look down from heaven. 12. Yea, the Lord shall give that which is good: and our land shall yield her increase. 13. Righteousness shall go before him, and shall set us in the way of his steps.

We have here an answer to the prayers and ex postulations in the foregoing verses.

I. In general, it is an answer of peace; this the psalmist is soon aware of, (v. 8.) for he stands upon his watch-tower to hear what God will say unto him, as the prophet, (Hab. ii. 1, 2.) I will hear what God the Lord will speak. This intimates, 1. The stilling of his passions, his grief, his fear, and the tumult of his spirit; "Compose thyself, O my soul, in an humble silence to attend upon God, wait his motions. I have spoken enough, or too much; now I will hear what God will speak, and welcome his holy will; What saith my Lord unto his servants? [1.] If we would have God to hear what we say to him, we must be ready to say what he says to us by his word. 2. The raising of his expectations; now that he has been at prayer, he looks for something very great, and very kind, from the God that hears prayer. When we have prayed, we should look after our prayers, and stay for an answer. Now, observe here, [1.] What it is that he promises himself from God, in answer to his prayers; He will speak peace to his people, and to his saints. [2.] What he does, not only speak peace, but make peace for them who are God's people, set apart for him, subject to him, and who shall be saved by him. All his people are his saints, sanctified by his grace, and devoted to his glory; these may sometimes want peace, when without are fightings, and within are fears; but, sooner or later, God will speak peace to them; if he do not command outward peace, yet he will suggest inward peace; speaking that to their hearts by his Spirit, which he has spoken to their ears by his word and ministry, and making them to hear joy and gladness. [2.] What use he makes of this expectation. [1.] He takes the comfort of it; and so must we; "I will hear what God the Lord will speak, hear the assurances he gives of peace, in answer to prayer." When God speaks peace, we must not be deaf to it, but with all humility and thankfulness receive it. [2.] He cautions the saints to do the duty which this calls for; But let them not turn again to folly; for thus these terms, and no other, that peace is to be expected. To those, and those only, peace is spoken, who turn from sin; but if they return to it again, it is at their peril. All sin is folly, but especially backsliding; it is egregious folly to turn to sin after we have seemed to turn from it, to turn it after God has spoken peace! God is for peace, but, when he speaks, such are for war.

II. Here are the particulars of this answer of peace; he doubts not but all will be well in a little time, and therefore gives us the pleasing prospect of the flourishing estate of the church in the five last verses of the psalm, which describes the peace and prosperity that God, at length, blessed the children of the captivity with; when, after a great deal of toil and agitation, at length they gained a settlement in their own land. But it may be taken, 1. As a promise also to all who fear God and work righteousness, the peace and prosperity of the church is the certain evidence of the kingdom of the Messiah, and the blessings with which that kingdom should be enriched. Here is,

[1.] Help at hand; (v. 9.) "Surely his salvation is nigh, nigh to us, higher than we think it is; it will soon be effectual, how great soever our difficulties and distresses are, when God's time is come, and that time is not far off." When the tale of bricks is doubled, then is Egypt's end; when wall is taken down, when trouble is high, salvation is nigh; for God is a very present Help in time of trouble to all who are his; whereas salvation is far from the wicked, cxix. 155. This may fitly be applied to Christ the Author of eternal salvation; it was the comfort of the Old Testament saints, that though they lived not to see that redemption in Jerusalem which they waited for, yet they were still set high, and would be welcome, to all that fear God.

[2.] Honour secured; "That glory may dwell in our land, that we may have the worship of God settled and established among us; for that is the glory of a land. When that goes, Ichabod—the glory is departed; when that stays, glory dwells." This may refer to the Messiah, who was to be the Glory of his people Israel, and who came and dwelt among them, (John i. 4.) for which reason their land is called Immanuel's land, Isa. viii. 8.

(3.) Graces meeting, and happily embracing; (v. 10, 11.) "Mercy and truth, righteousness and peace, shall be in his tabernacle." [1.] Of the reformation of the people and of the government, in the administration of which all those graces should be conspicuous and commanding. The rulers and ruled shall all be merciful and true, righteous and peaceable; when there is no truth nor mercy, all goes to ruin, Hos. iv. 1. Isa. lix. 14, 15. But when these meet in the management of all affairs, when these give aim, when these give law, when these make and keep peace, when they are righteous, when they do good, there is a prosperous state, a flourishing church, to the grass of the earth, and of righteousness, that it is showered down like rain from heaven, then things go well. When in every congregation mercy and truth meet, in every embrace righteousness and peace kiss, and common honesty is indeed common, then glory dwells in a land, as the sin of reigning dishonesty is a reproach to any people. [2.] Of the return of God's favour, and the continuance of it thereafter. When a people return to God, and adhere to him, in a way of duty, he will return to them, and abide with them, in a way of mercy. So some understand this, Man's truth, and God's mercy, man's righteousness and God's peace, meet together. If God finds us true to him, to one another, to ourselves, we shall find him merciful. If we make conscience of righteousness, we shall have the comfort of peace.

If truth spring out of the earth, which is, (as Dr. Hammond understands it,) out of the heart of the sinner, he makes the proper soil for it to grow in, righteousness. God's mercy, shall look down from heaven, as the sun does upon the world, when it sheds its influence on the productions of the earth, and cherishes them.

[3.] Of the harmony of the divine attributes in the Messiah's undertaking. In him, who is both our Salvation and our Glory, mercy and truth are met together; God's mercy and truth, and his righteousness and peace, have kissed each other; that is, the great affair of our salvation is so well contrived, so well concerted, that God may have mercy upon poor sinners, and be at peace with them, without any wrong to his truth and righteousness. He is true to the threatening, and just in his government, and yet pardons sinners, and takes them into covenant with himself. Christ, as Mediator, brings heaven and earth together again, which sin had set at variance; through him truth springs out of the earth, the earth being made new by the new covenant, and his heart, and then righteousness looks down from heaven, for God is just, and the Justifier of them which believe in Jesus; or it may denote, that, in the kingdom of the Messiah, these graces shall flourish and prevail, and have a universal command.

(4.) Great plenty of every thing desirable; (v. 12.) The Lord shall give that which is good, every thing that he sees to be good for us; all good comes from God, and is given for the good of his people. Righteousness, have a sovereign influence on men's hearts and lives, all good may be expected; if we thus seek the righteousness of God's kingdom, other things shall be added; Matth. vi. 33. "When the gospel of the glory dwells in our land, then it shall yield its increase, for soul-prosperity will either bring outward prosperity along with it, or sweeten the want of it. See Ps. lxxii. 13.)" The righteousness of his promise which he has made to us, assuring us of happiness—the righteousness of sanctification, that good work which he has wrought in us, these shall go before him to prepare his way, both to raise our expectations of his favour, and to qualify us for it; and this shall go before us also, and be our guide to set us in the way of his steps, that is, to encourage our hopes, and guide our practice, that we may go forth to meet him when he is coming towards us in ways of mercy. Christ, the Sun of righteousness, shall bring us to God, and put us into the way that leads to him; John Baptist, a preacher of righteousness, shall go before Christ, to prepare his way. Righteousness is a sure guide both in meeting God, and in following him.

PSALM LXXXVI.

This psalm is entitled a prayer of David; probably it was not penned upon any particular occasion, but was a prayer he often used himself, and recommended to others for their use, especially in a day of affliction. Many think that David penned this prayer as a type of Christ, and that the days of his flesh offered up strong cries, Heb. v. 7. David, in this prayer, (according to the nature of that duty,) I. Gives glory to God, v. 8. 10, 12, 13. II. Seeks for grace and help from God; that God may hear his prayers, v. 1, 6, 7. preserve and save him, and be merciful to him; (v. 2, 3, 16.) that he would give him joy, and grace, and strength, and put honour upon him, v. 4, 11, 17. He pleads God's goodness, (v. 5, 15.) and the mercies of his enemies, v. 14. In singing this, we must, as David did, lift up our souls to God with application.

A prayer of David.

1. Bow down thine ear, O Lord, hear me; for I am poor and needy. 2. Preserve my soul, for I am holy: O thou my God, save thy servant that trusteth in thee. 3. Be merciful unto me, O Lord: for I cry unto thee daily. 4. Rejoice the soul of thy servant: for unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul. 5. For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive; and plentiful in mercy unto all them that call upon thee. 6. Give ear, O Lord, unto my prayer; and attend to the voice of my supplications. 7. In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee: for thou wilt answer me.

This psalm was published under the title of a prayer of David: not as if David sang all his prayers, but into some of his songs he inserted prayers; for a psalm will admit the expressions of any pious and devout affections. But it is observable how very plain the language of this psalm is, and how little there is in it of poetical flights or figures, in comparison with some of his other psalms; for the flourishers of wit are not the proper ornaments of prayer.

Now here we may observe,

1. The petitions he puts up to God. It is true, prayer accidentally may preach, but it is most fit that (as it is in this prayer) every passage should be directed to God, for such is the nature of prayer as it is here described, (v. 4.) Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul, as he had said, xxx. 1. In all psalm prayer, the soul must ascend upon the wings of faith and holy desire, and be lifted up to God to meet the communications of his grace, and in an expectation raised very high of great things from him.

1. He begs that God would give a gracious audience to his prayers; (v. 1.) Bow down thine ear, O Lord, hear me. When God hears our prayers, it is fitly said that he bows down his ear to them, for it is admirable condescension in God that he is pleased to take notice of such mean creatures as we are, and that he harkens to our prayers (as he repeats this again; v. 6.) "Give ear, O Lord, unto my prayer, a favourable ear, though it be whispered, though it be stammered, attend to the voice of my supplications." Not that God needs to have his affections stirred up by any thing that we can say; but thus we must express our desire of his favour. The Son of David spake it with assurance and pleasure; (John xi. 41, 42.) Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me; and I know that thou hearest me always.

2. He begs that God would take him under his spiritual protection. So be the Author of his salvation: (v. 2.) Preserve my soul, and rescue me from all evil. It was David's soul that was God's servant; for those only serve God acceptably that serve him with their spirits. David's concern is about his soul; if we understand it of his natural life, it teaches us, That the best self-preservation is to commit ourselves to God's keeping, and by faith and prayer to make our Creator our Preserver. But it may be understood of his spiritual life; the life of the soul is distinct from the body; "Preserve my soul." "Men show no mercy, we ourselves deserve no mercy, but, Lord, for mercy sake, be merciful to me." 3. He begs that God would look upon him with an eye of pity and compassion; (v. 3.) Be merciful to me, O Lord. It is mercy in God to pardon our sins, and to help us out of our distresses; but these are included in this prayer. God is merciful to me. "Men show no mercy, we ourselves deserve no mercy, but, Lord, for mercy sake, be merciful to me." 4. He begs that God would fill him with inward comfort; (v. 4.) Rejoice the soul of thy servant. It is God only that can put gladness into the heart, and make the soul to rejoice, and then, and not till then, the joy is full; as it is the duty of those who love God's ways to serve him with gladness, so it is their privilege to be filled with joy and peace in believing; and they may in faith pray, not only that God will preserve their souls, but that he will rejoice their souls, and the joy of the Lord will be their strength. Observe, When he prays, Rejoice my soul, he adds, For unto thee do I lift up my soul. Then we may expect comfort from God, when we take care to keep up our communion with God; prayer is the nurse of spiritual joy.

11. The pleas with which he enforces these petitions.

1. He pleads his relation to God and interest in him; "Thou art my God, to whom I have devoted myself, and on whom I depend, and I am thy servant, (v. 2.) in subjection to thee, and therefore looking for protection from thee." 2. He pleads distress; "Hear me, for I am poor and needy, therefore I want thy help, therefore none else will hear me." God is the poor man's King, whose glory it is to save the souls of the needy; they who are poor in spirit, who see themselves empty and necessitous, are most welcome to the God of all grace.

3. He pleads God's good will towards all that seek him; (v. 5.) "To thee do I lift up my soul in desire and expectation: for thou, Lord, art good;" and whither should beggars go but to the door of the poor man's King? The goodness of God's nature is a great encouragement to us in our distresses to him. His goodness appears in two things, giving and forgiving. (1.) He is a sin-pardoning God; not only can he forgive, but he is ready to forgive; more ready to forgive than we are to repent. I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest, xxxii. 5. (2.) He is a prayer-hearing God; he is plentiful in mercy, very full, and very free, both rich and liberal unto all them that call upon him; he has wherewithal to supply all their needs, and is open-handed in granting that supply. 4. He pleads God's good work in himself, by which he had qualified him for the tokens of his favour. Three things were wrought in him by divine grace, which he looked upon as.emblems of all good.
(1.) A conformity to God; (v. 2.) I am holy, therefore preserve my soul; for those whom the Spirit sanctifies he will preserve. He does not say this in pride and vain-glory, but with humble thankfulness to God; I am one whom thou hast made meet, so the margin reads it, whom thou hast set apart for thyself; if God has begun a good work of grace in us, we must own that the time was a time of love; then was I in his eyes as one that found favour; and whom God hath taken into his favour he will take under his protection. All his saints are in thy hand, Deut. xxxiii. 3. Observe, I am needy, (v. 1.) yet I am holy; (v. 2.) holy and yet needy; foal in the world; they that preserve purity in their greatest poverty may assure themselves that God will preserve their comforts, will preserve their souls.

(2.) A confidence in God; Save thy servant that trusteth in thee. They that are holy must, nevertheless, not trust in themselves, or in their own righteousness, but only in God and his grace. They that trust in God may expect salvation from him.

(3.) A disposition to communion with God; he hopes God will answer his prayers, because he had inclined him to pray. [1.] To be constant in prayer; I cry unto thee, daily, and all the day. It is thus our duty to pray always, without ceasing, and to continue constant in prayer; and therefore we may hope to have our prayers heard, which we make in time of trouble, if we have made conscience of the duty at other times, at all times. It is comfortable if an affliction finds the wheels of prayer a-going, and that they are not then to be set a-going. [2.] To be inward with God in prayer; to lift up his soul to him, v. 4. Then we may hope that God will meet us with his mercies, when we in our prayers send forth our souls as it were to meet him. [3.] To be, in a special manner, earnest with God in prayer, when he was in affliction; (v. 7.) "In the day of my trouble, whatever others do, I will call upon thee, and commit my case to thee, for thou wilt hear and answer me, and I shall not seek in vain, as those did who cried, O Baal, hear us; but there was no voice, nor any that regarded, 1 Kings xviii. 29.

3. Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord; neither are there any works like unto thy works. 9. All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name. 10. For thou art great, and dost wondrous things: thou art God alone. 11. Teach me thy way, O Lord; I will walk in thy truth: unite my heart to fear thy name. 12. I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart; and I will glorify thy name for evermore. 13. For great is thy mercy toward me; and thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell. 14. O God, the proud are risen against me, and the assemblies of violent men have sought after my soul, and have not set thee before them. 15. But thou, O Lord, art a God full of compassion, and gracious; long-suffering, and plenteous in mercy and truth. 16. O turn unto me, and have mercy upon me: give thy strength unto thy servant, and save the son of thy handmaid. 17. Show me a token for good: that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed: because thou hast hasted me, and comforted me.

1. He gives glory to God; for we ought in our prayers to praise him, ascribing kingdom, power, and glory, to him, with the most humble and reverent adorations.

2. As a being of unparalleled perfection, such a one, that there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him, v. 8. Among the gods, the false gods, whom the heathens worshipped, the angels, the kings of the earth, among them all, there is none like unto thee, O Lord; none so wise, so mighty, so good; none so there any works like unto thy works: which is an undeniable proof that there is none like him; his own works praise him, and the best way we have of praising him, is, by acknowledging that there is none like him.

2. As the Fountain of all being, and the Centre of all praise; (v. 9.) "Thou hast made all nations, made them all of one blood, they all derive their being from thee, and have a constant dependence on thee, and therefore they shall come and worship before thee, and glorify thy name." This was in part fulfilled in the multitude of proselytes to the Jewish religion in the days of David and Solomon, but was to have its full accomplishment in the days of the Messiah, when some out of every kingdom and nation should be effectually brought in to praise God, Rev. vii. 9. It was by Christ that God made all nations, for without him was not any thing made that was made, and therefore, through Christ, and by the power of his gospel and grace, all nations shall be brought to worship before God, Isa. lxvi. 23.

3. As a Being infinitely great; (v. 10.) "Therefore all nations shall worship before thee, because as King of nations thou art great, thy sovereignty absolute and incontestable, thy majesty terrible and insupportable, thy power universal and irresistible, thy riches vast and inextinguishable, thy dominion boundless and unquestionable; and, for the proof of this, thou dost wondrous things, which all nations admire, and whence they might easily infer that thou art God alone, not only none like thee, but none beside thee." Let us always entertain great thoughts of this great God, and be filled with holy admiration of this God who doth wenders; and let him alone have our hearts, who is God alone.

4. As a Being infinitely good. Man is bad, very wicked and vile; (v. 15.) no mercy is to be expected from him. Be dead, and O Lord, art not only compassionate, but full of compassion, and in him mercy rejoiceth against judgment. He is long-suffering towards us, though we forfeit his favour, and provoke him to anger, and he is plenteous in mercy and truth, as faithful in performing as he was free in promising.

5. As a kind Friend and bountiful Benefactor to him. We ought to praise God as good in himself, but we do it most feelingly, when we observe how he has been kind to us. God dwells upon with most pleasure, v. 12. 13. He had said, (v. 9.) All nations shall praise thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name. It is some satisfaction to a good man, to think that others shall praise and glorify God, but it is his greatest care and pleasure to do it himself. "Whatever others do," (says David,) "I will praise thee, O Lord my God, not only as the Lord, but as my God; and I will do it with all mine heart; I will be ready to do it, and cordial in it; I will do it with cheerfulness and liveliness, with a sincere regard to thy honour; for I will glorify thy name, not for a time, but for evermore. I will do it as long as I live, and hope to be doing it to eternity.· With good reason does he resolve to be thus particular in praising God, because God had shown him particular favours; For great is thy mercy toward me.

The fountain of mercy is inexhaustibly full, the streams of mercy are inestimably rich; when we speak of God's mercy to us, it becomes us thus to magnify it, Great is thy mercy toward me. Of the greatness of God's mercy, he gives this instance, Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell; from death, so great a death, as St. Paul, (2 Cor. i. 18.) says, 'The lowest hell;' and this is a form of speech that should greatly enlarge their hearts in praising the mercy of God, which they are obliged to glorify for evermore. So glorious, so gracious, a rescue from everlasting misery, justly requires the return of everlasting praise.

II. He prays earnestly for mercy and grace from God. He complains of the restless and implacable malign of his enemies against him; (v. 14.) "Lord, be thou for me; for thy enemies consist of Rabbi P's people, and they were proud men, that looked with disdain upon poor David. (Many are made persecutors by their pride.) They were violent men, that would carry all before them by force, right or wrong; they were terrible, formidable, men, (so some,) that did all they could to frighten all about them. He notices their number; there are assemblies of them, they work with the world, and meddle with courts; or men for conversation, and met in clubs. But, being assembled, they were the more capable of doing mischief. He notices their cunning to David: "They rise up against me in open rebellion; they not only plot, but they put their plots in execution as far as they can; and the design is not only to depose David, but to destroy him; they seek after my life to slay me, or put an end to me, if it lay in their power." And, lastly, He makes their distance and estrangement from God, which were at the bottom of their enmity to David; "They have not set thee before them; and what good can be expected from those that have no fear of God before their eyes? Lord, appear against them, for they are thine enemies as well as mine."

His petitions are, 1. He prays for tokens of God's grace in him, v. 11. He prays that God would give him, (1.) An understanding heart, that he would inform and instruct him concerning his duty: "Teach me thy way, O Lord, the way that thou hast appointed me to walk in; when I am in doubt concerning it, make it plain to me what I should do, let me hear thy voice, saying, This is the way." Isa. xxx. 21. David was well-educated in the things of God, and yet was sensible of the need of further instruction, and many a time could not trust his own judgment; Teach me thy way, I will walk in thy truth. One would think it should be, Teach me thy truth, and I will walk in thy way; but it comes all to one, it is the way of truth that God teaches, and that we must choose and walk in, Ps. cxix. 30. Christ is the Way and the Truth, and we must both learn Christ and walk in him. We cannot walk in God's way and truth, unless he teach us; and, if we expect he should teach us, we must resolve to be governed by his teachings, Isa. ii. 3. (2.) An upright heart; "Unite my heart to fear thy name; make me sincere in religion; a hypocrite has a double heart, let mine be single, and entire for God; not divided between him and the world; not straggling from him. Our hearts are apt to wander, and hang loose; our powers and faculties scatter after a thousand foolish things; we have therefore need of God's grace to unite them, that we may serve God with all that is within us, and all little enough to be employed in his service. "Let my heart be fixed for God, and firm and faithful to him, and fervent in serving him, that is an united heart."

2. For the tokens of God's favour to him, v. 16, 17. Three things he here prays for, (1.) That God would speak peace and comfort to him; "O turn unto me, as to one thou lovest, and hast a kind and tender concern for; my enemies turn against me, my friends turn from me, Lord, do thou turn to me, and have mercy upon me; it will be a comfort to me to know that thou pitiest me." (2.) That God would work deliverance for him, and set him in safety; "Give me thy strength; put strength into me, that I may have help against the enmity of my enemies, and that I may be saved out of the hands of those that seek my ruin." He pleads relation; "I am thy servant; I am so by birth, as the son of thine handmaid, born in thy house, and therefore thou art my rightful Owner and Proprietor, from whom I may expect protection. I am thine, save me." The children of godly parents, who were betimes dedicated to the Lord, may plead it with him; if they come under the influence of his Spirit, they are entitled to the privileges of it. (3.) That God would put reputation on him; "Show me a token for good; make it to appear to others as well as to myself, that thou art doing me good, and designing further good for me. Let me have some unquestionable illustrious instances of thy favour to me, that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed of their enmity to me, as they will have reason to be, when they perceive, he that loveth God, and God loveth him, is comforted; and that therefore they have been striving against God, opposing one whom he owns, and that they have been striving in vain to ruin and vex one whom God himself has undertaken to help and comfort." The joy of the saints shall be the shame of their persecutors.

PSALM LXXXVII.

The foregoing psalm was very plain and easy, but in this are things dark and hard to be understood. It is an encomium of Zion, as a type and figure of the gospel-church, to which what is here spoken is very applicable. Zion, for the temple's sake, is here preferred, 1. Before the rest on the throne of Canaan, as least crowned with special tokens of God's favour, v. 1. 2. Before any other place or country whatsoever, as being replenished with more eminent men, and with a greater plenty of divine blessedness, v. 4. Some think it was penned to express the joy of God's people when Zion was in a flourishing state; others think it was penned to encourage their faith and hope when Zion was in ruins, and was to be rebuilt after the captivity; though no man cared for the figure. (Jer. xxx. 17.) This is Zion, where man seeketh after; yet God had done great things for her, and spoken glorious things of her, which should all have their perfection and accomplishment in the gospel-church, so that therefore we must have an eye, in singing this psalm.

A psalm or song for the sons of Korah.

1. HIS foundation is in the holy mountains. 2. The Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob. 3. Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God. Selah.

Some make the first words of the psalm to be part of the title; it is a psalm or song, whose subject is the holy mountains; the temple built in Zion upon mountains. That is the foundation of it, the argument, or beginning of the psalm. Or, we may suppose the psalmist had now the tabernacle or temple in view, and was contemplating the glories of it, and at length breaks out into this expression, which has reference, though not to what he had written before, yet to what he had thought of; every one knew what he meant when he had said thus abruptly, Its foundation is in the holy mountains.

Three things are here observed, in praise of the temple.

1. That it was founded on the holy mountains, v. 1.
   The church has a foundation, so that it cannot sink or totter; Christ himself is the Foundation of it, which God has laid. The Jerusalem above is a city that has foundations. The foundation is upon the mountains; it is built high, the mountain of the Lord's house is established upon the top of the mountains, Ps. lix. 1. It is built on mountains, the mountains are rocky, and on a rock the church is built. The world is founded upon the seas; (xxiv. 2.) which are continually ebbing and flowing, and are a very weak foundation; Babel was built in a plain, where the ground was rotten; but the church is built upon the everlasting mountains, and the perpetual hills; for sooner shall the mountains depart, and the hills be removed, than the covenant of God's peace shall be disannulled, and on that the church is built, Isa. li. 1. The foundation is upon the holy mountains. Holiness is the strength and stability of the church; that is it which will support it, and keep it from sinking; not so much that it is built upon mountains, as that it is built upon holy mountains; upon the promise of God, for the confirming of which he has sworn by his holiness; upon the sanctification of the Spirit, which will secure the happiness of all the saints.

2. That God had expressed a particular affection for it; (v. 2.) The Lord loveth the gates of Zion, of the temple, of the houses of doctrine, (so the Chaldee,) more than all the dwellings of Jacob, whether in Jerusalem, or any where else in the country. God had said concerning Zion, This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell; there he met his people, and conversed with them, received their homage, and showed them the tokens of his favour, and therefore we may conclude how well he loves those gates. Note, (1.) God has a love for the dwellings of Jacob, a gracious regard to religious families, and accepts their family-worship. (2.) Yet he loves the gates of Zion better, not only better than any, but better than all, of the dwellings of Jacob. God was worshipped in the dwellings of Jacob, and family-worship is family-duty, which must by no means be neglected; yet, when they come in competition, public worship (ceteris paribus—other things being equal,) is to be preferred before private.

3. That there was much said concerning it in the word of God; (v. 3.) Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God. We are to judge of things and persons by the figure they make, and the estimate put upon them, in and by the scripture. Many base things were spoken of the city of God by the enemies of it, to render it mean and odious, but by him whose judgment we are sure is according to truth, of glories things are spoken of it; God said of the temple, Mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually; I have sanctified this house, that my name may be there for ever, 2 Chron. vii. 16. Beautiful for situation is mount Zion, Ps. lxxxvi. 2. These are glorious things. Yet more glorious things are spoken of the gospel-church; it is the spouse of Christ, the purchase of his blood, it is a peculiar people, a holy nation, a royal priesthood, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Let us not be ashamed of the church of Christ in its meanest conditions, nor of any that belong to it, nor disown our relation to it, though it be turned from its glory: it is given to our reproach, since such glorious things are spoken of it, and not one iota or tittle of what is said shall fall to the ground.

4. I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me; behold, Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia: this man was born there. 5. And of Zion it shall be said, This and that man was born in her; and the Highest himself shall establish her. 6. The Lord shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there. Selah. 7. As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee.

Zion is here compared with other places, and preferred before them; the church of Christ is more glorious and excellent than the nations of the earth.

1. It is owned that other places have their glories; (v. 4.) I will make mention of Rahab, that is, Egypt, and Babylon, to them that know me, and are about me, and with whom I discourse about public affairs; behold Philistia and Tyre, with Ethiopia, or rather Arabia; we shall observe that this man was born there; here and there one famous for an excellence and knowledge than others have produced, that was a native of these countries; here and there one that becomes a proselyte, and a worshipper of the true God. But some give another sense of it; that it is a prophecy or promise of bringing the Gentiles into the church, and uniting them in one body with the Jews. God says, I will reckon them my people as much as Israel, when they shall receive the gospel of Christ, and own them as born in Zion, born again there, and admitted to the privileges of Zion as freely as a true-born Israelite. They that were strangers and foreigners, become fellow citizens with the saints, Eph. ii. 19. A Gentile convert shall stand upon a level with a native Jew; compare Isa. xix. 23—25. The Lord shall say, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance.

2. It is proved that the glory of Zion outshines them all, upon many accounts; for,

(1.) Zion shall produce many great and good men that shall be famous in their generation, v. 5. Of Zion it shall be said by all her neighbours, that this and that man was born in her, many men of renown for wisdom and piety, and especially for acquaintance with the words of God and the visions of the Almighty. Many prophets and kings, who should be the greater favourites of Heaven, and greater blessings to the earth, than ever were bred in Egypt or Babylon. The worthies of the church far exceed those of heathen nations, and their names will shine brighter than in perpetual records. A man, a man was born in her; by which some understand Christ, that Man, that Son of man, who is far dearer to the people of men, he was born at Bethlehem near Zion, and was the glory of his people Israel. The greatest honour that ever was upon the Jewish nation, was, that of them, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, Rom. ix. 5. Or this may also be applied to the conversion of the Gen-ticles; Of Zion it shall be said, that the law which went forth out of Zion, the gospel of Christ, shall be an instrument to beget many souls to God, and the Jerusalem that is from above shall be acknowledged the mother of them all.

(2.) Zion's interest shall be strengthened and settled by an almighty power. The Highest himself shall undertake to establish her, who can do it effectually; the accession of proselytes out of divers nations shall be by the hand of that almighty force and division, that it shall contribute greatly to Zion's strength; for God himself, having founded her upon an everlasting foundation, whatever convulsions and revolutions there are of states and kingdoms, and however heaven and earth may be shaken, these are things which cannot be shaken, but must remain.

(3.) Zion's sons shall be registered with honour; (v. 6.) The Lord shall count, when he writes up, the people, and takes a catalogue of the nation, that this race was born there, and so is a subject by birth, by the first birth, being born in his house—by the second birth, being born again of his Spirit. When God comes to return with the children of men, that he may render to every man according to his works, he shall observe who was born in Zion, and consequently enjoyed the privileges of God's sanctuary, to whom pertained the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the service, of God, Rom. viii. 34. to them all, and therefore of them much will be required, and the account will be accordingly; five talents must be improved by those that were intrusted with five. I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, and where thou wast born. Selah. Let those that dwell in Zion mark this, and live up to their profession.

(4.) Zion's songs shall be sung with joy and tri triumph. As well the singers, as the players on instruments, shall praise to the Lord. There was much to the honour of Zion, and is to the honour of the gospel-church, that there God is served and worshipped with rejoicing; his work is done, and done cheerfully; see lviii. 25. All my springs are in thee, O Zion: so God says; he has deposited treasures of grace in his holy ordinances, there are the springs from which those streams take rise, which make glad the city of our God, xlv. 4. So the poet says, reckoning the springs, from which his dry soul may spring up to an inward, sanctifying, in the word and ordinances, and in the communion of saints; the springs of the joy of a carnal worldling lie in wealth and pleasure, but the springs of the joy of a gracious soul lie in the word of God and prayer. Christ is the true Temple; all these springs are in him, and from him all our streams flow; it pleased the Father, and all believers are well pleased with it too, that in him should all fulness dwell.

PSALM LXXXVIII.

This psalm is a lamentation; one of the most melancholy of all the psalms; and it does not conclude, as usually the melancholy psalms do, with the least intimation of comfort or joy but, from first to last, it is mourning and woe. It is not upon a public account that the psalmist here complains, (here is no mention of the afflictions of the church,) but only upon a personal account, especially trouble of mind, and the grief impressed upon his spirits, both by his outward afflictions, and by the remembrance of his sins, and the fear of God's wrath. It is reconciling to the psalmist's soul, to think of this. It is well when our fears are thus turned into the right channel, and we take occasion from our worldly grievances to sorrow after a godly sort. In this psalm, we have, I. The description of the spirit that the psalmist was in, v. 3—6. II. The wrath of God, which was the cause of that pressure, v. 7. 15. 417. III. The wickedness of his friends, v. 8. 18. IV. The application he made to God by prayer, v. 1, 2, 9, 13. V. His humble expostulations and pleadings with God, v. 10, 12, 14. Those who are in trouble of mind may sing this psalm feelingly; those that are not ought to sing it thankfully, blessing God that it is not their case.

A song or psalm for the sons of Korah. To the chief musician upon Mahalath Leannoth, Maschil of Heman the Ezravite.

1. LORD of my salvation, I have cried day and night before thee. 2. Let my prayer come before thee: incline thine ear unto my cry; 3. For my soul is full of troubles, and my life draweth nigh unto the grave. 4. I am counted with them that go down into the pit: I am as a man that hath no strength: 5. Free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more: and they are cut off from thy hand. 6. Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps. 7. Thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves. Selah. 8. Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me; thou hast made me an abomination unto them: I am shut up, and I cannot come forth. 9. Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction: LORD, I have called daily upon thee; I have stretched out my hands unto thee.

It should seem, by the titles of this and the following psalm, that Heman was the penman of the one, and Ethan of the other. There were two of these names, who were sons of Zerah the son of Judah, 1 Chron. ii. 4, 6. There were two others famed for wisdom, (1 Kings iv. 31.) where, to magnify Solomon's wisdom, he is said to be wiser than Heman and Ethan. Whether the Heman and Ethan, who were Levites and precentors in the songs of Zion, were the same, we are not sure, nor of which of these, nor whether any of these, were the penmen of these psalms; there was a Heman that was one of the chief singers, who is called the king's seer or prophet, in the words of God; (1 Chron. xxv. 5.) it is probable that this is he, and that we could see no comfort for himself, an instructor and comforter of others, and yet himself putting comfort away from him.

The very first words of the psalm are the only words of comfort and support in all the psalm. There is nothing about him but clouds and darkness; but, before he begins his complaint, he calls God the God of his salvation, which intimates, both that he looked for salvation, and as things were, and that he looked up to God for the salvation, and depended upon him to be the Author of it.

Now here we have the psalmist,

1. A man of prayer, one that gave himself to prayer at all times, but especially now that he was in affliction: for is any afflicted? Let him pray. It is his comfort, that he had prayed, it is his complaint, that, notwithstanding his prayer, he was still in affliction. He was, (v. 1.) very earnest in prayer; I have cried unto thee, (v. 1.) and have stretched out my hands unto thee, (v. 9.) as one that would take hold on thee, and even catch at the mercy, with a holy fear of coming short and missing of it. (2.) He was very frequent and constant in prayer; I have called upon thee daily, (v. 9.) pray, day and night, v. 1. For thus men ought always to pray, and not to faint; God's own elect cry day and night to him, not only morning and evening, beginning every day and every night with prayer, but spending the day and night in prayer. This is indeed praying always; and then we shall speed in prayer, when we continue in prayer. (3.) He directed his prayer to God, and from him expected and desired an answer; (v. 2.) "Let my prayer come before thee, to be accepted of thee, not before men, to be seen of them, as the Pharisees' prayers." He does not desire that men should hear them, but, "Lord, incline thou thine ear unto my cry, for to that I refer myself, give what answer to it thou pleasest."

2. He was a man of sorrows, and therefore some make him, in this psalm, a type of Christ, whose complaints on the cross, and sometimes before, were much to the same purport with this psalm. He cries out, (v. 3.) "My soul is full of troubles;" so Christ said, "Now is my soul troubled; and, in his agony, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, like the psalmist's here, even unto death, for he says, My life draws nigh unto the grave." Heman was a very wise man, and a good man, a man of God, and a singer too, and one may therefore suppose him to be a man of a cheerful spirit, and yet now a man of sorrowful spirit, troubled in mind, and upon the brink of despair. Inward trouble is the sorest trouble, and that which, sometimes, the best of God's saints and servants have been severely exercised with. The spirit of man, of the greatest of men, will not always sustain the infirmity, but will droop and sink under it; who then can bear a wounded spirit?

3. He looked upon himself as a dying man, whose heart was ready to break with sorrow; (v. 3.) "Free among the dead, one of that ghastly corporation; like the slain that lie in the grave, whose rotting and perishing nobody takes notice of, or is concerned for; nay, whom thou rememberest no more, to protect or provide for the dead bodies, but they become an easy prey to corruption and the worms, they are cut off from thy hand, which was once employed in supporting them, and reaching out to them; but now there is no more occasion for it, they are cut off from it, and cut off by it;" (for God will not stretch out his hand to the grave, Job xxx. 24.) "thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, as low as possible, my condition low, my spirits low, in darkness, in the deeps, (v. 6.) sinking, and seeing no way open of escape, brought to the last extremity, and ready to give up all for gone." Thus greatly may good men be afflicted, and such dismal apprehensions may there be concerning their afflictions, and such dark conclusions may their sometimes be ready to make concerning the issue of them, through the power of melancholy and the weakness of faith.

4. He complained most of God's displeasure against him, which infused the wormwood and the gall into the affliction and the misery; (v. 7.) Thy wrath lies hard upon me; could he have discerned the favour and love of God in any sentence, it had lain light upon him; but it lay hard, very hard, upon him, so that he was ready to sink and faint under it. The impressions of this wrath upon his spirits, were God's waves with which he afflicted him, which rolled upon him, one on the neck of another, so that he scarcely recovered from one dark thought, before he was oppressed with another; these waves beat against him with noise and fury; not some, but all, of God's waves, doubtless with afflicting him, and bearing him down. Even the children of God, love may sometimes apprehend themselves children of wrath, and no outward trouble can lie so hard upon them as that apprehension.

5. It added to this affliction, that his friends deserted him, and made themselves strange to him. When we are in trouble, it is some comfort to have those about us, that love us and sympathize with us, but this good man had none such; which gives him occasion not to accuse them, or charge them with treachery, ingratitude, and inhumanity, but to complain to God, with an eye to his hand in this part of the affliction; (v. 8.) "They have put away mine acquaintance far from me. Providence had removed them, or rendered them incapable of being serviceable to him, or alienated their affections from him, for every creature is that to us (and no more) that God makes it to be; if our old acquaintance be shy of us, and those we expect kindness from prove unkind, we must bear that with the same patient submission to the divine will that we do other afflictions, Job xix. 13. Nay, his friends were not only strange to him, but even hated him, because he was poor and in distress; Thou hast made me an abomination to them; they are not only shy of me, but sick of me, and I am looked upon by them, not only with contempt, but with abhorrence." Let none think it strange concerning such a trial as this, when Heman, who was so famed for wisdom, was yet, when the world frowned upon him, neglected, as a vessel in which is no pleasure.

6. Lastly, He looked upon his case as helpless and deplorable; "I am shut up, and I cannot come forth, a close prisoner, under the arrests of divine wrath, and no way open of escape." He therefore lies down and sinks under his troubles, because he sees not any probability of getting out of them. For thus he means himself; (v. 9.) Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction; sometimes giving vent to grief by weeping gives some ease to a troubled spirit. Yet weeping must not hinder praying; we must sow in tears, My eye mourneth, but I cry unto thee daily; let prayers and tears go together, and they shall be accepted together; I have heard thy prayers, I have seen thy tears.

10. Wilt thou show wonders to the dead? shalt the dead arise and praise thee? Selah.

11. Shalt thy loving-kindness be declared in the grave? or thy faithfulness in destruction?

12. Shalt thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness? 13. But unto thee have I cried, O Lord; and in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee. 14. Lord, why easiest thou off my soul? why hidest thou thy face from me? 15. I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up; while I suffer thy terrors I am distracted. 16. Thy fierce wrath goeth over me; thy terrors have cut me off. 17. They came round about me daily like water, they compassed me about together. 18. Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkness.

In these verses, I. The psalmist expostulates with God concerning the present deplorable condition he was in; (v. 10.-12.) "Wilt thou do a miraculous work to the dead, and raise them to life gain? Shall those that are dead and buried rise up to praise thee? No, they leave it to their children to rise up in their rooms to praise God, not to force what they should do it; and wherefore should they rise? Wherefore should they live, but to praise God? The life we are born to at first, and the life we hope to rise to at last, must thus be spent. But shall thy loving-kindness to thy people be declared in the grave, either by those, or to those, that lie buried there? And thy faithfulness to thy promise, shall that be told in destruction; shall they wonders be wrought in the dark, or known there; and thy righteousness in the grave, which is the land of forgetfulness, where men remember nothing, nor are themselves remembered? Departed souls may indeed know God's wonders, and declare his faithfulness, justice, and loving-kindness, if their eyes can furnish comfort in comfort, nor return them in praise.

Now we will not suppose these expostulations to be the language of despair, as if he thought God could not help him, or would not, much less do they be- speak any disbelieve of the resurrection of the dead at the last day; but he thus pleads with God for speedy relief; "Lord, thou art good, thou art faithful, thou art righteous; these attributes of thine will be made known in my deliverance, but, if it be not hastened, it will come too late; for I shall be dead, and past relief, dead, and not capable of receiving any comfort, very shortly." Job often pleaded this, Job vii. 8.—x. 21.

II. He resolves to continue instant in prayer, and the more so because the deliverance was deferred; (v. 13.) "Unto thee have I cried many a time, and found comfort in it, and therefore I will continue to do so; in the morning shall my prayer be made known to the Lord." Note, Though our prayers be not answered immediately, yet we must not therefore give over praying, because the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie. God therefore delays the answer, that he may try our patience and perseverance in prayer. He resolves to seek God early, in the morning, when his spirits were lively, and before the business of the day began to crowd in; in the morning, after he had been tossed with cares, and sorrowful thoughts in the silence and solitude of the night; My prayer shall prevent thee. Not as if he could wake sooner to pray, than God to hear and answer, for He neither slumbers nor sleeps; but it intimates that he would be up earlier than ordinary to pray; would prevent, that is, go before his usual hour of prayer. The greater our afflictions are, the more solicitous and serious we should be in prayer. "My prayer shall present itself before thee, and I will betimes rise with thee, and shall not stay for the encouragement of the beginning of mercy, but reach out towards it with faith and expectation, even before the day dawns." God often prevents our prayers and expectations with his mercies, let us prevent his mercies with our prayers and expectations.

III. He sets down what he will say to God in prayer.

1. He will humbly reason with God concerning the abject afflicted condition he was now in; (v. 14.) "Lord, why castest thou off my soul? What is it that provokes thee to treat me as one abandoned? Show me wherefore thou contendest with me." He speaks it with wonder that God should cast off an old servant; should cast off one that was resolved not to cast him off; "No wonder men cast me off; but, Lord, why dost thou, whose gifts and callings are without repentance?" He speaks as one angry at me, that either hast no favour for me, or will not let me know it. Nothing grieves a child of God so much as God's hiding his face from him, nor is there anything he so much dreads as God's casting off his soul. If the sun be clouded, that darkens the earth; but if the sun should abandon the earth, and quite cast it off, what a dungeon would it be?

2. He will humbly repeat the same complaints he had made before, until God have mercy on him. Two things he represents to God as his grievances. (1.) That God was a Terror to him; I suffer thy terrors, v. 15. He had continual frightful apprehensions of the wrath of God against him for his sins, and the consequences of that wrath. It terrified him to think of God, and of falling into his hands, appearing before him to receive his doom from him. He sweat and trembled at the apprehension of God's displeasure against him, and the terror of his judgments. Even those that are designed for God's favours may yet, for a time, suffer his terrors. The spirit of adoption is first a spirit of bondage to fear. Poor Job complains of the terrors of God setting themselves in array against him, Job vi. 4. The psalmist here explains himself, and tells us what he means by God's terrors, even his fierce wrath. Let us see what dreadful impressions those terrors made upon him, and how deep they went. (2.) He had shrunk away his life; "I am so afflicted with them, that I am ready to die, and" (as the word is) "to give up the ghost. Thy terrors have cut me off," v. 16. What is hell, that external excision, by which damned sinners are for ever cut off from God and all happiness, but God's terrors fastening and praying upon their guilty consciences? [2.] They had almost taken away the use of his reason; When I suffer thy terrors, I am distracted; so that his contemplations and thoughts of the terrors of the Lord had driven him away many, and upon some good men, who have thereby been put quite out of the possession of their own souls; a most pitious case, and which ought to be looked upon with great compassion.

This had continued long; From my youth up, I suffer thy terrors; he had been from his childhood afflicted with melancholy, and trained up in sorrow under the discipline of that school. If we begin our days with trouble, and the days of our mourning have been prolonged a great while, let us not think it strange, but let tribulation work patience. It is observable that Heman, who became eminently wise and good, was afflicted and ready to die, and suffered God's terrors, from his youth up; thus many have found it was good for them to bear the yoke in their youth, that sorrow has been much better for them than laughter would have been, and that, being much afflicted, and often ready to die, when they were young, they have, by the grace of God, got such an habitual seriousness, and weanedness from the world, as have been of great use to them all their days. Sometimes those whom God designs for eminent services, are prepared for them by exercises of this kind. [4.] His affliction was now extreme, and worse than ever. God's terrors now came round about him, so that from all sides he was assaulted with variety of troubles, and he had no comfortable gage from any point of the compass. They brake in upon him together like an inundation of water; and this daily, and all the day; so that he had no rest, no respite, not the least breathing time, no lucid intervals, nor any gleam of hope. Such was the calamitous state of a very wise and good man; he was so surrounded with terrors, that he could find no place of shelter, nor lie any where under the wind.

(2.) That no friend had in the world was a comfort to him; (v. 18.) Lover and friend hast thou not far from me; some are dead, others at a distance, and perhaps many unkind. Next to the comforts of religion are those of friendship and society; therefore to be friendless is (as to this life) almost to be comfortless; and to those who have had friends, but have lost them, the calamity is the more grievous; with this the psalmist shows his complaint, as if this was the reason he had so completely his friends, and made the finishing stroke to this melancholy piece. If our friends are put far from us by scattering providences, nay, if by death our acquaintance are removed into darkness, we have reason to look upon it as a sore affliction, but must acknowledge and submit to the hand of God in it.
PSALM LXXXIX.

Many psalms that begin with complaint and prayer, end with joy and praise; but this begins with joy and praise, and ends with sad complaints and petitions; for the psalmist first recounts God's former favours, and then with the consideration of them aggravates the present grievances. It is uncertain when it was penned; only, in general, that it was at a time when the house of David was woefully eclipsed; some think it was at the time of the captivity of Babylon, when king Zedekiah was insulted over, and abused, by Nebuchadnezzar, and then they make the title to signify that the psalm was committed by the pen of a song of Ethan the son of Zerah, called Maschil; others suppose it to be penned by Ethan, who is mentioned in the story of Solomon, who, outliving that glorious prince, but exceeding his father, built new houses to the house of David in the next reign by the revolt of the ten tribes. 1. The psalmist, in the joyful, pleasant, part of the psalm, gives glory to God, and takes comfort to himself and his friends. This he does more briefly, more briefly also mercy speaks) (v. v. 4.) but more largely in the following verses, wherein, 1. He adores the glory and perfection of God, v. 5 . . 14. 2. He pleases himself in the happiness of those that are admitted into communion with him, v. 15 . . 18. 3. He builds all his hope upon God's covenant with David, as a type of Christ, v. 19 . . 37. II. In the melancholy part of the psalm, he laments the calamitous state of the family, v. 38 . . 49. He expostulates with God upon it, (v. 46 . . 49.) and then concludes with prayer for redress, v. 50, 51. In singing this psalm, we must have high thoughts of God, a lively faith in his covenant with the Redeemer, and a sympathy with the afflicted parts of the church.

Maschil of Ethan the Ezrathite.

1. I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever: with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations.

2. For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens.

3. I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant, 4. Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations. Selah.

The psalmist has a very sad complaint to make of the deplorable condition of the family of David at this time; and yet, he begins and ends the psalm with a song of praise; for we must, in every thing, in every state, give thanks; thus we must glorify the Lord in the fire. We think, when we are in trouble, that we get ease by complaining; but we do more, we get joy, by praising. Let our complaints, therefore, be turned into thankings; and in these verses we find that which will be matter of praise and thanksgiving for us in the worst of times, whether upon publick occasions or private.

1. However it be, the everlasting God is good and true, v. 1. Though we may find it hard to reconcile present dark providences with the goodness and truth of God, yet we must abide by this principle, That God's mercies are inexhaustible, and his truth inviolable; and these must be the matter of our joy and praise; "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever;" singing a praising song to God's honor, a pleasant song for my own solace, and Maschil, an instructing song, for the edification of others." We may be for ever singing God's mercies, and yet the subject will not be drawn dry. We must sing of God's mercies as long as we live, train up others to sing of them when we are gone, and hope to be singing of them in heaven, world without end; and this is singing of the mercies of the Lord for ever. With my mouth, and with my pen, (for I make known thy faithfulness to all generations; assuring posterity from my own observation and experience, that God is true to every word that he has spoken, that they may learn to put their trust in God, lxxviii. 6.

2. However it be, the everlasting covenant is firm and sure, v. 2 . . 4. Here we have, (1.) The psalmist's faith and hope; "Things now look black, and threaten the utter expirition of the house of David; but I have said, and I have warrant from the word of God to say it, that mercy shall be built up for ever." As the goodness of God's nature is to be the matter of our song, (v. 1.) so much more the mercy that is built for us in the covenant; it is still increasing, like a house in the building up, and shall continue our rest for ever, like a house built up. It shall be built up for ever; for the everlasting habitations we hope for in the new Jerusalem are of this building. If mercy shall be built for ever, then the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, shall be raised out of its ruins, and build itself as in the days of old, Amos ix. 11. Therefore mercy shall be built up for ever, because thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens. Though our expectations are, in some particular instances, disappointed, yet God's promises are not disannulled; they are established in the very heavens, that is, in his eternal counsels; they are above the changes of this lower region, and out of the reach of the opposition of hell and earth. The stability of the material heavens is an emblem of the truth of God's word; the heavens may be cloud ed by vapours arising out of the earth, but they can not be touched, they cannot be changed.

(2.) An abstract of the covenant upon which this faith and hope are built; I have said it, says the psalmist, for God hath sworn it, that the heirs of promise might be entirely satisfied of the immutability of his counsel. He brings in God speaking, (v. 3.) over to the comfort of his people, "I have made a covenant, and therefore will make it good." The covenant is made with David, the covenant of royalty is made with him, as the father of his family, and with his seed through him, and for his sake; representing the covenant of grace made with Christ as Head of the church, and with all believers as his spiritual seed. David is here called God's chosen, and his servant; and, as God is not changeable, he can not recede from his people, "I am not unrighteous to cast off one that served him. Two things encourage the psalmist to build his faith on this covenant; [1.] The ratification of it; it was confirmed with an oath; The Lord has sworn, and he will not repent. [2.] The perpetuity of it; the blessings of the covenant were not only secured to David himself, but were entailed on his family; it was promised that his family should continue; Thy seed will I establish for ever, so that David shall not want a son to reign; (Jer. xxxiii. 20, 21.) and that it should continue a royal family; I will build up thy throne to all generations, to all the generations of time. This has its accomplishment only in Christ, of the seed of David, who lives for ever, to whom God has given the throne of his father David, and of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end. Of this covenant the psalmist will return to speak more largely, v. 19, &c.

5. And the heavens shall praise thy works, O Lord; thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints. 6. For who in the heaven can be compared unto the Lord? who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the Lord? 7. God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him. 8. O Lord God of hosts, who is a strong Lord like unto thee? or to thy faithfulness round about thee?

9. Thou rulest the raging of the sea: when the waves thereof arise, thou stillest them.

10. Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces, as one that is slain: thou hast scattered thine enemies with thy strong arm. 11. The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine: as for the world, and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them. 12. The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name. 13. Thou hast a mighty arm: strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand. 14. Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne: mercy and truth shall go before thy face.

These verses are full of the praises of God. Observe,

I. Where, and by whom, God is to be praised.

1. God is praised by the angels above; The heavens shall praise thy wonders, O Lord; (v. 5.) that is, “the glorious inhabitants of the upper world continually celebrate thy praises:” Bless the Lord, ye his angels, cii. 20. The works of God are wonders even to them that are best acquainted, and most intimately conversant, with them; the more God’s works are known, the more they are admired and praised. This should make us love heaven, and long to be there, that there we shall have nothing else to do than to praise God and his wonders.

2. God is praised by the assemblies of his saints on earth; (praise waiteth for him in Zion;) and though they fall so far short of the praises of angels, yet God is pleased to take notice of them, and accept of them, and reckons himself honored by them. “Thy faithfulness, and the truth of thy promise, that rock on which the church is built, shall be praised in the congregation of the saints, who owe their all to that faithfulness, and whose constant comfort it is that there is a promise, and that he is faithful who has promised.” It is expected from God’s saints on earth that they praise him; who, if they do not? Let every saint praise him, but especially the congregation of saints, when they come together, let them join in praising God; the more the better, it is the more like heaven. Of the honour done to God by the assembly of the saints, he speaks again; (v. 7.) God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints; saints should assemble for religious worship, that they may publicly own their relation to God, and may stir up one another to give honour to him, and, in keeping of the worship, may maintain the communion of saints. In religious assemblies, God has promised the presence of his grace, but we must also, in them, have an eye to his glorious presence, that the familiarity we are admitted to may not breed the least contempt; for he is terrible in his holy places, and therefore greatly to be feared. A holy awe of God must fall upon us, and fill us, in all our approaches to God, even in the midst of our religious services, we shall be added by the solemnity of public assemblies. God must be had in reverence of all that are about him, that attend him continually as his servants, or approach him upon any particular errand. See Lev. x. 3. Those only serve God acceptably who serve him with reverence and godly fear, Heb. xii. 28.

11. What it is to praise God; it is to acknowledge him: to be a Being of unparalleled perfection, such a one that there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him, v. 6. If there be any beings that can pretend to vie with God, surely they must be found among the angels; but they are infinitely short of him; Who in the heaven can be compared with the Lord, so as to challenge any share of the reverence and adoration which are due to him only, or to set up in rivalry with him for the homage of the children of men? They are sons of the mighty, but which of them can be likened unto the Lord? Nobles are princes’ peers; some parity there is between them, but none between God and the angels; they are not their peers. To whom shall ye liken me, or shall I be equal saith the Holy One. Isa. xl. 25. This is insisted on again, (v. 8.) Who is a strong Lord like unto thee? No angel, no curiously potentate, whatsoever, is comparable to God, or has an arm like him, or can thunder with a voice like him. Thy faithfulness is round about thee; that is, “thine angels, who are round about thee, attending thee with their praises, and ready to go on thine errands, are all faithful.” Or rather, “In every thing thou dostst, willst, or hast, didst, or art to do, to approve thyself faithful to thy word, above whatever prince or potentate was.” Among men, it is too often found that those who are most able to break their word are least careful to keep it; but God is both strong and faithful; he can do every thing, and yet will never do an unjust thing.

II. What we ought, in our praises, to give God the glory of. Several things are here mentioned.

1. The command God has of the most uncontrollable creatures; (v. 9.) Thou rulest the raging of the sea, than which nothing is more frightful or threatening, nor more out of the power of man to give check to; it can swell no higher, roll no further, beat no harder, continue no longer, nor do any more hurt, than God suffers it. “When the waves thereof arise, thou canst immediately, I would think, subdue them asleep, still them, and make them quiet, and turn the storm into a calm.” This coming in here can act of omnipotence, what manner of man, then, was the Lord Jesus, whom the winds and seas obeyed?

2. The victories God has obtained over the enemies of his church; his ruling the raging of the sea, and quelling its billows, was an emblem of this; (v. 10.) Thou hast broken Rahab; many a proud enemy, so it signifies; Egypt in particular, which is sometimes called Rahab; broken it in pieces, as it were, that it should rise no more, and make head again.” The head being broken, thou hast scattered the remainder with the arm of thy strength.” God has more ways than one to deal with his and his church’s enemies; we think he should slay them immediately, but sometimes he scatters them, that he may send them abroad to be monuments of his justice, lx. 11. The remembrance of the breaking of Egypt in pieces is a comfort to the church, in reference to the present power of Babylon; for God is still the same.”

3. The incontestable property he has in all the creatures of the upper and lower world; (v. 11, 12.) “Men are honoured for their large possessions; but the heavens are thine, O Lord, the earth also is thine; therefore we praise thee, therefore we trust in thee, therefore we will not fear what man can do against us. The world and the fulness thereof, all the riches contained in it, all the inhabitants of it, both high and low, are thy property, for thou hast created them.” And the Foudam may justly claim to be the Owner. He specifies, (1.) The remotest parts of the world, the north and south, the countries that lie under the two poles, which are uninhabited and little known; “Thou hast created them, and therefore knowest them, takest care of them, and hast tributes of praise from them.” The north is said to be hung over the empty places; yet what fulness there is there.

God is the owner of it. (2.) The highest parts of the world; he mentions the two highest hills in Canaan; " Tabor and Hermon," (one lying to the west, the other to the east.) " these shall rejoice in thy name, for they are under the care of thy providence, and they produce offerings for thine altar."

The little hills are said to rejoice in their own fulness, because they are considered as opposed to the higher mountain in Galilee, on the top of which Christ was transfigured; and then, indeed, it might be said to rejoice in that voice which was there heard, This is my beloved Son.

4. The power and justice, the mercy and truth, with which he governs the world, and rules in the affairs of the children of men, v. 13, 14. (1.) God is able to do every thing; for he is the Lord God Almighty. His arm, his hand, is mighty and strong, to save his people, and to destroy his and their enemies; none can either resist the force, or bear the weight, of his mighty hand. High is his right hand, to reach the highest, even those that set their nets among the stars; (Amos ix. 2, 3. Obad. iv.) his right hand is exalted in what he has done, for in thousands of instances he has signalized his power, cxviii. 16. (2.) He never did, nor ever will do, any thing that is either unjust or unwise: for righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. None of all his dictates or decrees ever varied from the rules of equity and wisdom, nor could ever any charge God with unrighteousness or folly. Justice and judgment are the preparing of his throne, (so some,) the establishment of it, so others; the preparations for his government in his counsels from eternity, and the establishment of it in its consequences to eternity, are all justice and judgment.

v. 3. He always does that which is kind to his people, and consonant to the word which he has spoken; "Mercy and truth shall go before thy face, to prepare thy way, as harbinger to make room for thee; mercy in promising, truth in performing; truth in being as good as thy word, mercy in being better." How praiseworthy are these in great men, much more in the great God, in whom they are in perfection!

15. Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance. 16. In thy name shall they rejoice all the day: and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted. 17. For thou art the glory of their strength; and in thy favour our horn shall be exalted. 18. For the Lord is our defence; and the Holy One of Israel is our King.

The psalmist, having largely showed the blessedness of the God of Israel, here shows the blessedness of the Israel of God. As there is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, so, happy art thou, O Israel, there is none like unto thee, O people, especially as a type of the gospel-Israel, consisting of all true believers, whose happiness is here described.

1. Glorious discoveries are made to them, and glad tidings of good brought to them; they hear, they know, the joyful sound, v. 15. This may allude, (1.) To the shout of a victorious army, the shout of a king, Numb. xxix. 21. Israel has the tokens of God's presence with them in their wars; the sound of the going in the top of the mulberry tree, Mic. vii. 15. They were thus clothed with the splendor of the Lord, Zech. vi. 11. and they often returned making the earth ring with their songs of triumph; these were joyful sounds. It may allude, (2.) To the sound that was made over the sacrifices, and on the solemn feast-day, lxxxi. 1–3. This was the happiness of Israel, that they had among them the free and open profession of God's holy religion, and abundance of joy in their sacrifices. It may allude, (3.) To the sound of the jubilee-trumpet; a joyful sound it was to servants and debtors, to whom it proclaimed release. The gospel is indeed a joyful sound; a sound of victory, of the things to come, Ps. lxv. 18, in which the abundant fulness of the world, which they shall possess in abundance of rains, blessed are the people that hear it, and know it, and bid it welcome.

2. Special tokens of God's favour are granted them; They shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance; they shall govern themselves by thy conduct, guided by thine eye; and they shall delight themselves in thy consolations; they shall have the favour of God, they shall know that they have it, and it shall be continual matter of joy and rejoicing to them; they shall go through all the exercises of a holy life under the powerful influences of God's loving-kindness, which shall make their duty pleasant to them, and make them sincere in it, aiming at this, as their end, to be accepted of the Lord. We then walk in the light of the Lord when we fetch all our comforts from God's favour, and are very careful to keep ourselves in his love.

The saying, They shall be exalted, is a great argument for a religion that wants matter for joy; blesses God's people for, in his view of them, hereby he has made himself known, if it be not their own fault, they shall rejoice all the day. They that rejoice in Christ Jesus, and make God their exceeding joy, have enough to balance their grievances, and silence their griefs; and therefore their joy is still, (1 John i. 4.) and constant; it is their duty to rejoice evermore.

Their relation to God is their honour and dignity; they are happy, for they are high. Surely in the Lord, in the Lord Christ, they have righteousness and strength, and so are recommended by him to the divine acceptance; and therefore in him shall all the seed of Israel glory, Isa. xlvi. 24, 25. So it is here, v. 16, 17. (1.) "In thy righteousness shall they be exalted, and not in any righteousness of their own." We are exalted out of danger, and into honour, purely by the righteousness of Christ, which we have, both for dignity and for display.

(2.) "Thou art the glory of their strength," that is, "thou art their Strength, and it is their glory that thou art so, and what they glory in." Thanks be to God, who always causes us to triumph. (3.) "In thy favour, which, through Christ, we hope for, our horn shall be exalted;" the horn denotes beauty, plente, and power; these they have who are made accepted in the Beloved. What greater preference can be more capable of in this world than to be God's favourites?

5. Their relation to God is their protection and safety; (v. 18.) "For our shield is of the Lord," so the margin; "and our king is from the Holy One of Israel." If God be our Ruler, he will be our Defender; and who is he, then, that can harm us? It was the happiness of Israel that God himself had the erecting of their bulwarks, and the calling of them a holy nation; so, as some take it; or rather, that he was himself a Wall of fire round about them, and, as a Holy One, the Author and Centre of their holy religion; he was their King, and so their Glory in the midst of them. Christ is the Holy One of Israel, that Holy Thing; and in nothing was that peculiar people more blessed than in this, that He was born King of the Jews. New this account of the blessedness of God's Israel comes in here as that to which it was hard to reconcile their present calamitous state.

19. Then thou spakest in vision to thy Holy One, and saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty; I have exalted one chosen of the people. 20. I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him; 21. With whom my hand shall be established; mine arm also shall strengthen him. 22. The enemy shall not exact upon him; nor the son of wickedness afflict him. 23. And I will beat down his foes before his face, and plague them that hate him. 24. But my faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him; and in my name shall his horn be exalted. 25. I will set his hand also in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers. 26. He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the Rock of my salvation. 27. Also I will make him my first-born, higher than the kings of the earth. 28. My mercy will I keep for him for evermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him. 29. His seed also will I make to endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven. 30. If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments; 31. If they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments; 32. Then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. 33. Nevertheless my loving-kindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. 34. My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. 35. Once have I sworn by my holiness, that I will not lie unto David. 36. His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me. 37. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven. Selah.

The covenant God made with David and his seed was mentioned before; (v. 3, 4.) but in these verses it is enlarged upon, and pleaded with God, for favour to the royal family, now almost sunk and ruined; yet certainly it looks at Christ, and has its accomplishments in him much more than in David; nay, some passages here are scarcely applicable at all to David, but must be understood of Christ only, who is therefore called David's King; (Hos. iii. 5.) and very great and precious promises they are which are here made to the Redeemer, which are strong foundations for the faith and hope of the redeemed to build upon. The comforts of our redemption flow from the covenant of redemption, all our springs are in that, Isa. lv. 3. I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David, Acts xiii. 34. Now here we have an account of these sure mercies. Observe, I. What assurance we have of the truth of the promise, which may encourage us to build upon it. We are here told, 1. How it was spoken; (v. 19.) Thou speakest in vision to thy Holy One. God's promise to David, which is especially referred to here, was spoken in vision to Nathan the prophet, 2 Sam. vii. 12.-17. Then when the Holy One of Israel and their King, (v. 18.) then he appointed David to be his viceroy. But to all the prophets, those holy ones, he speaks in vision concerning Christ, and to him himself especially, who had lain in his bosom from eternity, and was made perfectly con- quainted with the whole design of redemption, Mat. xi. 27. 2. How it was sworn to, and ratified. (35.) Once have I sworn by my Holiness, that darlings of duty. In swearing by his Holiness, he swears by himself, for he will, as soon cease to be as he otherwise than holy. His swearing being done, he does not need to swear again, as David did; (1 Sam. xx. 17.) for his word and oath are two immutable things. As Christ was made a Priest, so he was made a King, by an oath; (Heb. vii. 21.) for his kingdom and priesthood are both unchangeable.

II. The choice made of the person to whom the promise is given, v. 19, 20. David was a king of God's own choosing, so is Christ, and the before both are called God's kings, Ps. ii. 6. David was greater than a man of courage, and fit for business; he was chosen out of the people; not out of the princes, but the shepherd's God found him out, exalted him, and laid help upon him, and ordered Samuel to anoint him. But this is especially to be applied to Christ; 1. He is one that is mighty, every way qualified for the great work he was to undertake, able to save to the uttermost; mighty in strength for he is the Son of God; mighty in love, for he is able experimentally to compassion those that are tempted. He is the mighty God, Isa. ix. 6. He is chosen out of the people, one of us, bone of our bone, that takes part with us of flesh and blood; being ordained for men, he is taken from among men, that his terror might not make us afraid. 3. God has found him. He is a Saviour of God's own providing, for the salvation, from first to last, is purely the Lord's doing; he has found the ransom, Job xxxiii. 24. We could never have found a person fit to undertake this great work, Rev. v. 3, 4. 4. God has laid help on him; not only helped him, but treasured up help in him for us; laid it as a charge upon him to help fallen man up again, to help the chosen remnant to heaven; In me is thy help, Is. xii. 9. 5. He has exalted him, by constituting him the Prophet, Priest, and King, of his church; clothing him with power, raising him from the dead, and setting him at his own right hand. Whom God chooses and uses he will exalt. 6. He has anointed him, has qualified him for his office, and so confirmed him in it, by giving him the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure, infinitely above his fellows. He is called Messiah, or Christ, the Anointed. 7. All this he designed him to be his own servant, for the accomplishing of his eternal purpose, and the advancement of the interest of his kingdom among men.

III. The promises made to this chosen one, to David in the type, and the Son of David in the antitype, in which not only gracious, but glorious, things are spoken of him. 1. With reference to himself, as king and God's servant, and what makes for him, makes for all his loving subjects; this is here promised, (1.) That God would stand by him and strengthen him in his undertaking; (v. 19.) With him my hand not only shall be, but shall be exalted upon the promise; shall be so established, that he shall by it be established and confirmed in all his offices, so that none of them shall be undermined and overthrown, though by the man of sin they shall all be encroached and fought against. Christ had a great deal of work to do, and hard usage to go through, but He that gave him commission gave him forces sufficient for the execution of his commission; Mine arm also shall strengthen my people to break through and bear up under all his difficulties. No good work can miscarry in the hand of those whom God himself undertakes to strengthen. (2.) That he should be victorious over his enemies, that they should not encroach upon him;
(v. 22.) The son of wickedness shall not exalt upon him, nor afflict him. He that at first brake the peace would set himself against him that undertook to make peace, and do what he could to blast his design; but he could only reach to bruise his heel, further he could not exact upon him or afflict him. Christ became a Surety for our debt, and thereby Satan and death thought to have gained advantage against him; but he satisfied the deman-This is a comment upon these words in Nathan's message concerning Solomon: (for he also was a type of Christ as well as David:) I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, (2 Sam. vii. 14.) and the relation shall be owned on both sides. (1.) He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father. It is probable that Solomon did so; but we are sure Christ did so, in the days of his flesh, when he offered up strong cries to God, and called him holy Father, (Mark xi. 1.) and therefore it was necessary to declare to ourselves to him as our Father in heaven. Christ, in his agony, cried unto God, Thou art my Father, (Matt. xxvi. 39, 42.) O my Father, and, upon the cross, Father, forgive them; Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. He looked upon him likewise as his God, and therefore he perfectly obeyed him, and submitted to his will in his whole undertaking; (he is my God and your God, John xxi. 17.) and as Rock of his side, who would bear him up, and bear him out, in his undertaking, and make him more than a Conqueror, even a complete Saviour, and therefore, with an undaunted resolution, he endured the cross, despising the shame, for he knew he should be both justified and glorified. (2.) I will make him my First-born. I see not how this can be applied to David; it is Christ's prerogative to be the First-born of every creature, and, as such, the Heir of all things, Col. i. 15. Heb. i. 2, 6. When all power was delivered to Christ, (Rev. xxi. 5.) then all things were delivered unto him by the Father, then God made him his First-born, and far higher, more great and honourable, than the kings of the earth, for he is the King of kings, angels, authori-While with his throne; now this will be differently understood, according as we apply it to Christ or David.

(1.) If we apply it to David, by his seed we are to understand his successors, Solomon and the following kings of Judah, who descended from the loins of David; it is supposed that they might degenerate, and not walk in the spirit and steps of the first-born, but in their own; and therefore God did not expect to come under divine rebukes, such as the house of David was at this time under, v. 38. But let this encourage them, that, though they were corrected, they should not be abandoned or disinherit-This refers to that part of Nathan's message, (2 Sam. vii. 14, 15.) If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him, but my mercy shall not depart from him. Thus far David's seed and throne did endure for ever, that, notwithstanding the wick-This kingdom extended itself to the great sea, and the Red sea, to the river of Egypt, and the river Eu-phrates. But it is in the kingdom of the Messiah that this has its full accomplishment, and shall have more and more, when the kingdoms of this world shall become as the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ, (Rev. xi. 15.) and the staves shall be for his kingdom. (5.) That he should own God as his Father, and Christ would own him as his Son, his First-born, v. 26, 27. This is a comment upon these words in Nathan's message concerning Solomon: (for he also was a type of Christ as well as David:) I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, (2 Sam. vii. 14.) and the relation shall be owned on both sides. (1.) He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father. It is probable that Solomon did so; but we are sure Christ did so, in the days of his flesh, when he offered up strong cries to God, and called him holy Father, (Mark xi. 1.) and therefore it was necessary to declare to ourselves to him as our Father in heaven. Christ, in his agony, cried unto God, Thou art my Father, (Matt. xxvi. 39, 42.) O my Father, and, upon the cross, Father, forgive them; Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. He looked upon him likewise as his God, and therefore he perfectly obeyed him, and submitted to his will in his whole undertaking; (he is my God and your God, John xxi. 17.) and as Rock of his side, who would bear him up, and bear him out, in his undertaking, and make him more than a Conqueror, even a complete Saviour, and therefore, with an undaunted resolution, he endured the cross, despising the shame, for he knew he should be both justified and glorified. (2.) I will make him my First-born. I see not how this can be applied to David; it is Christ's prerogative to be the First-born of every creature, and, as such, the Heir of all things, Col. i. 15. Heb. i. 2, 6. When all power was delivered to Christ, (Rev. xxi. 5.) then all things were delivered unto him by the Father, then God made him his First-born, and far higher, more great and honourable, than the kings of the earth, for he is the King of kings, angels, authori- and the staves shall be for his kingdom. (5.) That he should own God as his Father, and Christ would own him as his Son, his First-born, v. 26, tual seed, the heirs of the righteousness of faith, Rom. xi. 7.

(2.) If we apply it to Christ, by his seed we are to understand his subjects, all believers, his spiritual seed, the children which God has given him, Heb. ii. 13. This is that seed which shall be made to endure for ever, and his throne in the midst of them, in the church, in the heart, as the days of heaven. To the end Christ shall be king in the world to come and honour him; He shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days. This holy seed shall endure for ever in a glorified state, when time and days shall be no more; and thus Christ's throne and kingdom shall be perpetuated; the kingdom of his grace shall continue through all the ages of time, and the kingdom of his glory to the endless ages of eternity.

[1.] The continuance of Christ's kingdom is here made doubtful by the sins and afflictions of his subjects; their iniquities and calamities threaten the ruin of it. This case is here put, that we may not be offended when it comes to be a case in fact, but that we may reconcile it with the stability of the covenant, and be assured of that notwithstanding.

First, It is here supposed that there will be much amiss in the subjects of Christ's kingdom. His children may forsake God's laws, (v. 30.) by omissions, and thus violate the statutes, (v. 31.) by commissions. There are spots, which are the spots of God's children, Deut. xxxii. 5. Many corruptions there are in the bowels of the church, as well as in the hearts of those who are members of it, and these corruptions break out.

Secondly, They are here told that they must smart for it; (v. 32.) I will visit their transgression with a rod, their transgression sooner than that of others; you only have I known, says the Lord; I will visit them; Amos vii. 2. Their being related to Christ, shall not excuse them from being called to an account. But observe what affliction is to God's people, 1. It is but a rod, but not an axe, not a sword; it is for correction, not for destruction. This denotes gentleness in the affliction, it is the rod of men, such a rod as men use in correcting their children; and it denotes a design of good in it by the affliction, such a rod as yields the peacable fruit of correction.

2. It is in the hand of God; (I will visit them;) he who is wise, and knows what he does, gracious, and will do what is best. 3. It is a rod which they shall never feel the smart of, but when there is great need; If they break my law, then I will visit their transgression with the rod, but not else. Then it is requisite that God's honour be vindicated, and that they be humbled and reduced.

[2.] The continuance of Christ's kingdom is made certain by the inviolable promise and oath of God, notwithstanding all this; (v. 33.) Nevertheless, my kindness will I not totally and finally take from him. First, "Notwithstanding their provocations, yet my covenant shall not be broken." Note, Afflictions are not only consistent with covenant-love, but to the people of God they flow from it. Though David's seed be chastened, it does not follow that they are disinterested; they may be cast down, but they are not cast off. God's favour is continuing to his people. 1. For Christ's sake; in him the mercy is laid up for us, and God says, I will not take it from him; (v. 33.) I will not lie unto David, v. 35. We are unworthy, but he is worthy. 2. For the covenant's sake; My faithfulness shall not fail, my covenant will I not break. It was supposed that they had broken God's statutes, profaned and polluted them, so the word signifies, But, says God, I will not break, I will not profane and pollute, my covenant; it is the same word. That which is said and sworn, is, that God will have a church in the world, as long as sun and moon endure, v. 36, 37. The sun and moon are faithful witnesses in heaven of the wisdom, power, and goodness, of the Creator, and shall continue while time lasts, which are the measurers of; but the seed of Christ shall be established for ever, as lights of the world while the world stands, to shine in it, and when it is at an end, they shall be established lights, shining in the firmament of the Father.

38. But thou hast cast off and abhorred, thou hast been wroth with thine anointed. 39. Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant; thou hast profaned his crown, by casting it to the ground. 40. Thou hast broken down all his hedges; thou hast brought his strong holds to ruin. 41. All that pass by the way spoil him; he is a reproach to his neighbours. 42. Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries; thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice. 43. Thou hast also turned the edge of his sword, and not made him to stand in the battle. 44. Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground. 45. The days of his youth hast thou shortened; thou hast covered him with shame. Selah. 46. How long, Lord? wilt thou hide thyself for ever? shall thy wrath burn like fire? 47 Remember how short my time is: wherefore hast thou made all men in vain? 48. What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave? Selah. 49. Lord, where are thy former loving-kindnesses, which thou swearest unto David in thy truth? 50. Remember, Lord, the reproach of thy servants; how I do bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people; 51. Where with thine enemies have reproached, O Lord; wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed. 52. Blessed be the Lord for evermore. Amen, and amen.

In these verses, we have,

1. A very melancholy complaint of the present deplorable state of David's family, which the psalmist thinks hard to be reconciled to the covenant God made with David. Thou saidst thou wouldest not take away thy loving-kindness, but thou hast cast off. Sometimes, it is no easy thing to reconcile God's providences with his promises, and yet we are sure they are reconcilable, for God's works fulfil his word, and never contradict it.

2. David's heart seems to have lost its interest in God, which was the greatest strength and beauty of it. God had been pleased with his anointed, but now he was wroth with him; (v. 38.) had entered into covenant with the family, but now, for aught he could perceive, he had made void the covenant, not broken some of the articles of it, but cancelled it, v. 39. We misconstrue the runebes of Providence, if we think they make void the covenant. When the great Anointed One, Christ himself, was upon the cross, God seemed to have cast him off, and was wroth with, and yet did not make void his.

The honour of the house of David was lost, and laid in the dust; Thou hast profaned his crowns, (which was always looked upon as sacred,) by casting it to the ground, to be trampled on, v. 39. Thou hast made his glory to cease, (so uncertain is all earthly glory, and so soon does it wither,) and thou hast cast his throne down to the ground, not only deterred the king, but put a period to the kingdom, v. 44. If it were penned in Rehoboam's time, as it was in the greatest part of the kingdom, five parts of six; if in Zedekiah's time, it was more remarkably true of the poor remainder. Note, Thrones and crowns are uttering things, and are often laid in the dust, but there is a crown of glory reserved for Christ's spiritual seed, which faeth not away.

3. It was exposed, and made a prey to all the neighbours, who insulted over that ancient and honourable family; (v. 40.) Thou hast broken down all his hedges, all those things that were a defence to them, and particularly that hedge of protection which they thought God's covenant and promise had made about them, and thou hast made even his strong holds a ruin, so that they were rather a reproach to them than any shelter. All that pass by the way shoulh him, (v. 41.) and make an easy prey of him; see lxxx. 12, 13. The enemies talk insolently; He is a reproach to his neighbours, who triumph over his fall from six to one. Nay, every one helps forward the calamity, (v. 42.) "Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries, not only given them power, but inclined them to turn their power this way." If the enemies of the church lift up their hand against it, we must see God setting up their hand, for they could have no power, unless it were given them from above. But when God does permit them to do mischief to his church, it pleases him; "Thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice; and this is for thy glory, that those who hate thee, shall have the pleasure to see the tears and troubles of those that love thee?"

4. It was disabled to help itself; (v. 43.) "Thou hast turned the edge of his sword, and made it blunt, that it cannot do execution as it has done; and (which is worse) thou hast turned the edge of his spirit, and taken off his courage, and hast not made him to stand as he used to do in the battle." The spirit of Rehoboam was a Francis of Assisi; a man of peace, the avoidance of war, makes him, nor can we stand with any strength or resolution, further than God is pleased to uphold us. If men's hearts fail them, it is God that dispirits them, but it is sad with the church, when those cannot stand who should stand up for it.

5. It was upon the brink of an inglorious exit; (v. 45.) The days of his youth hast thou shortened; it is ready to be cut off, like a young man in the flower of his age. This should intimiate that it was penned in Rehoboam's time, when the house of David was but in the days of its youth, and yet waxed old, and began to decay already. Thus it was covered with shame, and it was turned very much to its reproach, that a family, which, in the first and second reign, looked so great, and made such a figure, should, in the third, dwindle and look so little as the house of David did in Rehoboam's time. But it may be applied to the captivity in Babylon, which, in comparison with that of Jeroboam, was not so ignominious, but in the days of the captivity, the days of the youth of that kingdom. However, the kings then had remarkably the days of their youth shortened, for it was in the days of their youth, when they were about thirty years old, that Jehoiachim and Zedekiah were carried captives to Babylon.

From all this complaint let us learn, (1.) What work sin makes with families, noble royal families, with families in which religion has been uppermost, when posterity degenerates, it falls into disgrace and iniquity stains their glory. (2. How apt we are to think that the promise of the church in something external, and to think the promise fails, and the covenant is made void, if we be disappointed of that; a mistake which we now are inexcusable if we fall into, since our Master has so expressly told us that his kingdom is not of this world.

II. A very pathetic expostulation with God upon this. Four things they plead with God for mercy.

1. The long continuance of the trouble; (v. 46.) For how long wilt thou make us to dwell in captivity? What is this captivity ever? That which grieved them most, was, that God himself, as one displeased, did not appear to them by his prophets to comfort them, did not appear for them by his providences to deliver them, and that he had kept them long in the dark; it seemed an eternal night, when God was withdrawn; Thou hidest thyself for ever. Nay, God not only hid himself from them, but seemed to set himself against them; "Shall thy wrath burn like fire? How long shall it burn? Shall it never be put out? What is hell, but the wrath of God, burning for ever? And is that the lot of thine anointed?"

2. The shortness of life, and the certainty of death; "Lord, let thine anger cease, and return thou, in mercy to us, remembering how short my time is, and how sure the period of my time. Lord, since my life is so transitory, and will, ere long, be at an end, let it not be always miserable, that I should remain all this time, in the midst of hell, without a hope of help, nor of a happy end." Job pleads thus, ch. x. 20, 21. And, probably, the psalmist here urges it in the name of the house of David, and the present prince of that house, the days of whose youth were shortened, v. 45.

(1.) He pleads the shortness and vanity of life; (v. 47.) Remember how short my time is, how transitory I am, say some; therefore unable to bear the power of thy wrath, and therefore a proper object of thy pity. Wherefore hast thou made all men in vanity? Unto what vanity hast thou created all the sons of Adam? Now, this may be understood either, [1.] As speaking a great truth. If the ancient loving-kindnesses spoken of, (v. 49.) be forgotten, (those relating to another life,) man is indeed made in vain; considering man as mortal, if there were not a future state on the other side, we might be ready to think that man was made in vain, and was in vain endowed with the noble powers and noble endowments. It was not God's will, but the designs, and desires; but God would not make man in vain, therefore, Lord, remember those loving-kindnesses. Or, [2.] As bespeaking a strong temptation that the psalmist was in. It is certain, God has not made all men, nor any man, in vain, Isa. xliv. 18. For, First, If we think that God has made man in vain, because so many have short lives, and long afflictions, in this world, it is true that God has made them so, but it is not true that therefore they are the less happy. The days of the troubled, the days full of trouble, may yet glorify God, and do some good, may keep their communion with God, and get to heaven, and then they are not made in vain. Secondly, If we think that God has made man in vain, because the most of men neither serve him, nor enjoy him, it is true, that, as to themselves, they were made in vain, better for them had they not been born, than not to be born again; but it was not owing to the enjoyment of God, but to the neglect of God. Thirdly, If we think that God has made all things for himself, even the wicked for the day of evil, and these whom he is not glorified by, he will be glorified upon.

(2.) He pleads the universality and unavoidableness of death; (v. 48.) What man? (what strong man, so the word is) "is he that liveth, and shall not see death? The king himself, of the house of David, is not exempted from the sentence, from the stroke: Lord, since he is under a fatal necessity of dying, let not his whole life be made thus miserable. Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave? No, he shall not when his time is come. Let him not, therefore, be delivered into the hand of the grave, by the miseries of a dying life, till his time is come. 10 We must learn here, that death is the end of all men; our eyes must shortly be closed to see death; there is no discharge from that war, nor any balm to be taken to save us from the prison of the grave. It concerns us, therefore, to make sure a happiness on the other side of death and the grave; that, when we fail, we may be received into everlasting habitations.

3. The next plea is taken from the kindness God had for, and the covenant he made with, his servant David; (v. 49.) "Lord, where are thy former loving-kindnesses, which thou showedst, nay, which thou swornst to David in thy truth, and in thy mercy? Wilt thou fail of doing what thou hast promised? Wilt thou undo what thou hast done? Art not thou still the same? Why then may not we have the benefit of the former sure mercies of David?" God's unchangeableness and faithfulness assure us that God will not cast off those whom he has chosen and covenanted with.

4. The last plea is taken from the insinuation of the enemies, and the inactivity done to God's servants; (v. 50.) "Remember, Lord, the reproach, and let it be rolled away from us, and returned upon our enemies." (1.) They were God's servants that were reproached, and the abuses done to them reflected upon their Master, especially since it was for serving him that they were reproached. (2.) The reproach cast upon God's servants was a very grievous barter to all that were concerned for the honour of God; "I bear in my bosom the reproach of all the Gentiles every day, and my iniquities are as a heavy burden upon me; it is what I lay much to heart, and can scarcely keep up my spirits under the weight of." (3.) "They are thine enemies who do thus reproach us; and wilt thou not appear against them as such?" (4.) They have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed. They reflected upon all the steps which the king had taken in the course of his administration, tracked him in all his motions, that they might make invidious remarks upon every thing he has said, done, or written. If we may apply it to Christ, the Lord's Messiah, they reproached the Jews with his footsteps, the slowness of his coming. They have reproached the delays of the Messiah; so Dr. Hammond. They called him, He that should come; but, because he was not yet come, because he did not now come to deliver them out of the hands of their enemies, when they had none to deliver them, they told them he would never come, they must give over looking for him. The scoffers of the latter days do, in like manner, reproach the footsteps of the Messiah, when they ask, Where is the promise of his coming? 2 Pet. iii. 3, 4. The reproaching of the footsteps of the anointed, some refer to the serpent's bruising of the heel of the Seed of the woman; or, to the sufferings of Christ's followers, who tread in his footsteps, and are reproached for his name's sake.

2. He concludes with praise, even after this sad complaint; (v. 52.) Blessed be the Lord for evermore, Amen, and amen. Thus he confronts the reproaches of his enemies; the more others blaspheme God, the more we should bless him. Thus he corrects his own complaints, chiding himself for quarrelling with God's providences, and questioning his promises; let both these sinful passions be silenced with the praises of God. However it be, yet God is good, and we will never think hardly of him; God is true, and we will never dis-trust him. Though the glory of David's house be stained and sulled, this shall be our comfort, that God is blessed for ever, and his glory cannot be eclipsed. If we would have the comfort of the stability of God's promise, we must give him the praise of it; in blessing God, we encourage ourselves. Here is a double Amen, according to the double signification Amen; so it is, God is blessed for ever; Amen; be it so, let God be blessed for ever. He began the psalm with thanksgiving, before he made his complaint, (v. 1.) and now he concludes it with a doxology. They who have God thanks for what he has done, may give him thanks also for what he will do; God will follow those with his mercies, who, in a right manner, follow him with their praises.

PSALM XC.

The foregoing psalm was supposed to be penned as late as the captivity in Babylon; this, it is plain, was penned as early as the deliverance out of Egypt, and yet they are put close together in this collection of divine songs. This psalm was penned by Moses, (as appears by the title,) the most ancient penman of sacred writ. We have upon record a praising song of his, (Exod. xv.) which is alluded to, (Rev. xvi. 3.) and an instructing song of his, (Deut. xxxii.) But this is of a different nature from that, for it is not so evident; it is suspected that this psalm was penned upon occasion of the sentence passed upon Israel in the wilderness for their unbelief, murmuring, and rebellion, that their canes should be turned into serpents, that the wilderbeast would be wasted away by a series of miseries for 38 years together, and that none of them that were then of age should enter Canaan. This was calculated for their wanderings in the wilderness, as that other song of Moses (Deut. xxxii. 19, 21.) was for their settlement in Canaan. We have the story to which this psalm seems to refer, Num. xiv. Probably, Moses penned this prayer, to be daily used, either by the people in their tents, or, at least, by the priests in the tabernacle service, through their tedious fatigue in the wilderness. In it, I. Moses comforts himself and his people with the eternity of God, and their interest in him, v. 1, 2. II. He humbles himself and his people, and prays with the wilderness, for the comfort of his servant, v. 3-8. III. He submits himself and his people to the righteous sentence of God passed upon them, v. 7-11. IV. He commits himself and his people to God by prayer for divine mercy and grace, and the return of God's favour, v. 12, 13. Though it seems to have been penned upon this particular occasion, yet it is very applicable to the frailty of human life in general, and, in singing it, we may easily apply it to the years of our passage through the wilderness of this world, and it furnish us with meditations and prayers very suitable to the solemnity of a funeral.

A prayer of Moses, the man of God.

LORD, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations. 2. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God. 3. Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men. 4. For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night. 5. Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass which groweth up. 6. In the morning it florieth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth. This psalm is entitled a prayer of Moses; where, and in what volume, it was preserved from Moses's time till the collection of psalms was begun to be made, is uncertain; but, being divinely inspired, it was under a special protection; perhaps it was written in the book of Jasher, or the book of the wars of the Lord. Moses taught the people of Israel to pray, and put words into their mouths, which they might make use of in turning to the Lord. Moses is here called the man of God, because he was a prophet, the father of the prophets, and an eminent type of Christ.

In these verses, we are taught;
1. To give God the praise of his care concerning his people at all times, and concerning us in our days; (v. 1.) Lord, thou hast been to us a Habitation, or Dwelling-place; a Refuge, or Help, in all generations. Now that they were fallen under God's displeasure, and he threatened to abandon them, they plead his former kindnesses to their ancestors. Can it be expected that the gods of the heathen fathers the patriarchs, who dwelt there in tabernacles; but then God was their Habitation, and, wherever they went, they were at home, at rest, in him. Egypt had been a land of bondage to them for many years, but even then was their Refuge; and in him that poor oppressed people lived, and were kept in being. Note, True believers are at home in God, and that is their comfort, in reference to the distresses and troubles they meet with in this world. In him we may repose and shelter ourselves, as in our Dwelling-place.

2. To give God the glory of his eternity; (v. 2.) Before the mountains were brought forth, before he made the highest part of the dust of the world, (as it is expressed, Prov. viii. 26.) before the earth fell in travail; or, as we may read it, before thou hast formed the earth and the world, that is, before the beginning of time, thou hadst a being, even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God; an eternal God, whose existence has neither its commencement nor its period with time, nor is measured by the successions and revolutions of it; but who art the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, without beginning of days, or end of life, or change of time. Note, Against all the grievances that arise from our own mortality, and the mortality of our friends, we may take comfort from God's immortality; we are dying creatures, and all our comforts in the world are dying comforts, but God is an ever-living God, and they shall find him so, who have him for theirs.

3. To own God's absolute sovereign dominion over man, and his irresistible, incontestable, power to dispose of him as he pleases; (v. 3.) Thou turnest man to destruction, with a word's speaking, when thou pleasest, to the destruction of the body, of the soul, and the life; and thou sayest, Return, ye children of men. (1.) When God is, by sickness, or other afflictions, turning men to destruction, he does thereby call men to return unto him, that is, to repent of their sins, and live a new life. This God speaketh once, yea, twice, "Return unto me, from whom ye have revolted," Jer. iv. 1. (2.) When God is threatening to turn men to destruction, to bring them to death, and they have received a season of time within these times, sometimes he wonderfully recovers them, and says, as the English Translation reads it, Again thou sayest, Return to life and health again. For God kills, and makes alive again, brings down to the grave, and brings up. (3.) When God turns men to destruction, it is according to the general sentence passed upon all, which is this, "Return, ye children of men, one as well as another; return to your first principles, let the broken vial be filled again; [let us depart and not return (Gen. iii. 19) and let the soul return to God who gave it.]" Eccl. xii. 7. (4.) Though God turns all men to destruction, yet he will again say, Return, ye children of men, at the general resurrection, when, though a man dies, yet he shall live again; and then shalt thou call, and I will answer; (Job xiv. 14, 15.) thou shalt bid me return, and I shall return. The body, the soul, shall both return and unite again.

4. To acknowledge the infinite disproportion there is between God and men, v. 4. Some of the patriarchs lived near a thousand years; Moses knew it very well, and had recorded it; but what is their long life, to the eternal years of God. At eternal years, to us, are a long period, which we cannot expect to survive; or, if we could, it is what we could not retain the remembrance of; but it is, in thy sight, as yesterday, as one day, as that which is fittest in mind; nay, it is but as a watch of the night, which was but three hours. (1.) A thousand years are nothing to God's eternity, they are less than a day, than an hour, to a thousand years; betwixt a minute and a thousand years is as the time of a man's life is to the time of an insect's. (2.) To the patriarchs, there was none to live long. The lives of the patriarchs were nothing to God, not so much as the life of a child (that is born and dies the same day) is to theirs. (2.) All the events of a thousand years, whether past or to come, are as present to the Eternal Mind, as what was done yesterday, or the last hour, is to us, and more too. God will say, at the great day, to those whom he turns to destruction, Return, arise ye dead. But it might be objected against the doctrine of the resurrection, that it is a long time since it was expected, and it is not yet come. Let that be no difficulty, for a thousand years in God's sight are as but one day.

5. To see the frailty of man, and his vanity, even at his best estate, (v. 5, 6.) look upon all the children of men, and we shall see. (1.) That their life is a dying life; Thou carriest them away as with a flood, that is, they are continually gliding down the stream of time into the ocean of eternity; the flood is continually flowing, and they are carried away with it; as soon as we are born, we begin to die, and every day of our life carries us so much nearer death; or we are carried away violently and irresistibly, as with a flood of waters, as with an inundation, which sweeps away all before it; or, as the old world was carried away with Noah's flood. Though God promised not so to drown the world again, yet death is a constant deluge. (2.) That it is a dreaming life. Men are carried away as with a flood, and yet they are as a sleep; they consider not their own frailty, nor are aware how near they approach to an awful eternity. Like men asleep, they imagine great things to themselves, till death awakes them, and puts an end to the pleasing dream. Time passes unobserved by us, as it does with men asleep; and, when it is over, it is as nothing. (3.) That it is a short and transient life, like that of the grass, which grows up and flourishes in the morning, looks green and pleasant, but in the evening the mowers cut it down, and it immediately withers, changes its colour, and loses all its beauty. Death will change us shortly, perhaps suddenly; and it is a great change that death will make with us in the little time. Man in his prime, does but flourish as the grass, which is weak, and low, and tender, and exposed; and which, when the winter of old age comes, will wither of itself: but he may be mown down by disease or disaster, as the grass is, in the midst of summer. All flesh is as grass.

6. For we are consumed by thine anger and by thy wrath are we troubled. 8 Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, our secret sins in the light of thy countenance. 9 For all our days are passed away in thy wrath; we spend our years as a tale that is

10. The days of our years are three-score years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow: for it is soon cut off, and we fly away. 11. Who knoweth the power of thine anger? even according to thy fear; so is thy wrath.

Moses had, in the foregoing verses, lamented the frailty of human life in general; the children of men are as a sleep, and as the grass; but here he teaches the people of Israel to confess before God that righteous sentence of death which they were under in a special manner, and which by their sins they brought upon themselves; their share in the common lot of mortality was not enough, but they are, and must live and die, under peculiar tokens of God's displeasure: here they speak of themselves; We Israelites are consumed and troubled, and our days are passed away. 1. They are here taught to acknowledge the wrath of God to be the cause of all their miseries; We are consumed, we are troubled, and it is by thine anger and thy wrath that the days of our lives are passed away in thy wrath, v. 9. The afflictions of the saints often come purely from God's love, as Job's; but the rebukes of sinners, and of good men for their sins, must be seen coming from the anger of God, who takes notice of, and is much displeased with, the sins of Israel. We are too apt to look upon death as no more than a debt owing to nature; whereas it is not so; if the nature of man had continued in its primitive beauty and rectitude, there had been no such debt owing to it; it is a debt to the justice of God, a debt to the law. Sin entered into the world, and death by sin. Are we consumed by decays of nature, the infirmities of age, or any chronic disease? We must ascribe it to God's anger. Are we troubled by any surprising stroke? That also is the fruit of God's wrath, which is thus revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Then let us be taught to confess their sins, which had provoked the wrath of God against them; (v. 8.) Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, even our secret sins. It was not without cause that God was angry with them; he had said, Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt; but they had provoked him, and will own that, in passing this severe sentence upon them, he justly punished them; (1.) For their open contempts of him, and the daring affronts they had given him; Thou hast set our iniquities before thee. God had herein an eye to their unbelief and murmuring, their distrusting of his power, and their despising of the pleasant land: these he set before him, when he passed that sentence on them; those kindled the fire of God's wrath against them, and kept good things from them. (2.) For their more hidden departures from him; Thou hast set our secret sins, those which go no further than the heart, and are at the bottom of all the overt acts, thou hast set these in the light of thy countenance; thou hast discovered these, and brought these also to the account, and made us to see them, who before overlooked them. Secret sins are known to God, and shall be reckoned for. Those who in heart return into Egypt, who set up idols in their heart, shall be dealt with as revolters or idolaters. See the folly of those who go about to minister for them, for they cannot cover them. 3. They are taught to look upon themselves as dying and passing away, and not to think either of a long life, or of a pleasant one; for the decree gone forth against them is irreversible; (v. 9.) All our days are likely to be passed away in thy wrath, under the tokens of thy displeasure; and, though we are not quite deprived of the residue of our years, yet we are likely to spend them as a tale that is told. The 38 years, which, after this, they were away in the wilderness, were not the subject of the sacred history, for little or nothing is recorded of what was happened to them between the 38th and the 40th. After they came out of Egypt, their time was perfectly tried away, and was not worthy to be the subject of a history, but only of a tale that is told; for it was only to pass away time, like telling stories, that they spent these years in the wilderness; all that while, they were in the consuming, and another generation was in the raising. When they came out of Egypt, there were not one feeble heart among the people; (38. 23, 27.) before they were all feeble. Their joyful prospect of a prosperous glorious life in Canaan was turned into the melancholy prospects of a tedious inglorious death in the wilderness; so that their whole life was now as insignificant a thing as ever any winter-tale was. That is applicable to the state of every one of us in the wilderness of this world; We spend our years, we bring them to an end, each year, and all, at last, as a tale that is told. And so the 40th year, (so long,) which soon disappears; as a thought, (so soon,) than which nothing more quick; as a word, which is soon spoken, and then vanishes into air; or, as a tale that is told. The spending of our years is like the telling of a tale. A year, when it is past, is like a tale when it is told. Some of our years are as a pleasant story, others as a tragical one; most mixt, but all short and transient: that which was long in the doing may be told in a short time, our years, when they are gone, can no more be recalled than the word that we have spoken. The loss and waste of our time, which imply our fault and folly, may be thus complained of: we should spend our years, like the despatch of business, with care and industry; but, alas! we do spend them like the telling of a tale, idle, and to little purpose, carelessly, and without regard. Every year passed as a tale that is told; but what was the number of them? As they were vain, so they were few, (v. 10.) 70 or 80 at most, which may be understood, either, (1.) Of the lives of the Israelites in the wilderness; all those that were numbered when they came out of Egypt, above 20 years old, were to die within 38 years; they numbered those only that were able to go forth to war, most of whom, we may suppose, were between 20 and 40, who therefore must have all died before 80 years old, and many before 60, and, perhaps, even 40, which was far short of the years of the lives of their fathers. And those that lived to 70 or 80, yet, being under a sentence of consumption, and a melancholy despair of ever seeing through this wilderness-state, their strength, their life, was nothing but labour and sorrow, which otherwise would have been made a new life, by the joys of Canaan. See what work sin made. Or, (2.) To the lives of men in general, ever since the days of Moses, and the age of man, which is sad, for men for men to live about 100 years, or near 150; but since, 70 or 80 is the common stint, which few exceed, and multitudes never come near. We reckon those who have lived to the age of man, and to have had as large a share of life as they had reason to expect, who live to be 70 years old; and how short a time is that compared with eternity! Moses was the first that committed divine revelation to writing, which, before then, had been transmitted by tradition only. He was, perhaps, the first who drew the line between the world and the church, and was the first who taught the apostles, that the world was not to be courted, and the church to be preferred to it; and therefore there were not now the same reasons for men's living long that there had been. If, by reason of a strong constitution, some reach to 80 years, yet their strength then is what they have little joy of, it does but serve to prolong their misery, and make their death the more tedious; for even their strength then is labour and sorrow, much more their weakness; for the years are come which they have no pleasure in. Or, it may be taken thus: Our years are 70, and the years of some, by reason of strength, are 80; but the breadth of our years, (for so the latter words signify, rather than strength,) the whole extent of their days ancient and laboured; and, in the sweat of our face we must eat bread, our whole life is toilsome and troublesome; and, perhaps, in the midst of the years we count upon, it is soon cut off; and we fly away; and do not live out half our days.

4. They are taught by all this to stand in awe of the wrath of God; (v. 11.) Who knows the power of thine anger? (1.) None can perfectly comprehend it. The psalmist speaks as one afraid of God's anger, and amazed at the greatness of the power of it; who knows how far the power of God's anger can reach, and how deep it can wound? The angels that sinned knew experimentally the power of God's anger; damned sinners in hell know it; but which of us can fully comprehend or describe it? (2.) Few do seriously consider it as they ought. Who knows it, so as to improve the knowledge of it? Those who make a mock at sin, and make light of Christ, surely do not know the power of God's anger.

For, according to thy fear, so is thy wrath; God's wrath is equal to the apprehensions which the most thoughtful serious people have of it; let men have ever so great a dread upon them of the wrath of God, it is not greater than there is cause for, and than the nature of the thing deserves. God has not in his word represented his wrath more terrible than really it is; nay, what is felt in the other world is infinitely to old ages, is but labour in this world. Who among us can dwell with that devouring fire?

12. So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Return, O Lord, how long? and let it repent thee concerning thy servants. O satisfy us early with thy mercy; that we may rejoice and be glad all our days. Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil. Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. And let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us: and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it.

These are the petitions of this prayer, grounded upon the foregoing meditations and acknowledgments. Is any afflicted? Let him learn thus to pray.

1. For a sanctified use of the sad dispensation they were now under. Being condemned to have our days shortened, "Lord, teach us to number our days;" (v. 12.) Lord, give us grace duly to consider how few they are, and how little a while we have to live in this world. Note, (1.) It is an excellent art rightly to number our days, so as not to be out in our calculation, as he was who counted upon many years to come; when, that night, his soul was required of him. (2.) It is a wholesome apprehension of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the near approach of death and eternity. We must so number our days, as to compare our work with them, and mind it accordingly with double diligence, as those that have no time to trifle. (2.) Those that would learn this arithmetic, must pray for divine instruction, must go to God, and beg of him to teach them by his Spirit to put them upon considering, and to give them a good understanding.

2. That turning away of God's anger from them; that, though the decree was gone forth, and was past revocation, there was no remody, but they must die in the wilderness; "Yet return, O Lord, be thou reconciled to us, and let it repent thee concerning thy servants;" (v. 13.) send us tidings of peace to comfort us again after these heavy tidings. How long must we look upon ourselves as under thy wrath, and when shall we have some token given us of our restoration to thy favour? We are thy servants, thy people; (Isa. lix. 2.) will thou change thy way towards us? In answer to this prayer, and to show their profession of faith, (Numb. xiv. 39, 40.) God, in the next chapter, proceeded with the laws concerning sacrifices, (Numb. xv. 1, &c.) which was a token that it repented him concerning his servants, for if the Lord had been pleased to kill them, he would not have showed them such things as these.

3. For comfort and joy in the returns of God's favour to them, v. 14, 15. They pray for the mercy of God; "O satisfy us with thy mercy, not only that we may rejoice and be glad, not only for a time, upon the first indications of thy favour, but all our days, though we are to spend them in the wilderness." With respect to these that make God their chief Joy, as their joy may be full, (1 John i. 4.) so it may be constant, even in this vale of tears; it is their own fault if they are not glad all their days, for his mercy will furnish them with joy in tribulation, and nothing can separate them from it. (2.) That it would be a sufficient balance to their former griefs; "Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us;" (3.) that the days of our joy in thy favour be as many as the days of our pain for thy displeasure have been, and as pleasant as those have been gloomy. Lord, thou wert to set the one over against the other; (Eccl. vii. 14.) do so in our case; let it suffice that we have drunk so long of the cup of trembling, now put into our hands the cup of XL, let us therefore be content with the return of God's loving-kindness, as a sufficient recompense for all their troubles.

4. For the progress of the work of God among them notwithstanding, v. 16, 17. (1.) That he would manifest himself in carrying it on; "Let thy work appear upon thy servants; let it appear that thou hast wrought upon us, to bring us home to thyself, and to thy name. Thou art a father to thy servants, and art their God, who livest for ever."

In praying for God's grace, God's glory must be our end; and we must therein have an eye for our children as well as for ourselves. This divine privilege also may experience God's glory appearing upon us, so as to change them into the same image, from glory to glory. Perhaps, in this prayer, they distinguish between themselves and their children, for so God distinguished in his late message to them; (Num. xiv. 31.) To our cases shall fall in this wilderness, but thy little ones will I bring into Canaan; "Lord," say they, "let thy work appear upon us, to reform us, and bring us to a better temper, and then let thy glory appear to our children, in performing the promise to them which we have forfeited the benefit of." (2.) That he would countenance and strengthen them in carrying it on, in doing their part towards it. [1.] That he would smile upon them in it; Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; let it appear that God favours us; let us have God's ordinances kept up among us, and the tokens of God's presence with his ordinances; (v. 11.) He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty; he that by faith chooses God for his Guardian shall find all that in him which he needs or can desire. Note, 1. It is the character of a true believer, that he dwells in the secret place of the Most High; he is at home in God, returns to God, and reposits in him as his Rest; he acquaints himself with inside religion, and makes heart-work of the service of God; he chooses to converse with himself in solitude. 2. It is the privilege and comfort of those that do so, that they abide under the shadow of the Almighty; he shelters them, and comes between them and every thing that would annoy them, whether storm or sunshine. They shall not only have an admittance, but a residence, under God's protection; he will be their Rest and Refuge for ever.

Some of the ancients were of opinion that Moses was the penman, not only of the foregoing psalm, which is expressly said to be his, but also of the eight that next follow it; but that cannot be, for Ps. xcvi. is expressly said to be penned by David, and long after Moses, Heb. iv. 7. It is probable that this psalm was penned by David, for it is a writ of protection for all true believers, not in the name of king David, or under his broad seal, he needed it himself, especially if the psalm was penned, as some conjecture, in the time of the pestilence, which was sent for his numbering of the people, but in the name of the King of kings, and under the broad seal of Heaven. Observe, I. The psalmist's own resolution to take God for his Keeper, (v. 2.) from this he gives directness to others, v. 9. II. The promises which are here made, in God's name, to all those that do so in sincerity. 1. They shall be taken under the peculiar care of Heaven, v. 1. 2. They shall be delivered from all malice and designs of their enemies, (v. 3, 5, 6.) and that by a distinguishing preservation, v. 7, 8. 3. They shall be the charge of the holy angels, v. 10. 12. 4. They shall triumph over their enemies, v. 13. 5. They shall be the special favours of God himself, v. 14.-16. In singing this, we must shelter ourselves under, and then solemnise ourselves in, the divine protection. Many think, that to Christ, as Mediator, these promises do particularly belong, (Isa. xlii. 2.) not because to him the Devil applied one of these promises, (Matt. iv. 6.) but because to him they are very applicable, and, coming through him, they are more sweet and sure to all believers.

1. He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. 2. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge, and my fortress; my God; in him will I trust. 3. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. 4. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler. 5. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day. 6. Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth in noon-day. 7. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee. 8. Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold, and see the reward of the wicked.

In these verses, we have, I. A great truth laid down in general, That all those who live a life of communion with God, are constantly safe under his protection, and may therefore preserve a holy serenity, and security of mind, at all times, (v. 1.) He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty; he that by faith chooses God for his Guardian shall find all that in him which he needs or can desire. Note, 1. It is the character of a true believer, that he dwells in the secret place of the Most High; he is at home in God, returns to God, and reposits in him as his Rest; he acquaints himself with inside religion, and makes heart-work of the service of God; he chooses to converse with himself in solitude. 2. It is the privilege and comfort of those that do so, that they abide under the shadow of the Almighty; he shelters them, and comes between them and every thing that would annoy them, whether storm or sunshine. They shall not only have an admittance, but a residence, under God's protection; he will be their Rest and Refuge for ever.

II. The psalmist's comfortable application of this to himself; (v. 2.) I will say of the Lord, whatever others say of him, "He is my Refuge, I choose him as such, and confide in him. Others made idols their refuge, but I will say of Jehovah, the true and living God, He is my Refuge: any other is a refuge of lie; He is a Refuge that will not fail me; for he is my Fortress and Strong-hold." Idolaters called their idols Mahuzzim, their most strong-hold;" Dan. iii. 90. But they who devoted them- selves; those only secure themselves that make the Lord their God their Fortress. There being no reason to question his sufficiency, fitly does it follow, In him will I trust. If Jehovah be our God, our Refuge, and our Fortress, what can we desire, which we may not be sure to find in him? He is neither fickle, nor false, nor weak, nor mortal; he is God and not man, and therefore there is no danger of being disappointed in him. We know whom we have trusted.
III. The great encouragement he gives to others to do likewise; not only from his own experience of the divine care over them (as it might be a fallacy,) but from the truth of God's promise, in which there neither is, nor can be, any deceit; (v. 3, 4, &c.) Surely he shall deliver thee. Those who have themselves found the comfort of making God their Reguge, cannot but desire that others may do so. Now here it is promised,

1. That believers shall be kept from those mis-chiefs which they are in imminent danger of, and which are known to them by the voice of the fowler, which is laid unscen, and catches the unwary prey on a sudden; and from the noisome testitence, which seizes men unawares, and against which there is no guard. This promise protects,

(1.) The natural life, and is often fulfilled in our preservation from those dangers which are very threatening, and very near, whilst yet we ourselves are not apprehensive of them, any more than the bird is of the snare of the fowler. We owe it, more than we are sensible, to the care of the Divine Providence, that we have been kept from infectious diseases, and out of the hands of the wicked and unreasonable.

(2.) The spiritual life, which is protected by Divine Grace from the temptations of Satan, which are as the snares of the fowler, and from the contagion of sin, which is the noisome pestilence. He that has given grace to be the glory of the soul, will create a defence upon all that glory.

2. That God himself will be their Protector; they must needs be safe who have him for their Keeper, and successful for whom he undertakes; (v. 4.) He shall cover thee, shall keep thee secret, (xxxi. 20.) and so keep thee safe, xxvii. 5. God protects believers, (1.) With the greatest tenderness and affection; intimated in that, He shall cover thee with his feathers, under his wings, which alludes to the hen gathering her chickens under her wings, Matth. xxiii. 37. By natural instinct, she not only protects them, but calls them under that protection, when she sees them in danger; not only keeps them safe, but cherishes them and keeps them warm. To this the great God is pleased to compare his care of his people, who are helpless as the chickens, and easily made a prey of, but are invited to trust under the wings of the divine promise and providence, which is the periphasy of a prolethne to the true religion, theaddress of a mother towards her infant. This is the refuge of Israel, Ruth ii. 12. (2.) With the greatest power and efficacy; wings and feathers, though spread with the greatest tenderness, are yet weak, and easily broken through, and therefore it is added, His truth shall be thy shield and buckler, a strong defence. God is as willing to guard his people as the hen is to guard the chickens, and as able as a man of war in armour.

3. That this will not only keep them from evil, but from the fear of evil, v. 5, 6. Here is, (1.) Great danger supposed, the mention of it is enough to frighten us; night and day we lie exposed, and those that are apt to be timorous, will, in neither period, think themselves safe. When we are retired into our chambers, our beds, and have made all as safe as we can about us, yet there is terror by night, from thieves and robbers, winds and storms, besides those things that are the creatures of fire and innumerable, the most frightful of all; we read of fear in the night, Cant. iii. 8. There is also a pestilence that walketh in darkness, as that which slew the first-born of the Egyptians, and the army of the Assyrians. No locks or bars can shut out diseases, while we carry about with us in our bodies the seeds of them. But surely in the day-time, when we can look about us, we are not so much in danger; yes, there is an arrow that fleeth by day too, and yet unseen; there is a destruction that wasteth at high-noon, when we are awake, and have all our friends about us; even then we cannot secure ourselves, nor can we secure others. It was in the day-time that that pestilence wasted which was sent to chastise David for numbering the people, on occasion of which some think this psalm was penned. But, (2.) Here is great security promised to believers in the midst of this danger: Thou shalt not be afraid, God by his grace will keep thee from disquieting distrustful fear, (that fear which hath torment,) in the midst of the greatest dangers. Wisdom shall keep thee from being foolishly afraid, and faith shall keep thee from being inordinately afraid. Thou shalt not be afraid of the arrow, as knowing that, though it may hit thee, it cannot hurt thee; if it take away the natural life, yet it shall be so far from doing any prejudice to the spiritual life, that it shall be its perfec-lion. A believer needs not fear, and therefore should not fear, any arrow, because the point is off; O death, where is thy sting? It is also under divine direction, and will suit where God appoints, and not otherwise. Every bullet has its commission. Whatever is done, our heavenly Father's will is done; and we have no reason to be afraid of that.

4. That they shall be preserved in common calamities, in a distinguishing way; (v. 7.) When death rides in triumph, and diseases rage, so that thousands and ten thousands fall, by sickness, or fall by the sword in battle, fall at thy side, at thy right hand, and the sight of their fall is too frighten thee, and if they fall by the pestilence, their falling so near thee may be likely to infect thee; yet it shall not come nigh thee, the death shall not, the fear of death shall not. Those that preserve their purity in times of general corruption, may trust God with their safety in times of general desolation. When multitudes die round about us, though thereby we must be awakened to prepare for our own death, yet we must not be afraid with any amazement, no make ourselves subject to bondage, as many do all their lifetime, through fear of death, Heb. ii. 15. The sprinkling of blood secured the first-born of Israel, when thousands fell. Nay, it is promised to God's people, that they shall have the satisfaction of seeing, not only God's promises fulfilled to them, but his threatenings fulfilled upon those that hate them; (v. 8.) Only with thine eyes shall thou behold and see the ruins of the wicked, which perhaps refers to the destruction of the first-born of Israel, and the pestilence, which was both the punishment of the oppressors and the enlargement of the oppressed; this Israel saw, when they saw themselves unhurt, untouched. As it will aggravate the damnation of sinners, that with their eyes they shall behold and see the reward of the righteous, (Luke xii. 28.) so it will magnify the salvation of the saints, that with their eyes they shall behold and see the destruction of the wicked, Isa. lxvi. 24.

9. Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation, 10. There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. 11. For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways. 12. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. 13. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet. 14. Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. 15. He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him. 16. With long life will I satisfy him, and show him my salvation.

Here are more promises to the same purport with those in the foregoing verses, and they are exceeding great and precious, and sure to all the seed. 1. The psalmist assures believers of divine protection, from his own experience; and that which he says is the word of God, and what we may rely upon. Observe, 1. The character of those who shall have these promises. They are the children of God, his saints. They have been made thereby to live in God; to know him, and to love him; to be his children, to be the seed of Israel, and to be of the seed of the patriarchs. The promises of God have the same effect with the word of God; it is the same as if God had said expressly, I have given thee such and such promises. 2. The promises themselves. They are much the same with that, v. 1. They are such as make the most High their Habitation, (v. 9.) as are continually with God, and rest in him, as make his name both their Temple and their strong Tower, as dwell in love, and so dwell in God. It is our duty to be at home in God, to make our choice of him, and then to live our life in him as our Habitation; to converse with him, and delight in him, and depend upon him; and then it shall be our privilege to be at home in God; we shall be welcome to bring a part of ourselves to his own habitation, without any let, hindrance, or molestation, from the arrests of the law, or the clamours of conscience; then too we shall be safe in him, shall be kept in perfect peace, Isa. xxvi. 3. To encourage us to make the Lord our Habitation, and to hope for safety and satisfaction in him, the psalmist intimates the comfort he had in doing so; "He whom thou makest thy Habitation is my Refuge; and I have found him firm and faithful, and in him there is room enough, and shelter enough, both for thee and me." In my father's house there are many mansions, one needs not crowd another, much less crowd out another. 2. The promises that are sure to all those who have thus made the most High their Habitation.

1. That, whatever happens to them, nothing shall hurt them; (v. 10.) There shall no evil befall thee; though trouble and affliction befal thee, yet there shall be no real evil in it, for it shall come from the love of God, and shall be sanctified; it shall come, not for thy hurt, but for thy good; and though, for the present, it be not joyous but grievous, yet, in the end, it shall yield so well, that thou thyself shalt own no evil befell thee. It is not an evil, an only evil, but there is a mixture of good in it, and a product of good. "Many waters cannot quench love, nor can a river; Nay, not thy person only, but thy dwelling, shall be taken under the divine protection; there shall no plague come nigh that; nothing to thee or thine any damage." Nihil accidere bona viri nulli potest.—No evil can befall a good man. Seneca de Providentia.

2. That the angels of light shall be serviceable to them, v. 11, 12. This is a precious promise, and speaks a great deal both of honour and comfort to the saints, nor is it ever the worse for its being quoted and abused by the Devil in tempting Christ, Math. iv. 6. Observe, 1. The charge given to the angels concerning the saints. He who is the Lord of the angels, who gave them their being, and gives laws to them, whose they are, and whom they were made to serve, he shall give his angels a charge over thee; not only over the church in general, but over every particular saint; it is the charge of the Lord their God; and this is the charge they have from him. It denotes the great care God takes of the saints, in that the angels themselves shall be charged with them, and employed for them. The charge is, to keep thee in all thy ways; here is a limitation of the promise; They shall keep thee in thy ways, that is, "as long as thou keepest in the way of thy duty;" they that go out of the way, put themselves out of God's protection; this word the Devil left out, when he quoted it to enforce a temptation, knowing how much it made against him. But observe the extent of the promise; it is to keep thee in all thy ways; even where there is no apparent danger, yet we need it, and where there is the most imminent danger, we shall have it. Wherever the saints go, the angels are charged with them, as the servants are with the children.

2. The care which the angels take of the saints, pursuant to this charge; They shall bear thee up in their hands, which denotes both their great ability and their great affection. They are able to bear up the saints out of the reach of danger, and they do it with all the tenderness and affection wherewith the psalmist carres the little child about in her arms. It speaks us helpless, and them helpful. They are descending in their ministrations; they keep the feet of the saints, lest they dash them against a stone, lest they stumble and fall into sin and into trouble.

3. That the powers of darkness shall be triumphed over by them; (v. 13.) Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder; the Devil is called a roaring lion, 1 Pet. v. 8.; the adder, is the serpent, the old serpent, the red dragon; so that to this promise the apostle seems to refer in that, (Rom. xvi. 20.) The God of peace shall tread Satan under your feet. Christ has broken the serpent's head, spoiled our spiritual enemies, (Col. ii. 15.) and through him we are more than conquerors; for Christ calls us, as Joshua called the captains of Israel, to come and set our feet on the necks of vanquished enemies. Some think that this promise had its full accomplishment in Christ, and the miraculous power which he had over the whole creation, healing the sick, casting out devils, and particularly putting it into his disciples' commission, that they should take up serpents, Mark xvi. 18. It may be applied to that care of the Divine Providence by which we are preserved from ravenous noxious creatures, (The wild beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee, Job v. 25.) now, and have ways and means of taming them, Lam. iii. 7.

II. He brings in God himself speaking words of comfort to the saints, and declaring the mercy he has in store for them, v. 14.-16. Some make this to be spoken to the angels as the reason of the charge given them concerning the saints, as if he had said, "Take care of them, for they are dear to me, and I have a tender concern for them."

And now, as before, we must observe.

To whom these promises do belong; they are described by three characters. 1. They are such as know God's name. His nature we cannot fully know; but by his name he has made himself known, and with that we must acquaint ourselves. 2. They are such as have set their love upon him; and they who rightly know him, will love him, will place their love upon him, as the only adequate Object of it, will let out their love toward him with pleasure and interest, and will fix their love upon him with a resolution never to remove it from any rival. 3. They are such as call upon him, as by prayer keep up a constant correspondence with him, and in every difficult case refer themselves to him.

2. What the promises are, which God makes to the saints.

1. That he will, in due time, deliver them out of trouble; I will deliver him, (v. 14.) and again, (v. 15.) delivereth him that is living and dying; a deliverance in trouble, and a deliverance out of trouble. If God proportions the degree and continuance of our troubles to our strength, if he keeps us from offending him in our troubles, and makes our death our discharge, at length, from all our troubles, then this promise is fulfilled. See xxxiv. 19. 2 Tim. iii. 11.—iv. 18.
PSALMS, XII.

(2.) That he will, in the mean time, be with them in trouble, v. 15. If he does not immediately put a period to their afflictions, yet they shall have his gracious presence with them in their troubles; he will take notice of their sorrows, and know their souls in adversity; will visit them graciously by his word and Spirit, and converse with them, will take their part, will support and comfort them, and sanctify their afflictions to them, which will be the surest token of his presence with them in their troubles.

(5.) That he will exalt and dignify them; I will shew him high, v. 16. In the reach of trouble, above the stormy region, on a rock above the waves, Isa. xxxiii. 16. They shall be enabled, by the grace of God, to look down upon the things of this world with a holy contempt and indifference, and to look up to the things of the other world with a holy ambition and concern; and then they are set on high. I will honour him; those are truly honourable whom God puts honour upon, by taking them into covenant and communion with himself, and designing them for his kingdom and glory. John xvi. 26.

(6.) That they shall have a sufficiency of life in this world; (v. 16.) With length of days will I satisfy him; [1.] They shall live long enough; they shall be continued in this world till they have done the work they were sent into this world for, and are ready for heaven; and that is long enough. Who would wish to live a day longer than God has some work to do, either by him or upon him? [2.] They shall live it long enough, for God has given grace shall warm them from the world, and make them willing to leave it. A man may die young, and yet die full of days, satur dierium—satisfied with living. A wicked worldly man is not satisfied, no not with long life: he still cries, Give, give; but he that has his treasure and heart in another world, has soon enough of this, he would not live always.

(7.) That they shall have an eternal life in the other world: this crowns the blessedness; I will show him my salvation; show him the Messiah, so some; good old Simeon was then satisfied with long life, when he could say, Mine eyes have seen thy salvation; nor was there any greater joy to the Old Testament saints, than to see Christ's day, though at a distance. More probably, the salvation may denote the better country, that is, the heavenly, which the patriarchs desired and sought; he will show him that, bring him to that blessed state, the felicity of which consists so much in seeing that face to face which we here see through a glass darkly; and, in the mean time, he will give him a precept of it. All these promises, some think, point primarily at Christ, and had their accomplishment in his resurrection and exaltation.

God both of mercy and judgment, the ruin of sinners and the joy of saints, three times counterchanged. 1. The wicked shall perish, (v. 7.) but God is eternal, v. 8. 2. God's enemies shall be cut off, but David shall be exalted, v. 9, 10. 3. David's enemies shall be confounded (v. 11.) but all the righteous shall be fruitful and flourishing, v. 12, 15. In singing this psalm, we must take pleasure in giving to God the glory due to his name, and triumph in his works.

A psalm or song for the sabbath-day.

1. If it is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High: 2. To show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night, 3. Upon an instrument of ten strings, and upon the psaltery; upon the harp with a solemn sound.

4. For thou, Lord, hast made me glad through thy work; I will triumph in the works of thy hands. 5. O Lord, how great are thy works! and thy thoughts are very deep. 6. A brutish man knoweth not; neither doth a fool understand this.

This psalm was appointed to be sung, at least, it usually was sung, in the house of the sanctuary on the sabbath-day, that day of rest, which was an instituted memorial of the work of creation, of God's rest from that work, and the continuance of it in his providence; for the Father worketh hitherto. Note, 1. The sabbath day must be a day not only of holy rest, but of holy work; and the rest is in order to the work. 2. The proper work of the sabbath is praising God; a very sabbath-day must be a thanks-giving-day; and all the other services of the day must be in order to this, and therefore must by no means thrust this into a corner. One of the Jewish writers refers it to the kingdom of the Messiah, and calls it, A psalm or song for the age to come, which shall be all sabbath. Believers, through Christ, enjoy that sabbatism which remains for the people of God, (Heb. iv. 9.) the beginning of the everlasting sabbath.

These verses, 1. We are called upon and encouraged to praise God; (v. 1-3.) It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord. Praising God is good work; it is good in itself, and good for us; it is our duty, the rent, the tribute, we are to pay to our great Lord; we are unjust if we withhold it; it is our privilege that we are admitted to praise God, and have hope to be accepted in it; it is good, for it is pleasant and profitable; work that is its own wages; it is the work of angels, the work of heaven. It is good to give thanks for the mercies we have received, for that is the way of fetching in further mercy; it is fit to sing to his name, who is Most High, exalted above all blessing and praise. Now observe here, 1. How we must praise God; we must do it by showing forth his loving-kindness and his faithfulness. Being convinced of his glorious attributes and perfections, we must show them forth, as those that are greatly affected with them ourselves, and desire to affect others with them likewise. We must show forth, not only his greatness and majesty, his holiness and justice, which magnify him, and strike an awe upon us, but his loving-kindness and his faithfulness; for his goodness is his glory, (Exod. xxxiii. 18, 19.) and by these he proclaims his name. His mercy and truth are the great supports of our faith and hope; and the great encouragements of our love and obedience; these, therefore, we must show forth as our pleas in prayer, and the matter of our joy.

PSALM XCII.

Is a groundless opinion of some of the Jewish writers, (who are the interpreters of the Vulgate,) that this psalm was penned and sung by Adam in innocence, the first sabbath. It is inconsistent with the psalm itself, which speaks of the workers of iniquity, when as yet sin had not come. It is probable that it was penned by David, and, being the 16th of the 150, it speaks of the business of the sabbath, is here recommended, v. 1. - 3. II. God's works, which gave occasion for the sabbath, are here celebrated as great and unsearchable in general, v. 4. In particular, with reference to the works both of providence and redemption, the psalmist sings unto
This was then done, not only by singing, but by music joined with it, upon an instrument of ten strings; (v. 3.) but then it was to be with a solemn sound, not that which was gay, and apt to dissipate the spirits, but that which was grave, and apt to fix them.

2. When we must praise God; in the morning, and every night, not only on sabbath-days, but every day; it is that which the duty of every day requires; we must praise God, not only in public assemblies, but in secret, and in our families; showing forth, to ourselves and those about us, his loving-kindness and faithfulness. We must begin and end every day with praising God; must give him thanks every morning, and fresh expressions, and reflect on the goodness of the day comes in upon us; and, every night, when we are again composed and retired, and are recollecting ourselves; we must give him thanks every morning for the mercies of the night, and every night for the mercies of the day; going out and coming in, we must bless God.

II. We have an example set before us in the psalmist himself, both to move us to, and to direct us in it. (v. 4.) The Lord shall make me glad through thy work. Note, 1. Those can best recommend to others the duty of praise, who have themselves experienced the pleasantness of it.

"God's works are to be praised, for they have many a time rejoiced my heart; and therefore, whatever others may think of them, I must think well, and speak well, of them." 2. If God has given us the joy of his works, there is all the reason in the world why we should give him the honour of them. Has he made our hearts glad? Let us then make his praises glorious. His God made us glad, through the works of his providence for us, and of his grace in us, and both through the great work of redemption.

1. Let us then thence fetch encouragement for our faith and hope; so the psalmist does; I will triumph in the works of thy hands. From a joyful remembrance of what God has done for us, we may raise a joyful prospect of what he will do, and triumph in the assurance of it, triumph over all opposition, 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14.

2. Let us thence fetch encouragement for holy adorings and admirings of God; (v. 5.) O Lord, how great are thy works! Great beyond conception, beyond expression! The products of great power and wisdom, of great consequence and importance; men's works are nothing to them. We cannot comprehend the greatness of God's works, and therefore must reverently and awfully wonder at them, and even stand amazed at the magnificence of them.

"Men's works are little and trifling, for their thoughts are shallow; but, Lord, thy works are great, and such as cannot be measured; for thy thoughts are very deep, and such as cannot be fathomed." God's counsels as much exceed the contrivances of our wisdom, as his works do the efforts of our power. His thoughts are above our thoughts, as his ways are above our ways, Isa. lv. 7. 8. Oh the depth of God's designs! Rom. xi. 33. The greatness of God's works should lead us to consider the depth of his thoughts, that counsel of his own will, according to which he doeth all things. What a compass his thoughts fetch, and to what a length they reach!

III. We are admonished not to neglect the works of God, by the character of those who do, v. 6. They are brutish, who do not know, who do not understand; they cannot understand; God's works are, who will not acquaint themselves with them, or give him the glory of them; they regard not the work of the Lord, nor consider the operation of his hands; (xxviii. 5.) particularly, they understand not the meaning of their own prosperity, which is spoken of; (v. 7.) they take it as a pledge of their happiness, whereas it is a preparative for their ruin. If there are so many who know not the designs of Providence, nor care to know them, those who through grace are acquainted with them, and love to be so, have the more reason to be thankful.

7. When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish; it is that they shall be destroyed for ever: 8. But thou, Lord, art most high for evermore. 9. For, lo, thine enemies, O Lord, for, lo, thine enemies shall perish, all the workers of iniquity shall be scattered. 10. But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn: I shall be anointed with fresh oil. 11. Mine eye also shall see my desire on mine enemies; and mine ears shall hear my desire of the wicked that rise up against me. 12. The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree; he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon. 13. Those that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God. 14. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing. 15. To show that the Lord is upright: he is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him.

The psalmist had said, (v. 4.) that from the works of God he would take occasion to triumph; and here he does so.

1. He triumphs over God's enemies, (v. 7, 9, 11.) triumphs in the foresight of their destruction; not as it would be the misery of his fellow-creatures, but as it would redound to the honour of God's justice and holiness.

He is confident of the ruin of sinners.

1. Though they are flourishing; (v. 7.) When the wicked spring as the grass in spring, (so numerous, so thick, so green, and growing so fast,) and all the workers of iniquity do flourish in pomp and power, and all the instances of outward prosperity, are easy and many, and succeed in their enterprises, one would think that all this was in order to their being happy, that it was a certain evidence of God's favour, and an earnest of something as good or better in reserver but it is quite otherwise; it is, that they shall be destroyed for ever. The very prosperity of fools shall slay them, Prov. i. 32. The sheep that are designed for the slaughter are put into the fattest pasture.

2. Though they are daring, v. 9. They are thine enemies, and impudently avow themselves to be so; they are contrary to God, and they fight against God; they are in rebellion against his crown and dignity, and therefore it is easy to foresee that they shall perish; for who ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered? Note, All the inimical workers of iniquity shall be deemed and taken as God's enemies, and as such they shall perish and be scattered. Christ reckons those his enemies that will not have him to reign over them; and they shall be brought forth and slain before him. The workers of iniquity are now associated, and closely linked together, in a combination against God and his kingdom; but they shall be scattered and disabled to help one another against the just judgment of God. In the world to come, they shall be separated from the congregation of the righteous, so the Chaldee, Ps. i. 5.

3. Though they had a particular mantle against the psalmist, and, upon that account, he might be tempted to fear them, yet he triumphs over them; (v. 11.) "Mine eye shall see my desire on mine enemies that rise up against me; I shall see them not only disabled to do me any further mischief, but reckoned with for the mischief they have done me, and brought either to repentance or ruin;" and this was his desire concerning them. In the Hebrew it is no more than thus, Mine eye shall look on mine enemies, and mine ear shall hear of the wicked. He does not say what he shall see, or what he shall hear. He declares, in his heart, and hearken that in which God will be glorified, and in which he will therefore be satisfied. This perhaps has reference to Christ, to his victory over Satan, death, and H. II., the destruction of those that persecuted and crucified him, and opposed his gospel, and to the final ruin of the impenitent at the last day. They that rise up against Christ will fall before him, and be made his footstool. H. II. He triumphs in God, and his glory and grace. (1.) In the grace of making and keeping the tree of life (v. 3.) But thou, O Lord, art Most High for evermore. The workers of iniquity, who fight against us, may be high for a time, and think to carry all before them with a high hand, but thou art High, Most High for evermore; their height will be humbled and brought down, and thine is everlasting." Let us not, therefore, fear the pride and power of evil men, nor be discouraged by their impotent menaces, for the moth shall eat them up and destroy them, but God's righteousness shall be for ever, Isa. li. 7, 8. 2. In the grace of God; his favour, and the fruits of it. (1.) To himself; (v. 10.) "Thou, O Lord, that art thyself Most High, shall exalt my horn." The great God is the Fountain of honour, and he, being high for evermore, himself will exalt his people for ever, for he is the Praise of all his saints, cxlviii. 14. The wicked are forbidden to lift up the horn, (Is. xxiv. 4, 5.) but those that serve God and the interest of his kingdom with their honour and power, and commit them to him to keep them, to raise them, to use them, and to dispose of them, as he pleases, may hope that he will exalt their horn as the horn of an unicorn, to the greatest height, either in this world or the other; My horn thou shalt exalt, when thine enemies perish; for then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun, when the wicked shall be darkened. He adds, I shall be anointed with fresh oil, which be-speaks a fresh confirmation in his office to which he had been anointed, or abundance of plenty, so that he should have fresh oil as often as he pleased, or renewed comforts to revive him when his spirits drooped; grace is the anointing of the Spirit; when this is given to help in the time of need, and is received, as there is occasion, from the fulness that is in Christ Jesus, we are then anointed with fresh oil. Some read it, When I grow old, thou shalt anoint me with fresh oil. My old age shall thou exalt with rich mercy; so the Seventy. Compare v. 14. They shall bring forth fruit in old age. The comforts of God's Spirit, and the joys of his salvation, shall be a refreshing oil to the hoary heads that are found in the way of righteousness. (2.) To all the saints. They are here represented as trees of righteousness, Isa. lx. 3. Ps. l. 3. Observe, [1.] The good place they are fixed in; they are planted in the house of the Lord, v. 13. The trees of righteousness do not grow of themselves, they are planted, not in common soil, but in paradise, in the house of the Lord. Trees are not planted in a house; but God's trees are said to be planted in his house; because it is from his grace, by his word and Spirit, that they receive all the sap and virtue, and keep it alive, and make this fruitful. They fix themselves to holy ordinances, take root in them, abide by them, put themselves under the divine protection, and bring forth all their fruits to God's honour and glory. [2.] The good plight they shall be kept in. It is here promised, First, That they shall grow, v. 12. Where God gives true grace, he will give more grace; God's trees shall grow higher, like the cedars, the tall cedars in Lebanon; they shall grow nearer heaven, and nearer the heart of God, and nearer the upper world: they shall grow stronger, like the cedars, and fitter for use. He that has clean hands shall be stronger and stronger. Secondly, That they shall flourish, both in the credit of their profession, and in the comfort and joy of their own souls. They shall be cheerful themselves, and respected by all about them. They shall flourish like the palm-tree, which has a stately body, (Cont. vii. 7.) and large boughs, Lev. xxiii. 40. (Judg. xxi. 5.) Dates, the fruit of it, are very pleasant, but it is especially alluded to here, as being evergreen. The wicked flourish as the grass, (v. 7.) which is soon withered, and the righteous as the palm-tree, which is long-lived, and which the winter does not change. It has been said of the palm-tree, Sub pendere crescit—The more it is pressed down, the more it grows; so the righteous flourish under their burthens; the more they are afflicted, the more they flourish, and the more they triumph. Of the Lord, there their root is, they flourish in the courts of our God, there their branches spread, Their life is hid with Christ in God. But their light also shines before men. It is desirable that those who have a place, should have a name, in God's house, and within his walls, Isa. liv. 5. Let good Christians aim to excel, that they may be eminent and may flourish, and so may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, as flourishing trees towards the courts of a house. And let those who flourish in God's courts give him the glory of it; it is by virtue of this promise, They shall be fat and flourishing. Their flourishing without is from a fatness within, from the root and fatness of the good olive, Rom. xi. 17. Without a living principle of grace in the heart, the profession will not be long flourishing; but where that is, the leaf also shall not wither, Ps. l. 3. The trees of the Lord are full of sap, civ. 16. H. III. Thirdly, That they shall be fruitful; were there nothing but leaves upon them, they would not be trees of any value; but they shall still bring forth fruit, the products of sanctification, all the instances of a lively devotion and a useful conversation, good works, by which God is glorified, and others are edified. These are the fruits of righteousness, in which it is the privilege, as well as the duty, of the righteous to abound; and it is the matter of a promise, as well as the matter of a command. It is promised that they shall bring forth fruit in old age. Other trees, when they are old, leave off bearing, but in God's trees the strength of grace does not fail with the strength of nature. The last days of the saints are sometimes their best days, and their last work their best work. This indeed shows that they are upright; perseverance is the best evidence of sincerity; it shows that they believe the promises, and faithful to every word that he has spoken, and that he is constant to the work which he has begun. As it is by the promises that believers first partake of a divine nature, so it is by the promises that that divine nature is preserved and kept up; and therefore the power it exerts is an evidence that the Lord is upright, and so he will show himself with an upright man, xvii. 25. This is the plainest triumph: He is my Rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him. I have chosen him for my Rock on which to build, in the clefts of which to take shelter, on the top of which I set my feet. I have found him a Rock, strong and steadfast, and his word as firm as a Rock. I have found (and let every one speak as he finds) "that there is no unrighteousness in him." He is as able, and will be as kind, as his word makes him to be. All that ever trusted in God found him faithful and all-sufficient, and none were ever made ashamed of their hope in him.

PSALM XCVIII.

This short psalm sets forth the honour of the kingdom of God among men, to his glory, the terror of his enemies, and the comfort of all his loving subjects. It relates both to the kingdom of his providence, by which he upholds and governs the world, and especially to the kingdom of his grace, by which he secures the church, sanctifies and preserves it. The administration of both these kingdoms is put into the hands of the Messiah, and to him, doubtless, the prophet here bears witness, and to his kingdom, speaking of it as present, because sure; and because, as the Eternal Word, even before his incarnation, he was Lord of all. Concerning God's kingdom glorious things are here spoken. 1. He has other kings their royal robes; so has he, v. 1. 2. Have they their throne? So has he, v. 2. 3. Have they their enemies whom they subdue and triumph over? So has he, v. 3, 4. 4. Is it their honour to be faithful and holy? So it is his, v. 5. In singing this psalm, we forget ourselves, if we forget Christ, to whom the Father has given all power both in heaven and in earth.

1. The Lord reigneth; he is clothed with majesty; the Lord is clothed with strength, wherewith he hath girded himself: the world also is established, that it cannot be moved. 2. Thy throne is established of old: thou art from everlasting. 3. The floods have lifted up, O Lord, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves. 4. The Lord on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea. 5. Thy testimonies are very sure: holiness becometh thy house, O Lord, for ever.

Next to the being of God, there is nothing that we are more concerned to believe and consider than God's dominion, that he is God, and that he reigns; (v. 1.) not only that he is King, of right, and is the Owner and Proprietor of all persons and things, but that he is King, in fact, and does direct and dispose of all the creatures and all their actions, according to the counsel of his own will. This is celebrated here, and in many other psalms: The Lord reigns. It is the song of the gospel-church, of the glorified church; (Rev. xiv. 6.) Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigns. Here we are told how he reigns.

1. The Lord reigns gloriously; He is clothed with majesty. The majesty of earthy princes, compared with God's terrible majesty, is but like the glimmerings of a glow-worm compared with the brightness of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Are the enemies of God's kingdom great and formidable? Yet let us not fear them, for God's majesty will eclipse them.

2. He reigns powerfully: He is not only clothed with majesty, as a prince in his court, but he is clothed with strength, as a general in the camp. He has wherewithal to support his greatness, and to make it truly formidable. See him not only clad in robes, but clad in armour; both strength and honour are his clothing. He can do every thing, and with him nothing is impossible. (1.) With this power he has girded himself; it is not derived from any other, nor does the executing of it depend upon any other, but he has it of himself, and with it does whatsoever he pleases. Let us not fear the power of man, which is borrowed and bounded, but fear God, who is girded to kill, and cast into hell. (2.) To this power it is owing that God is now upon earth. This world also is established; it was so at first, by the creating power of God, when he founded it upon the seas; it is so still, by that Providence which upholds all things, and is a continued creation; it is so established, that though he has hanged the earth upon nothing, (Job xxvi. 7.) yet it cannot be moved; all things continue to this day, according to his ordinance. Note, The preserving of the powers of nature, and the course of nature, is what the God of nature must have the glory of; and we, who have the benefit thereof daily, are very careless and ungrateful, if we give him not the glory of it.

3. He reigns eternally; (v. 2.) Thy throne is established of old. (1.) God's right to rule the world is founded in his making it; he that gave being to it, do doubt, may give law to it, and so his title to the government is incontestable; Thy throne is established, it is a title without a flaw in it; and it is ancient, it is established of old, from the beginning of time, before any other rule, principality, or power, was erected; as it will continue, when all other rule, principality, and power, shall be put down, (1 Cor. xv. 24.) (2.) The whole administration of his government was settled in his eternal counsels, before all worlds; for he doth all according to the purpose which he purposed in himself. The chariots of Providence came down from between the mountains of brass, from those decrees which are fixed as the everlasting mountains; (Zech. vi. 1.) Thou art from everlasting, and therefore thy throne is established of old; because God himself was from everlasting, his throne and all the determinations of it were so too; for in an Eternal Mind there could not but be eternal thoughts.

4. He reigns triumphantly, v. 3, 4. We have here, (1.) A threatening storm supposed; The floods have lifted up, O Lord, (to God himself the remonstrance is made,) the floods have lifted up their voice, which speaks terror; nay, they have lifted up their waves, which speaks real danger; altitudes to a tempestuous sea, such as the wicked are compared to, Isa. lvi. 20. The heathen rage, (Ps. ii. 1.) and think to ruin the church, to overwhelm it like a deluge, to sink it like a ship at sea. The church is said to be tossed with tempests, (Isa. liv. 11.) and the floods of ungodly men make the saints afraid, Ps. xviii. 4. We may apply it to the tumults that are sometimes in our own bosoms, through which the soul is cast into disorder, and are ready to overthrow its graces and comforts, but, if the Lord reigns there, even the winds and seas shall obey him. (2.) An immoveable anchor cast in this storm; (v. 4.) The Lord himself is mighty. Let this keep our minds fixed. (1.) That God is on high, above them, which denies his safety; they cannot reach him; (xxix. 10.) it denotes also his sovereignty; they are called by his name, and are his; so if they rebel, Exod. xviii. 11. (2.) That he is mighty, does more wondrous things than the noise of many waters; they cannot disturb his rest or rule; they cannot defeat his designs and purposes. Observe, The power of the church's enemies is but as the noise of many waters; there is more of sound than substance in it; Pharaoh king of Egypt is but PSALMS, XCIV.

This psalm was penned when the church of God was under hatches, oppressed and persecuted; and it is an appeal to God, as the Judge of heaven and earth, and an address to him, to appear for his people against his and their enemies. Two things this psalm speaks, 1. Conviction and terror to the persecutors, (v. 1-11.) showing them their danger and folly, and arguing with them. II. Comfort and peace to the persecuted, (v. 12-23.) assuring them both from God's promise, and from the psalmist's own experience, that their troubles would end well, and God would, in due time, appear to their joy, and the confusion of those who set themselves against them. In singing this psalm, we must look abroad upon the pride of oppressors with a holy indignation, and the tears of the oppressed with a holy compassion; but, at the same time, look upward to the righteous Judge, with an entire satisfaction, and look forward, to the end of all these things, with a pleasing hope.

1. 0 LORD God, to whom vengeance belongeth; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, show thyself. 2. Lift up thyself, thou judge of the earth: render a reward to the proud. 3. Lord, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph? 4. How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves? 5. They break in pieces thy people, O Lord, and afflict thy heritage: 6. They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless. 7. Yet they say, The Lord shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it. 8. Understand, ye brutish among the people; and, ye fools, when will ye be wise? 9. He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see? 10. He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know? 11. The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity.

In these verses we have,

1. A solemn appeal to God against the cruel oppressors of his people, v. 1, 2. This speaks terror enough to them, that they have the prayers of God's people upon them, who every day and night to him to avenge them of their adversaries; and shall not he avenge them speedily? Luke xvi. 3, 7. Observe here,

1. The titles they give to God, for the encouraging of their faith in this appeal; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth; and thou Judge of the earth. We may with holiness appeal to him; for, (1.) He is Judge, supreme Judge, Judge alone, from whom every man's judgment proceeds. He that gives law, gives sentence upon every man, according to his works, by the rule of that law. He has prepared his throne for judgment. He has indeed appointed magistrates to be avengers under him; (Rom. xiii. 4.) but he is the Avenger in chief, to whom even magistrates themselves are accountable; his throne is the last refuge (the dernier resort, as the law speaks) of oppressed innocence. He is universal Judge, not of this city or country only, but Judge of the earth, of the whole earth: none are exempt from his jurisdiction; nor can it be alleged against an appeal to him in any court, that it is coram non judice—before a person not judicially qualified. (2.) He is just; as he has authority to avenge wrong, so it is his nature, and property, and honour. This also is implied in the title here given to him, and repeated with such an emphasis, O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, who will not suffer might always to prevail against right. This is a good argument why we not avenge ourselves, because God has said, Vengeance is mine; and it is dazing presumption to usurp his prerogative, and step into his throne. Rom. xii. 19. Let this alarm those who do wrong, whether with a close hand, so as not to be discover'd, or with a high hand, so as not to be controlled. There is a God, to whom vengeance belongs, who will certainly call them to an account; and let it encourage those who suffer wrong, to bear it with silence, committing themselves to him—whom judges righteously.

2. What it is they ask of God; (1.) That he would glorify himself; and get honour to his own name. Wicked persecutors thought God was withdrawn, and had forsaken the earth; "Lord," say they, "show thyself; make them known that thou art; and let the wicked be; humble; and let them be taken away." "The Lord shall avenge the cause of the afflicted; and shall cleave the heads of them that were exalted in their position." The enemies thought God was conquered, because his people were; "Lord," say they, "lift up thyself, be thou exalted in thy own strength. Lift up thyself, to be seen, to be feared; and suffer not thy name to be trampled upon and run down." (2.) That he would mortify the oppressors: Render a reward to the proud; that is, "Reckon with them for all their insinuations, and the injuries they have done to their people." These prayers are prerequisites, which speak terror to all the sons of violence. The righteous God will deal with them according to their merits.

II. An humble complaint to God of the pride and cruelty of the oppressors, and an expostulation with him concerning it, v. 3-6. Where observe,

1. The character of the enemies they complain against; they are wicked, they are workers of iniquity, they are bad, very bad, themselves, and... therefore they hate and persecute those whose goodness shames and condemns them. These are wicked indeed, and workers of the worst iniquity, lost to all honor and virtue, who are cruel to the innocent, and hate the righteous.

2. This is their barbarous carriage which they complain of. (1.) They are insolent, and take a pleasure in magnifying themselves. They talk high, and talk big, they triumph, they speak loud things, they boast themselves, as if their tongues were their own, and their hands too, and they were accountable to none for what they say or do, and as if the day were their own, and they doubted not but to carry the cause against God and his religion.

This is distressful to the saints; that triumph and boast, are apt to speak hardly of others; but there will come a day of reckoning for all their high speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against God, his truths, and ways, and people, Jude 15. (2.) They are impious, and take a pleasure in running down God’s people because they are his; (v. 5.) “They break in pieces thy people, O Lord; break their assemblies, their estates, their families, their persons, and pieces, and do all they can to afflict thine heritage, to grieve them, to crush them, to run them down, to root them out.” God’s people are his heritage; there are those that, for his sake, hate them, and seek their ruin. This is a very good plea with God, in our intercessions for the church; “Lord, it is thine, thou hast a property in it, it is thine heritage, thou hast a pleasure in it, and out of it the rent of thy glory in this world issue.” And will thou suffer these wicked men to trample upon it thus? (3.) They are inhuman, and take a pleasure in wronging those that are least able to help themselves; (v. 6.) they not only oppress and impoverish, but they slay, the widow and the stranger; not only neglect the fatherless, and make a prey of them, but murder them, because they are weak and exposed, and sometimes lie at their mercy. Those whom they should protect from injury, they are most injurious to; perhaps because God has taken them into his particular care. Who would think it possible that any of the children of men should be thus barbarous?

3. A modest pleading with God concerning the continuance of the persecution; “Lord, how long shall they do thus?” And again, How long? When shall this wickedness of the wicked come to an end?

III. A charge of atheism exhibited against the people of God, and an expostulation with them upon that charge.

1. Their atheistical thoughts are here discovered; (v. 7.) yet they say, The Lord shall not see. Though the cry of their wickedness is very great and loud, though they rebel against the light of nature, and the dictates of their own consciences, yet they have the confidence to say, “The Lord shall not see;” he will not only wink at small faults, but shut his eyes at great ones too; or they think he has taken God it so artfully, under colour of religion and religion, perhaps, that it will not be adjudged murder. The God of Jacob, though his people pretend to have such an interest in him, does not regard it, either as against justice, or as against his own people; he will never call them to an account for it: thus denying God’s government of the world; bantering his covenant with his people, and setting the judgment to shame and falling short of it.

2. They are here convicted of folly and absurdity; he that says, either that Jehovah the living God shall not see, or that the God of Jacob shall not regard, the injuries done to his people, Nahal is his name, and folly is with him; and yet here he is fairly reasoned with, for his conviction and conversion, to prevent his confusion; (v. 8.) “Understand, ye bratish among the people, and let reason guide you.” Note, The atheistical, though they set up for wits, and philosophers, and politicians, yet are really the brutish among the people; if they would but understand, they would believe. God, by the prophet, speaks thus, as if we thought the time long till men would be men, and understood and considered; “Ye fools, when ye be wise, so wise as to know that God sees and regards all you say and do, and to speak and act accordingly, as those that must give account?” Note, None are so bad, but means are to be used for the reclaiming and reforming of them; none so brutish, so foolish, but it should be tried whether they may not yet be made wise; while there is life, there is hope.

To evidence the folly of those that question God’s omniscience and justice, the psalmist argues, (1.) From the works of creation, (v. 9.) the formation of human bodies, which, as it proves that there is a God, proves also that God has, infinitely and transcendently in himself, all those perfections that are in any creature. He that planted the ear, (and it is planted in the head, as a tree in the ground,) who he not hear? No doubt, he shall be more and better than we can. He that formed the eye, (and curiously it is formed above any part of the body anatomists know, and let us know by their dissections,) shall he not see? Could he give, would he give, that perfection to a creature which he has not in himself? Note, [1.] The powers of nature, are all derived from the God of nature. See Exod. iv. 11. [2.] By the knowledge of creatures we may be led a great way toward the knowledge of God; if, by the knowledge of our own bodies, and the organs of sense, so as to conclude, that, if we can see and hear, much more can God; then certainly by the knowledge of our own souls and their noble faculties. The gods of the heathen had eyes and saw not, ears and heard not; our God has no eyes or ears, as we have, and yet we must conclude he both sees and hears, because we have our sight and hearing from him, and are accountable to him for our use of them.

(2.) He argues from the works of providence, v. 10. He that chastises the heathen for their polytheism and idolatry, shall not he much more correct his own people for their atheism and profaneness? He that chastises the children of men for oppressing and wronging one another, shall not he correct those that profess to be his own children, and call themselves so, and yet persecute those that are really so? Shall we be under his correction, under whose government the world is? Does he regard, as King of nations, and shall he not much more regard, as the God of Jacob? Dr. Hammond gives another very probable sense of this; He that instructs the nations, that is, gives them his law, shall not he correct, shall he not judge them according to that law, and call them to an account for their violations of it? In vain was the law given, if we will not receive and regard it. Does he argue, that the same word signifies to chastise and to instruct, because chastisement is intended for instruction, and instruction should go along with chastisement.

(3.) He argues from the works of grace; He that teaches man knowledge, shall he not know? He not only, as the God of nature, has given the light of reason, but, as the God of grace, has given the light of revelation; no man what is true wisdom and understanding; and he that does this, shall he not know? Job xxxviii. 23, 28. The flowing of the streams is a certain sign of the fulness of the fountain. If all knowledge is from God, no doubt, all knowledge is in God. From this general doctrine of God’s omniscience, he not only confutes the atheists, who said, “The Lord shall not see, (v. 7.) he will not take cognizance of what we do; but awakens us all to consider, that God will take cognizance even of what we think; (v. 11.) The Lord knows the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. [1.] He knows those thoughts in particular, concerning God's commanding at the wickedness of the wicked, and knows them to be vain; and laughs at the folly of those, who by such fond conceits buoy themselves up in sin. [2.] He knows all the thoughts of the children of men, and knows them to be, for the most part, vain; that the imaginations of the thoughts of men's hearts are evil, only evil, and that continually. Even in good thoughts there is a fickleness and inconstancy, which may well be called vanity. It concerns us to keep a strict guard upon our thoughts, because God takes particular notice of them. Thoughts are words to God, and vain thoughts are provocations.

12. Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O Lord, and teachest him out of thy law; 13. That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit be digged for the wicked. 14. For the Lord will not cast off his people, neither will he forsake his inheritance: 15. But judgment shall return unto righteousness; and all the upright in heart shall follow it. 16. Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers? or who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity? 17. Unless the Lord had been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence. 18. When I said, My foot slippeth; thy mercy, O Lord, held me up. 19. In the multitude of my thoughts within me thy comforts delight my soul. 20. Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by a law? 21. They gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous, and condemn the innocent blood. 22. But the Lord is my defence; and my God is the rock of my refuge. 23. And he shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the Lord our God shall cut them off.

The psalmist, having denounced tribulation to them that trouble God's people, here assures them that they are troubled of rest. See 2 Thess. i. 6, 7. He speaks comfort to suffering saints, from God's promises and his own experience.

1. From God's promises, which are such as not only save them from being miserable, but secure a happiness to them; (v. 12.) Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest. Here he looks above the instruments of trouble, and eyes the hand of God, which gives it another name, and puts quite another colour upon it. The enemies break in pieces God's people, (v. 5.) they aim at no less; but the truth of the matter is, that God by them chastens his people, as the father the son, so by his judgments, and the persecutors are only the rod he makes use of. Howbeit they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so, Isa. x. 5.-7. Now it is here promised.

1. That God's people shall get good by their sufferings; when he chasteneth them, he will teach them, and blessed is the man who is thus taken under a divine discipline; for none teaches like God. Note, (1.) The afflictions of the saints are fatherly chastenings, designed for our instruction, reformation, and improvement. (2.) When the teachings of the word and Spirit go along with the rebukes of Providence, they then both bespeak man blessed, and help to make them so; for then they are marks of adoption, and means of sanctification. When we are chastened, we must pray to be taught, and look into the law as the best expositor of Providence. It is not the chastening itself that does good, but the teaching that goes along with it, and is the exposition of it.

2. That they should see through their sufferings; (v. 13.) That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity. Note, (1.) There is a rest remaining for the people of God after the days of their adversity, which, though they may be many and long, shall be numbered and finished in due time, and shall not last always. He that sends the trouble will send the rest, that he may comfort them according to the time that he has afflicted them. (2.) God therefore teaches his people by their troubles, that he may prepare them for deliverance, and so give them rest from their troubles; that, being reformed, they might be relieved, and the affliction, having done its work, may be removed. 3. That they shall see the ruin of those that are the instruments of their sufferings; which is the matter of a promise, not as gratifying any passion of theirs, but as redounding to the glory of God; Until the pit is digged, or rather, while the pit is in digging, for the wicked, God is ordering peace for his people in some time that he is ordering his arrows against the persecutors.

4. That though they may be cast down, yet certainly they shall not be cast off, v. 14. Let God's suffering people assure themselves of this, that whatever their friends do, God will not cast them off, nor throw them out of his covenant or out of his care; he will not forsake them, because they are his inheritance, which he will not quit his title to, nor suffer himself to be disseised of. St. Paul comforted himself with this, Rom. xi. 1.

5. That, bad as things are, they shall mend, and though they are now out of course, yet they shall return to their due and ancient channel; (v. 15.) Judgment shall return unto righteousness; the seeming disorders of Providence (for real ones there never were) shall be rectified. God's judgment, his government, looks sometimes as if it were at a distance from righteousness, while the wicked prosper, and the best men meet with the worst usage; but it shall return to righteousness again, either in this world, or, at the furthest, in the judgment of the great day, which will set all to rights. Then all the upright in heart shall be after it; they shall follow it with their praises, and with entire satisfaction; they shall return to a prosperous and flourishing condition, and shine forth out of obscurity; they shall all appropriate themselves to the glory of Divine Providence, and with suitable affections attend all its motions. They shall walk after the Lord, Hos. xi. 10. Dr. Hammond thinks this was most eminently fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem first, and afterward of heathen Rome, the crucifiers of Christ, and persecutors of Christians, and the rest which the churches had thereby; Then judgment returned even to righteousness, to Righteousness, as to God, and to God's people, who, then, were as much comforted as before, they had been troubled on.

II. From his own experiences and observations. 1. He and his friends had been oppressed by cruel and impenurious men that had power in their hands, and abused it by abusing all good people with it. They were themselves evil-doers, and workers of iniquity; (v. 16.) they abandoned them-settles to all manner of impiety and immorality, and then their throne was a throne of iniquity, v. 20. Their dignity served to put a reputation upon sin, and their authority was employed to support it, and to bring about their wicked designs. It is pity that ever a throne, which should be a terror to evildoers, and a protection and praise to them that do well, should be the seat and shelter of iniquity. That is a throne of iniquity which, by the policy of its council, frames mischief, and by its magistracy enacts and turns it into a law. Iniquity is despised enough, even when human laws are against it, which often prove too weak to give an effectual check to it; but how insolent, how mixinuous, is it when it is backed by a law? Iniquity is not the better, but much the worse, for being enacted by law; nor will it excuse those that practise it, to say, that they did but do as they were bidden. These workers of iniquity, having framed mischief by a law, take care to see the law executed; for the seamen themselves together against the soul of the righteous, who dare not keep the statutes of Omri, nor the law of the house of Ahab; and they condemned the innocent blood for violating their decrees. See an instance in Daniel's enemies; they framed mischief by a law, when they obtained an impious edict against prayer, (Dan. vi. 7.) which when Daniel would not obey, they assembled round about him, (v. 13.) and shed innocent blood to the lions. The best benefactors of mankind have often been thus treated, under colour of law and justice, as the worst of malefactors.

2. The oppression they were under bore very hard upon them, and oppressed their spirits too. Let not suffering saints despair, though, when they are persecuted, they find themselves perplexed and cast down; it was so with the psalmist here; His wounds were wonderfully made, while his wit's end, and knew not what to say or do; he was, in his own apprehension, at his life's end, ready to drop into the grave, that land of silence. St. Paul, in a like case, received a sentence of death within himself, 2 Cor. i. 8, 9. He said, "My foot slippeth;" (v. 18.) I am going irretrievably, there is no remedy, I must fall, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul; my hope fails me, I do not find such a death as he offers; I am not without a refuge, he says; I have not found." See Ps. lxiii. 2. He had a multitude of perplexed entangled thoughts within him concerning the case he was in, and the construction to be made of it; and concerning the course he should take, and what was likely to be the issue of it.

3. In this distress, they sought for help and succour, and some relief. (1.) They looked about for it, and were disappointed; (v. 16.) "Who will rise up for me against the evildoers? Have I any friend who, in love to me, will appear for me? Has justice any friend who, in a pious indignation at unrighteousness, will plead my injured cause?" He looked, but there was none to save, there was none to uphold. Note, When on the side of the oppressors there is power, it is no marvel if the oppressed have no comforter, none that dare own them, or speak a good word for them, Excl. iv. 1. When St. Paul was brought before Nero's throne of iniquity, no man stood by him, 2 Tim. iv. 16. (2.) They looked up for it, v. 20. They humbly expostulate with God; "Lord, shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee? Wilt thou countenance and support these tyrants in their wickedness? We know thou wilt not." A throne has fellowship with God, when it is a throne of justice, and answers the end of the erecting of it; for him kings reign, and when they reign for him, their judgments are his, and he owns them as his ministers, and whoever resists them, or rises up against them, shall receive to themselves damnation; but when it becomes a throne of iniquity, it has no fellowship with God. Far be it from the just and holy God, that he should be the Patron of those, or even of princes and those that sit in thrones; yea, though they be the thrones of the house of David.

4. They found succour and relief in God, and in him only; when other friends failed, in him they had a faithful and powerful Friend; and it is recommended to all God's suffering saints to trust in him. (1.) God helps at a dead lift; (v. 17.) "When I cried almost out of silence, then the Lord was my Help, kept me alive, kept me from falling, and I had made him my Help, by putting my trust in him, and expecting relief from him, I could never have kept possession of my own soul; but living by faith in him has kept my head above water, has given me breath, and something to say." (2.) God's goodness is the great support of sinking spirits; (v. 18.) "When I said, My foot slips in; into despair, then thy mercy, O Lord, held me up, kept me from falling, and defended the design of those who consulted to cost me down from mine excellency," ix. 4. We are beholden not only to God's power, but to his pity, for spiritual supports; Thy mercy, the gifts of thy mercy, and my hope in thy mercy, held me up. God's right hand sustains his people, when they look on their right hand and on their left, and there is no strength to be held; and we are then prepared for his gracious support, when we have opened ourselves to him, under weakness and inability to stand by our own strength, and come to God, to acknowledge it, and to tell him how our foot slips.

(3.) Divine consolations are the effectual relief of troubled spirits; (v. 19.) "In the multitude of my thoughts within me, which are noisy like a multitude, crowding and justling one another like a multitude, and very unruly and ungovernable; in the multitude of them, I will set my face." This is a gracious thought, thoughts, thy comforts delight my soul; and they are never more delightful than when they come in so seasonably to silence my unquiet thoughts, and keep my mind easy." The world's comforts give but little delight to the soul, when it is hurried with melancholy thoughts, they are songs to a heavy heart; but God's comforts will reach the soul, and not the fancy only, and will bring with them that peace and satisfaction for which the smiles of the world cannot give, and which the frowns of the world cannot take away.

5. God is, and will be, as a righteous Judge, the Patron and Protector of right, and the Punisher and Avenger of wrong; this the psalmist had both the assurance of and the experience of.

(1.) He will right the injured; (v. 22.) "When none else will, or can, or dare, shelter me, The Lord is my Defence, to preserve me from the evil of my troubles, from sinking under them, and being ruined by them; and he is the Rock of my refuge, in the clefts of which I may take shelter, and on the top of which I may set my feet, to be out of the reach of danger." God is his people's Refuge; to whom they may flee, in whom they are safe, and may be secure; he is the Rock of their refuge, so strong, so firm, impregnable, immovable, as a rock; natural fastnesses sometimes exceed artificial fortifications.

(2.) He will recompense with the injurious; (v. 23.) He shall render to them their own iniquity; he shall deal with them according to their deserts; and that very mischief which they did and designed against God's people, shall be brought upon themselves; it follows, He shall cut them off in their wickedness. A man cannot be more miserable than his own wickedness will make him, if God visit it upon him; it will cut him in the remembrance of it; it will cut him off in the recompense of it. This the psalmists.
concludes with the triumphant assurance of; Yea, the Lord our God, who takes our part, and owns us for his, shall cut them off from any fellowship with him, and so shall make them completely miserable, and their pomp and power shall stand them in no stead.

PSALM XC V.

For the expounding of this psalm we may borrow a great deal of light from the apostle’s discourse, (Heb. iii. and iv.) it appears both to have been penned by David, and to have been calculated for the days of the Messiah; for it is there said expressly, (Heb. iv. 7.) that the day here spoken of, (v. 7.) is to be understood of the gospel-day, in which God speaks to us by his Son, in a voice which is heard in the earth, as all the psalms are to be heard beside that of Canaan. In singing psalms, it is intended, 1. That we should make melody unto the Lord: this we are excited to do, and assisted in doing, being called upon to praise God, (v. 1, 2.) as a great God, (v. 3-5.) and as our gracious Benefactor, v. 6. 2. That we should teach and admonish ourselves, and one another; and we are taught and warned to hear God’s voice, (v. 7.) and not to harden our hearts, as the Israelites in the wilderness did, (v. 2, 5.) lest we fall under God’s wrath, and fall short of his rest, as they did, v. 10. 11. This psalm must be sung with a holy reverence of God’s majesty, and a dread of his justice, with a desire to please him, and a fear to offend him.

1. O COME, let us sing unto the Lord; let us make a joyful noise to the rock of our salvation. 2. Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with psalms. 3. For the Lord is a great God, and a great King above all gods. 4. In his hand are the deep places of the earth; the strength of the hills is his also. 5. The sea is his, and he made it; and his hands formed the dry land. 6. O come, let us worship and bow down; let us kneel before the Lord our Maker. 7. For he is our God; and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand.

The psalmist says, as often elsewhere, stirs up himself and others to praise God; for it is a duty which ought to be performed by the most lively affections, and which we have great need to be excited to, being very often backward to it, and cold in it. Observe, 1. How God is to be praised. 1. With holy joy and delight in him. The praising song must be a joyful noise; (v. 1.) and again, v. 2. Spiritual joy is the heart and soul of thankful praise. It is the will of God, (such is the condescension of his grace,) to have glory to him, as a Being infinite, perfect and blessed, we should at the same time, rejoice in him, as our Father and King, and a God in covenant with us. 2. With humble reverence and a holy awe of him; (v. 6.) "Let us worship, and bow down, and kneel before him, as becomes those who know what an infinite distance there is between us and God, how much we are in danger of his wrath, and in need of his mercy." Though bodily exercise, as the psalmist sets little, yet certainly it is our duty to glorify God with our bodies by the outward expressions of reverence, seriousness, and humility, in the duties of religious worship. 3. We must praise God with our voice; we must speak forth, sing forth, his praises out of the abundance of a heart filled with love, and joy, and thankfulness; Sing to the Lord, make a noise, a joyful noise to him, with psalms; as those who are ourselves much affected with his greatness and goodness, are forced to own ourselves so, are desirous to be more and more affected therewith, and would willingly be instrumental to kindle and inflame the same pious and devout affection in others also. 4. We must praise God in concert, in the solemn nature of it; "Come, let us sing; let us join in singing to the Lord; not others without me, nor I alone, but others with me. Let us come together before his presence, in the courts of his house, where his people are wont to attend him, and to expect his manifestations of himself." Whenever we come into God’s presence, we must come with thanksgiving that we are admitted to such a favour; and whenever we come before God’s presence, let us set ourselves before him, and present ourselves to him in the ordinances which he has appointed.

II. Why God is to be praised, and what must be the matter of our praise; we do not want matter, it was well if we did not want a heart. We must praise God,

1. Because he is a great God, and Sovereign Lord of all, v. 3. He is great, and therefore greatly to be praised. He is infinite and immense, and has all perfection in himself. (1.) He has great power; he is a great King above all gods; above all deputed deities, all magistrates, to whom he said, Ye are gods; he manages them all, and serves his own purposes by them, and to him they are all accountable; above all counterfeit deities, all pretenders, all usurpers; he can do that which none of them can do; he can do, and will, famish and vanquish them all. (2.) He has great possessions. This lower world is here particularly specified; we reckon those great men who have large territories, which they call their own against all the world, which yet are a very insconsiderable part of the universe; how great then is that God whose the whole earth is, and the fulness thereof; not only under whose feet it is, as he has an incontestable dominion over all the creatures, and a property in them, but in whose hand it is, as he has the actual directing and disposing of all; (v. 4.) even the deep places of the earth, which are out of our sight, subterraneous springs and mines, are in his hand; and the height of the hills, which are out of our reach, whatever grows or feeds upon them, is his also. This may be taken figuratively; the meanness of the children of men, who are as the low places of the earth, are not beneath his cognizance; and the greatest, who are as the strength of the hills, are not above his control. Whatever strength is in any creature, it is derived from God, and employed for him; (v. 5.) The sea is his, and all that is in it; (the waves fulfil his word;) it is his, for he made it, gathered its waters, and fixed its shores; the dry land, though given to the children of men, is his too, for he still reserved the property to himself; it is his, for his hands formed it, when his word made the dry land appear. He is the Author of all, and without dispute, the Owner of all. This being a gospel psalm, we may very well suppose that it is the Lord Jesus whom we are here taught to praise; he is a great God; the Mighty God is one of his titles, and God over all, blessed for evermore; as Mediator, he is a great King above all gods; by him kings reign; and angels, principalities, and powers, are subject to him; by him, as the Eternal Word, as the Author of all things, all the universe is subject to him, he should be the Restorer and Reconciler of all, who was the Creator of all, Col. i. 16, 20. To him all power is given both in heaven and in earth, and into his hand all things are delivered. It is he that sets one foot on the sea, and the other on the earth, as sovereign Lord of both; (Rev. x. 2.) and therefore to him we must sing our songs of praise, and before him we must worship and bow down.
2. Because he is our God; not only has a dominion over us, as he has over all the creatures, but stands in special relation to us; (v. 7.) He is our God, and therefore it is expected we should praise him: who will, if we do not? What else did he make us for, but that we should be to him for a name and a praise?

(1.) He is our Creator, and the Author of our being; we must kneel before the Lord our Maker, v. 6. He knelt before some texts which they themselves made; we kneel before a God who made us and all the world; and who is therefore our rightful Proprietor; for his we are, and not our own.

(2.) He is our Saviour, and the Author of our blessedness. He is here called the Rock of our salvation; (v. 1.) not only the Founder, but the very Foundation, of that Work of wonder, on whom it is built. That Rock is Christ; to him therefore we must sing our songs of praises, to him also upon the throne, and to the Lamb.

(3.) We are therefore his, under all possible obligations; we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand; all the children of men are so; they are fed and led by his providence, which cares for them, and conducts them, as the shepherd the sheep. We must praise him, not only because he made us, but because he preserves and maintains us, and our breath and ways are in his hand. All the church's children are in a special manner so; Israel are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand; and therefore he demands their homage in a special manner. The gospel-church is his flock, Christ is the great and good Shepherd of it; we, as Christians, are led by his hand into the green pastures, by him we are protected and well-provided for, to his honour and service we are entirely devoted as a peculiar people, and therefore to him must be glory in the churches, (whether it be in the world or no,) throughout all ages, Eph. iii. 21.

7. — To-day, if ye will hear his voice, Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness. When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work. Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways: 11. Unto whom I sware in my wrath, that they should not enter into my rest.

The latter part of this psalm, which begins in the middle of a verse, is an exhortation to those that sing gospel-psalms to live gospel-lives, and to hear the voice of God's word; otherwise, how can they expect that he should hear the voice of their prayers and praises?

Observe, 1. The duty required of all those that are the people of Christ's pasture, and the sheep of his hand. He expects that they hear his voice, for he has said, My sheep hear my voice, John x. 27. We are his people, say they. Are you so? Then hear his voice. If you call him Master, or Lord, then do the things which he says, and be his willing obedient people. Hear the voice of his doctrine, of his law, and, in both, of his Spirit; hear and heed; hear and yield, Hear his voice, and not the voice of a stranger. If you will hear his voice, to-day, as a wise man; that you would hear his voice! That ye should be so wise, and do so well for yourselves; like that, If thou hadst known; (Luke xix. 42.) that is, Oh that thou hadst known! Christ's voice must be heard to-day; this the Apostle lays much stress upon, applying it to the gospel-day. While he is speaking to you, see that you attend to him, for this day of your opportunities will not last always; improve it therefore, while it is called to-day, Heb. iii. 13, 15. Hearing the voice of Christ is the same with believing; To-day, if by faith you accept the gospel offer, well and good, but to-morrow it may be too late. In a matter of such vast importance, nothing more dangerous than delay.

II. The sin they are warned against, as inconsistent with the believing obedient ear required, and that is, hardness of heart. If ye will hear his voice, and profit by what you hear, then do not harden your hearts; for the seed sown on the rock never brought any fruit to perfection. The Jews therefore believed not the gospel of Christ, because their hearts were hardened; they were blind to the evil of sin, and of their danger by reason of sin, and therefore they regarded not the offer of salvation; they would not bend to the yoke of Christ, nor yield to his demands; and, if the sinner's heart be hardened, it is his own act and deed, (he hardening it himself,) and he alone shall bear the blame for ever.

III. The example they are warned by, which is that of the Israelites in the wilderness: Take heed of sinning likewise; and, if ever you did, lest you be shut out of the everlasting rest, as they were out of Canaan. Be not, as your fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation, ix. 8. Thus here, Harden not your heart, as you did, that is, your ancestors, in the provocation, or in Meribah, the place where they quarrelled with God and Moses, (Exod. xvii. 2-7.) and in the day of temptation in the wilderness, v. 8. So often did they provoke God by their distrusts and murmuring, that the whole time of their continuance in the wilderness might be called a day of temptation, or Massah, the other name given to that place, (Exod. xvii. 7.) because they tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? This was in the wilderness, where they could not help themselves, but lay at God's mercy, and where God wonderfully helped them, and gave them such sensible proofs of his power, and tokens of his favour, as never any people had before or since.

Note. 1. Days of temptation and days of provocation: nothing is more offensive to God than disbelief of his promise, and despair of the performance of it, because of some difficulties that seem to lie in the way. 2. The more experience we have had of the power and goodness of God, the greater is our sin, if we distrust him. What, to tempt him in the wilderness, where we live upon him! This is as monstrous as it is absurd and unreasonable. 3. Hardness of heart is at the bottom of all our distrusts of God, and quarrels with him. That is a hard heart which receives not the impressions of divine discoveries, and conforms not to the intentions of the divine will, which will not melt, which will not bend. 4. The sins of others ought to be warnings to us not to tread in their steps. The murmings of Israel were written for our admonition, 1 Cor. x. 11.

Now here observe,

(1.) The charge drawn up, in God's name, against the unbelieving Israelites, v. 9, 10. God here, many ages after, complains of their ill conduct toward him, with the expressions of high resentment. [1.] Their sin was unbelief: they tempted God and provoked him; they questioned whether they might take his word, and insisted upon further inquiry, he being called forward to Canaan, by sending spies; when those discouraged them, they protested against the sufficiency of the divine power and promises; and would make a captain, and return into Egypt, Numb. xiv. 3, 4. This is called rebel PSALMS, XCVI.

This psalm is part of that which was delivered into the hand of Asaph and his brethren; (1 Chron. xvi. 7.) by which it appears, both that David was the penman of it, and that it has reference to the bringing up of the ark to the city of David. Whether that long psalm was made first, and this afterward taken out of it, or this made first, and afterward borrowed to make up that, is not certain; but this is certain, that, though it was sung at the translation of the ark, it looks farther, to the kingdom of Christ, and is designed to celebrate the glories of that kingdom, especially that of the constitution of it, of which the apostle, in Heb. x. 1. 2. speaks. A call given to all people to praise God, to worship him, and give glory to him, as a great and glorious God, v. 1.-9. II. Notice given to all people of God's universal government and judgment, which ought to be the matter of universal joy, v. 10.-18. In singing this psalm, we ought to have our hearts filled with great and high thoughts of the glory of God and the grace of the gospel, and with an entire satisfaction in Christ's sovereign dominion, and in the expectation of the judgment to come.

1. O SING unto the LORD a new song; sing unto the LORD all the earth.

2. Sing unto the LORD, bless his name: show forth his salvation from day to day.

3. Declare his glory among the heathen, his wonders among all people.

4. For the LORD is great, and greatly to be praised: he is to be feared above all gods. 5. For all the gods of the nations are idols: but the LORD made the heavens.

6. Honour and majesty are before him; strength and beauty are in his sanctuary.

7. Give unto the LORD, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the LORD glory and strength; 8. Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name: bring an offering, and come into his courts.

9. O worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness: fear before him all the earth.

These verses will be best expounded by pious and devout affections working in our souls toward God, with a high veneration for his majesty and transcendent excellence. The call here given us to praise God is very lively, the expressions are raised and repeated, to all which the echo of a thankful heart should make agreeable returns. We are here required to honour God.

1. With songs, v. 1, 2. Three times we are here called to sing unto the LORD: sing to the Father, to the Son, to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, when the morning stars sang together, is now, in the church triumphant, and shall be, in the church triumphant. We have reason to do it often, and we have need to be often reminded of it, and stirred up to it. Sing unto the LORD, that is, "Bless his name, speak well of him, that you may bring..."
others to think well of him." 1. Sing a new song, an excellent song, the product of new affections, clothed with new expressions. We speak of nothing more desirable than an old song, but the newness of a song recommends it; for there we expect something surprising. A new song is a song for new favours, for those compassion which are new every morning. A new song is a New Testament song, a song of praise for the new covenant, and the precious privileges of that covenant. A new song is a song that shall be ever new, and shall never wax old or vanish away; it is an everlasting song, that shall never be antiquated, or out of date. 2. Let all the earth sing this song, not the Jews only, to whom the covenant was given, but all the Gentiles also; his worshippers, who could not sing the Lord's song in [would not sing it to] a strange land; but let all the earth, all that are redeemed from the earth, learn and sing this new song, Rev. xiv. 3. This is a prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles; all the earth shall have this new song put into their mouths, shall have both cause and call to sing it. 3. Let the subject-matter of this song be his salvation; the great salvation which was to be wrought out by the new and living way of Jesus; that must be showed forth as the cause of this joy and praise. 4. Let these songs be sung constantly, and not only in the times appointed for the solemn feasts, but from day to day; it is a subject that can never be exhausted. Let day unto day utter this speech, that, under the influence of gospel-devotions, we may daily exemplify a gospel-conversation.

II. With sermons, (v. 3.) Declare his glory among the heathen, even his wonders among all people. 1. Salvation by Christ is here spoken of as a work of wonder, and that in which the glory of God shines very bright; in showing forth that salvation, we declare God's glory as it shines in the face of Christ. 2. This salvation was, in the Old Testament times, as heaven's happiness is now, a glory to be revealed; but, in the fulness of time, it was declared, and a full discovery made of that even to babes, which prophets and kings desired and wished to see, and might not. 3. What was then discovered was declared only among the Jews, but it is now declared among the heathen, among all people; the nations which long sat in darkness now see this great light. The apostles' commission to preach the gospel to every creature, is copied from this here; Declare his glory among the heathen.

III. With religious services, v. 7-9. Hitherto, though in every nation they that feared God, and wrought righteousness, were accepted of him, yet instituted ordinances were the peculiarities of the Jewish religion: but, in gospel-times, the kindreds of the people shall be invited and admitted into the service of God, and be as welcome as ever the Jews were. The court of the Gentiles shall no longer be an outward court, but shall be had in common with the court of Israel. All the earth is here summoned to fear the Lord, to worship him according to his appointment. Let every one offered to his name, Mal. i. 11. Zech. xiv. 17. Isa. lxxvi. 23. This indeed spake mortification to the Jews, but withal it gave a prospect of that which would redound very much to the glory of God, and to the happiness of mankind.

Now observe how the acts of devotion to God are here described. 1. We must give unto the Lord; not as if God needed any thing, or could receive any thing, for he is full, and he gives not that which is his own before; much less be benefitted by it; but we must, in our best affections, adorations, and services, return to him what we have received from him, and do it freely, as what we give; for God loves a cheerful giver. It is debt, it is rent, it is tribute, it is what must be paid, and, if not, will be recovered, and yet if it come from holy love, God is pleased to accept it as a gift. 2. We must acknowledge God to be the sovereign Lord, and pay homage to him accordingly; (v. 7.) Give unto the Lord glory and strength, glory and eminence, or dominion, so sense. As king, he is of the red with rebes of glory, and girt with the girdle of power, and we must submit to both; Thine is the kingdom, and therefore thine is the power and the glory. "The giving to God, do not take it to yourselves, nor give it to any creature." 3. We must give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name, that is, to the discovery he has been pleased to make of himself to the children of men. In all the acts of religious worship, this he expects, which we must aim at, to honour God, to pay him some of that revenue which he gives us to use him as the best of beings, and the Fountain of our being. 4. We must bring an offering into his courts. We must bring ourselves in the first place; the offering up of the Gentiles, Rom. xvi. 16. We must offer up the sacrifices of praise continually, (Heb. xiii. 15.) must often appear before God in public worship, and never appear before him empty. 5. We must worship him in the beauty of holiness, in the solemn beauty of holiness, as it is always religiously observed, the beauty of which is their holiness, that is, their conformity to the rule: we must worship him with holy hearts, sanctified by the grace of God, devoted to the glory of God, and purified from the pollutions of sin. 6. We must fear before him; all the acts of worship must be performed from a principle of the fear of God, and with a holy awe and reverence.

In the midst of these calls to praise God, and give glory to him, glorious things are here said of him, both as motives to praise and matter of praise. The Lord is great, and therefore greatly to be praised, (v. 4.) and to be feared; great and honourable to his attendants, great and terrible to his adversaries. Even the new song proclaims God great as well as good; for his goodness is his glory; and when the everlasting gospel is preached, this is it, Fear God, and give glory to him, Rev. xiv. 6, 7. (1.) He is great in his sovereignty over all that pretend to be deities; none dare vie with him; He is to be feared above all gods, all princes, who were often defied after their deaths, and even while they lived were adored as petty gods; or rather, all idols, the gods of the nations, v. 5. All the earth being called to sing the new song, they must be convinced that the Lord Jehovah, to whose honour they must sing it, is the One only living and true God, infinitely above all rivals and pretenders; he is great, and they are little; he is all, and they are nothing; so the word used for idols signifies; for we know that an idol is nothing in the world, 1 Cor. viii. 4. (2.) He is great in his right, even to the noblest part of the creation; for it is his own work, and derives its being from him: The Lord made the heavens, and all their hosts; they are the work of his fingers, (vii. 3.) so nicely, so curiously, as they may be great, and yet may be little, and of no fashion or form; the creatures of men's fancies; but our God, the Creator of the sun, moon, and stars, those lights of heaven, which they imagined to be gods, and worshipped as such. (3.) He is great in the manifestation of his glory both in the upper and lower world; among his angels in heaven, and his saints on earth; (v. 6.) Splendour and majesty are before him, in his immediate presence above, where the angels cover their faces, as unable to bear the dazzling lustre of that glory. Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary, both that above and this below. In God there is everything that is awful, and yet every thing that is amiable. If we attend him in his sanctuary, we shall behold his beauty, for God is Love, and experience his strength, for he is our Rock. Let us therefore go forth, in his strength, enwrapped with his beauty.

10. Say among the heathen, that the Lord reigneth: the world also shall be established; that it shall not be moved: he shall judge the people righteously. 11. Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof. 12. Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein: then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice. 13. Before the Lord: for he cometh, for he cometh to judge the earth; he shall judge the world with righteousness, and the people with his truth.

We have here instructions given to those who were to preach the gospel to the nations, what to preach; or to those who had themselves received the gospel, what account to give of it to their neighbors, what to say among the heathen; and it is an illustrious prophecy of the setting up of the kingdom of Christ upon the ruins of the Devil's kingdom, which began immediately after his ascension, and will continue in the doing till the mystery of God be finished.

1. Let it be told that the Lord reigns, the Lord Christ reigns, that King whom God determined to set upon his holy hill of Zion. See how this was first said among the heathen by Peter, Acts iv. 6. Some of the ancients added a gloss to this, which by degrees crept into the text, The Lord reigneth from the tree; so Justin Martyr, Austin, and others, quote it; meaning the cross, when he had this title written over him, The King of the Jews. It was because he became obedient to death, even the death of the cross, that God exalted him, and gave him a name above every name, a throne above every throne. Some of the heathen came to inquire after him that was born King of the Jews, Matt. ii. 2. Now let them know that he is come, and his kingdom is set up.

2. Let it be told that Christ's government will be the world's happy settlement; The world also shall be established, that it shall not be moved. The natural world shall be established; the standing of the world, and its stability, are owing to the mediation of Christ. Sin had given it a shock, and still threatens his ruin: Christ as its own parent, unites all things, and preserves the course of nature. The world of mankind shall be established, shall be preserved, till all that belong to the election of grace are called in, though a guilty provoking world. The Christian religion, as far as it is embraced, shall establish states and kingdoms, and preserve good order among men. The church in the world shall be established, (so some,) that it cannot be moved; for as it is by a rock; and the grass of heaven shall never prevail against it; it is a kingdom that cannot be shaken.

3. Let them be told that Christ's government will be incontestably just and righteous; He shall judge the people righteously, (v. 10.) judge the world with righteousness and with his truth, v. 13. Judging is here put for ruling; and though this may be extended to the general judgment of the world at the last, it has an especial reference to the Messianic (v. 3. v. 5.) yet it refers more immediately to Christ's first coming, and the setting up of his kingdom in the world by the gospel. He says himself, For judgment am I come into this world; (John ix. 39.—xii. 31.) and declares that all judgment was committed to him, John v. 22, 27. His ruling and judging with righteousness and truth, signifies, (1.) That all the laws and ordinances of his kingdom shall be consonant to the rules and principles of eternal truth and equity, that is, to the rectitude and justice of God. (2.) That his administrations of government shall be just and faithful, and according to what he has said. (3.) That he shall rule in the hearts and consciences of men by the commanding power of truth, and the Spirit of righteousness and sanctification. When Pilate asked our Saviour, Art thou a king? he answered, For this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness into the truth; (John xviii. 37.) he ruled by his truth, commands men's wills by informing their judgments.

4. Let them be told that his coming draws nigh; that this King, this Judge, standeth before the door, for he cometh, for he cometh. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, said so, Behold, the Lord cometh, Judges 14. Between this and his first coming the revolutions of many ages intervened, and yet he came at the set time, and so sure will his second coming be; though it is now long since it was said, Behold, he comes in the clouds, (Rev. i. 7.) and he is not yet come. See 2 Pet. iii. 4, &c.

5. Let them be called upon to rejoice in this honour that is put upon the Messiah, and this great trust that is to be lodged in his hand; (v. 11, 12.) Let heaven and earth rejoice, the sea, the field, and all the trees of the wood. The dialect here is poetical; the meaning is, (1.) That the days of the Messiah will be joyful days, and, as far as his grace and government extend, will bring joy along with them; we have reason to give that place, that soul, joy, into which Christ was admitted. See an instance of both; (Acts viii.) when Somaria received the gospel, there was great joy in that city; (v. 8.) and when the eunuch was baptized, he went on his way rejoicing, v. 39. (2.) That it is the duty of every one of us to bid Christ and his kingdom welcome; for though they come conquering and to conquer, yet they come peacefully. Hosanna, Blessed be he that cometh; and again, Hosanna, Blessed be the kingdom of our father David, Mark xi. 9, 10. Not only let the daughter of Zion rejoice that her King cometh, (Zech. ix. 9.) but let all rejoice. (3.) That the whole creation will have reason to rejoice in the setting up of Christ's kingdom, even the sea, and the field; for as by the sin of the first Adam the whole creation was made subject to vanity, so by the presence of the second Adam it shall, some day, to his honor, and we make the last, be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God, Rom. viii. 20, 21. (4.) That there will, in the first place, be joy in heaven, joy in the presence of the angels of God; for when the First-begotten was brought into the world, they sang their anthems to his praise, Luke ii. 14. (5.) That God will graciously accept the holy joys and praises of all the Candidate for glory, and the children of the kingdom of Christ, be their capacity ever so mean. The sea can but roar, and how the trees of the wood can show that they rejoice, I know not; but he that searches the heart knows what is the mind of the Spirit, and understands the language, the broken language, of the weakest.

PSALM XCVI.

This psalm dwells upon the same subject, and is set to the same tune, with the foregoing psalm. Christ is the Alpha and the Omega of both; they are both penned, and are both to be sung, to the same key and air of Messianic time. (v. 31.) yet it refers more immediately to Christ's first coming, and the setting up of his kingdom in the world by the gospel. He says himself, For judgment am I come into this world; (John ix. 39.—xii. 31.) and declares that all judgment was committed to him, John v. 22, 27. His ruling and judging with righteousness and truth, signifies, (1.) That all the laws and ordinances of his kingdom

THE LORD reigneth, let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of isles be glad therefor. 2. Clouds and darkness are round about him; righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. 3. A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about. 4. His lightnings enlighten the world: the earth saw, and trembled. 5. The hills melted like wax at the presence of the LORD, at the presence of the LORD of the whole earth. 6. The heavens declare his righteousness, and all the people see his glory. 7. Confounded be all they that serve graven images, that boast themselves of idols: worship him all ye gods.

What was to be said among the heathen in the forementioned psalm, (xvi. 10.) is here said again, (v. 1.) and is made the subject of this psalm, and of psalm xcix. The LORD reigns; that is the great truth here laid down. The Lord Jehovah reigns; he that made the world governs it; he that gave being gives motion and power, gives law and commission, gives success and event; every man's judgment proceeds from the Lord, from his counsel and providence, and in all affairs, both public and private, he performs the thing which he himself has appointed. The Lord Jesus reigns; the providential kingdom is twisted in with the mediatorial, and the administration of both is in the hand of Christ; who therefore is both the Head of the church, and Head over all things to the church. The kingdom of Christ is so constituted, that,

I. It may be matter of joy to all; and it will be so, if he be not their own lust. Let the earth rejoice; for hereby it is established; (xcvii. 10.) it is hallowed and enriched; and, indeed, rescued from the vanity which by sin it is made subject to. Not only let the people of Israel rejoice in him, as King of the Jews, and the daughter of Zion, as her King, but let all the earth rejoice in his elevation; for the kingdoms of the world shall, more or less, sooner or later, become his kingdoms; let the multitude of isles, the many or great isles, be glad thereof. This is applicable to our country, which is a great isle, and has many belonging to it; however, it speaks comfort in general to the Gentiles, whose countries are called the isles of the Gentiles, Gen. x. 5. There is enough in Christ for the multitude of the isles to rejoice in; for though many have been made happy in him, yet still there is room.

All have reason to rejoice in Christ's government. 1. In the equity of it. • There is an incontestable justice in all the acts of his government, both legislative and judicial; sometimes indeed clouds and darkness are round about him, his dispensations are altogether unaccountable, his way is in the sea, and his faith in the great waters; we are not aware of what he designs, what he drives at; nor is it fit that we should be let into the secrets of his government; there is a depth in his counsels which we must not pretend to fathom; but still righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne; a golden temple of just reigns beyond the reach of any but his administration. In this he resides, for it is his habitation. In this he rules, for it is the habitation of his throne. His commandments are, and will be, all righteous. Righteousness and judgment are the basis of his throne; (so Dr. Hammond,) for therefor his throne is for ever and ever, because his sceptre is a right sceptre, xlv. 6. The throne is established in righteousness. Even the heavens declare his righteousness; (v. 5.) it is as conspicuous and as illustrious as the heavens themselves. The angels of heaven will declare it, who are employed as messengers in the administration of his government, and to make mention of his acts, of both his creatures. His righteousness is incontestable; for who can contradict or dispute what the heavens declare? I. 6.

2. In the extent of it in the upper and lower world.

(1.) All the men on earth are under his government; either he is served by them, or he serves himself by them. All the people see his glory, or see in him, v. 2. The glory of God, the face of Christ, was made to shine in distant countries, among many people, more or less, among all people; the gospel was preached, for aught we know, in all languages, Acts ii. 5, 11. Miracles were wrought in all nations, and so all the people saw his glory. Have they not heard? Rom. x. 18.

(2.) All the angels in heaven are so; perhaps we should not have found this truth in those words, Heb. i. 6.) to worship him all ye gods, if we had not been directed to it by the inspired apostle, who, from the Septuagint version of those words, makes the Messiah to be introduced into the upper world, at the ascension, with this charge, (Heb. i. 6.) Let all the angels of God worship him; which helps us to a key to this whole psalm, and shows us that it must be applied to the exalted Redeemer, who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; which intimates that all power is given him both in heaven and earth, angels, and all visible and invisible powers being made subject unto him, 1 Pet. iii. 22. This speaks the honour of Christ, that he has such worshippers; and the honour of all good Christians, that they have such fellow-worshippers.

II. Christ's government, though it may be matter of joy to all, will yet be matter of terror to some, and it is their own fault that it is so, v. 3–5, 7. Observe;

When the kingdom of Christ was to be set up in the world, after his ascension, it would meet with many enemies, and much opposition would be given to it. He that reigns to the joy of the whole earth, yet, as he has his subjects, so he has his enemies, (v. 3.) that not only will not have him to reign over them, but would not have him to reign at all; that not only will not enter into the kingdom of heaven themselves, but do all they can to hinder those that are entering, Mat. xxv. 13. This was fulfilled in the calamities of the unbelieving Jews to the gospel of Christ, and the violent persecution which in all places they stirred up against the preachers and professors of it. These enemies are here called hills, (v. 5.) for their height and strength, and immoveable obstinacy. They were the princes of this world that crucified the Lord of glory, 1 Cor. ii. 8. Ps. ii. 2.

2. The opposition which the Jews gave to the setting up of Christ's kingdom turned to their own ruin. Their persecuting of the apostles, and forbidding them to speak to the Gentiles, filled up their sin, and brought wrath upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. That wrath is here compared, (1.) To consuming fire which goes before him, and burns up his enemies, that have made themselves like chaff and stubble, and have set the briers and thorns before him in battle, Isa. xxvii. 4. This fire毁灭ing fire proceeds from his presence, it goes down upon the hills, but will even melt the hills themselves like wax, v. 5. When our God appears as a consuming Fire, even rocks will be wax before him. The most resolute and daring opposition will be baffled at the presence of the Lord. His very prosence is enough to shame and sink it, for he is the Lord of the whole earth, by whom all the children of men are manageable, and to whom they are accountable. Men hate and persecute God's people, because they think him absent; that the Lord has forsaken the earth; but when he manifests his presence, his glory, and his power, he is feared by all his people, and delights in them, as the sun does in all his

The earth saw and trembled, and the ears of all that heard were made to tingle. This was fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nations by the Romans, about forty years after Christ's resurrection, which, like fire, wholly destroyed their people, and, destroying all their neighbours; (Deut. xxxix. 24.) but the heavens declare God's righteousness in it, and all the people, to this day, see his glory, in those last remaining monuments of his justice, the scattered Jews.

3. Idolaters also would be put to confusion by the setting up of Christ's kingdom; (v. 7.) Confounded be all they who serve graven images, the Gentile-world, who did service to them that by nature are no gods, (Gal. iv. 20.) who boast themselves of idols as their protectors, and therefore will not cease to serve idols, or to set up their graven images, till they are ashamed of them. Let them be ashamed that serve graven images. (1.) This is a prayer for the conversion of the Gentiles, that those who have been so long serving dumb idols may be convinced of their error, ashamed of their folly, and may, by the power of Christ's gospel, be brought to serve the only living and true God, and may be as much ashamed of their idols as ever they were proud of them. See Isa. ii. 20, 21. (2.) This is a prophecy of the ruin of those that would not be reformed and reclaimed from their idolatry; they shall be confounded by the destruction of paganism in the Roman empire, which was fulfilled about three hundred years after Christ, so much to the terror of idolaters, that some think it was the revolution under Constantine that made even the mighty men say to the rocks, Fall on us, and hide us, Rev. vi. 15, 16. This prayer and prophecy are still in force against antichristian idolaters, who may here read their doom; Confounded be all they that worship graven images. See Jer. xviii. 13.

8. Sion heard, and was glad; and the daughters of Judah rejoiced, because of thy judgments, O Lord. 9. For thou, Lord, art high above all the earth; thou art exalted far above all gods. 10. Ye that love the Lord, hate evil: he preserveth the souls of his saints; he delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked. 11. Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart. 12. Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous; and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

The kingdom of the Messiah, like the pillar of cloud and fire, as it has a dark side toward the Egyptians, so it has a bright side toward the Israel of God, that it may be kept up in spite of opposition; and then the earth saw and trembled, (v. 4.) but Zion heard, and was glad, very glad, to hear of the conversion of some, and of the confusion of others, that is, the conquest of all that stood it out against Christ. Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; for, behold, thy king comes unto thee, Zech. ix. 9. And not Zion only, where the temple was, but even the daughters of Judah, rejoiced; the common people, the inhabitants of the villages, they shall triumph in Christ's victories. The command (v. 1.) is, Let the earth rejoice; but it is only the sons of Zion and the daughters of Judah that do rejoice. All should bid the kingdom of the Messiah welcome, but few do. No heaven can be without sinner.

I. The reasons that are given for Zion's joy in the government of the Redeemer. The faithful servants of God may well rejoice and be glad; 1. Because God is glorified, and whatever rewards to his honour is very much his people's pleasure. They rejoice because of thy judgments, O Lord; which may take in both the judgments of his mouth, and the judgments of his hand, the word of his gospel, and his works wrought for the propagating of it, the miracles, and marvellous providences; for in these we must own, 'Thou, Lord, art high above all the earth; (v. 9.) thou hast manifested thy sovereignty in the kingdom of nature, and thy command of all its powers; and thy dominion over all nations, over all hearts; thou art exalted above all gods; all deputed gods, that is, princes; all counterfeit gods, that is, idols. The exaltation of Christ, and the advancement of God's glory among men thereby are made manifest, and hơn all, the glory of the kingdom of God, which is the mighty work of God to save his people.'

2. Because care is taken for their safety. Those that pay allegiance to Christ, as a King, shall be sure of his protection; princes are the shields of the earth, Christ is so to his subjects, they may put their trust under his shadow, and rejoice in it; for, (v. 10.) He preserves the souls of the saints; he preserves their lives as long as he has any work for them to do, and wonderfully delivers them many a time out of the hand of the wicked, their persecutors that thirst after their blood; for precision in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. But something more is meant than their lives; for they that will be his disciples must be willing to lay down their lives, and not inden for the securing of them. It is the immortal soul that Christ preserveth, the inward man, which may be renewed more and more when the outward man decays. He will preserve the souls of his saints from sin, from apostasy, and despair, under their greatest trials; he will deliver them out of the hands of the wicked one that seeks to devour them; he will preserve them safe to his heavenly kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 18. They have therefore reason to be glad, being thus safe.

3. Because provision is made for their comfort; those that rejoice in Christ Jesus, and in his exultation, have fountains of joy treasured up for them, which will be opened sooner or later; (v. 11.) Light is sown for the righteous, that is, gladness for the upright in heart. The subjects of Christ's kingdom are bid to expect tribulation in the world; they must suffer by its malice, and must not share in its myrrh; yet let them know, to their comfort, that light is sown for them, it is designed and prepared for them; what is sown will come up again in due time; though, like a winter seedness, it may lie long under the cloths, and seem to be lost and buried, yet it will come up in a great season; God's goodness shall be sure of a harvest in the appointed weeks. They that sow in tears, shall, without fail, reap in joy, exxxvi. 5, 6. Christ told his disciples, at parting, (John xvi. 20.) You shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy. Gladness is sure to the upright in heart, to those only that are sincere in religion. The joy of the hypocrite is but for a season; there is no serenity and joy lasting sincerity.

II. The rules that are given for Zion's joy.

1. Let it be a pure and holy joy; *Ye that love the Lord Jesus, that love his appearing and kingdom, that love his word and his exaltation, see that ye hate evil, the evil of sin, every thing that is offen-
PSALMS, XC VIII.

This psalm is to the same purport with the two foregoing psalms, and is a prophecy of the kingdom of the Messiah, and the setting of it up in the world, and the bringing of the Gentiles to it. The Chaldee entitles it a prophetic psalm. It sets forth, 1. The glory of the Redeemer, v. 1—3. II. The very need of the redeemed, v. 4—9. If we in a right manner give to Christ this glory, and upon right grounds take to ourselves this joy, in singing this psalm, we sing with understanding. If they who saw Christ's day at a distance, and in the promise only, must rejoice and triumph thus, much more reason have we to do so, when we see these things accomplished, and share in the better things provided for us, Heb. xi. 40.

A psalm.

1. O SING unto the Lord a new song; for he hath done marvellous things: his right hand and his holy arm hath gotten him the victory. 2. The Lord hath made known his salvation: his righteousness hath he openly showed in the sight of the heathen. 3. He hath remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel: all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

We are here called upon again to sing unto the Lord a new song, as before, xcvi. 1. "Sing a most excellent song, the best song you have." Let the song of Christ's love be like Solomon's on that subject, Song. ii. 7—12: "A new song, such a song as had never been sung before; for this is a mystery which was hid from ages and generations. Converts sing a new song, very different from what they had sung; they change their wonder, and change their joy, and therefore change their note. If the grace of God put a new heart into our breasts, it will therewith put a new song into our mouths. In the new Jerusalem there will be new songs sung, that will be new to eternity, and never wax old. Let this new song be sung to the praise of God, in consideration of these four things:

1. The wonders he hath wrought; He has done marvellous things, v. 1—4. The work of our salvation by Christ is a work of wonders. If we take a view of all the steps of it, from the contrivance of it, and the counsels of God concerning it before all time, to the consummation of it, and its everlasting consequences when time shall be no more, we shall say, God has in it done marvellous things; it is all his doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. The more it is known, the more it will be admired.

2. The conquests he has won: His right hand and his holy arm have gotten him the victory, v. 5—10. In other words, the Redeemer has surmounted all the difficulties that lay in the way of our redemption, has broken through them all, and was not discouraged by the services or sufferings appointed him. He has subdued all the enemies that opposed it, has gotten the victory over Satan, disarmed him, and cast him out of his strongholds, has spoiled principalities and powers, Col. ii. 15. has taken the fury from the mighty, Isa. xlix. 24. and given death his death's wound; he has gotten a clear and complete victory, not only for himself but for us also, for we through him are more than conquerors. He got this victory by his own power, there was none to help, none to uphold, none that durst venture into the service; but his right hand and his holy arm, which are therefore always stretched out with good success, because they have nothing to do with the flesh, but in a good cause; these have gotten him the victory, have brought him relief or deliverance. God's power and faithfulness, called here his right hand and his holy arm, brought relief to the Lord Jesus, in raising him from the dead, and exalting him personally to the right hand of God; so Dr. Hammond.

3. The discoveries he has made to the world of the work of redemption. What he has wrought for us he has revealed to us, and both by his Son; the gospel-revelation is that on which the new kingdom is founded; The word which God sent, Acts x. 36. The opening of the sealed book is that which is to be celebrated with songs of praise, (Rev. v. 8.) because it was brought to light the mystery which had long been hid in God. Observe, (1.) The subject of this discovery; his salvation and his righteousness, v. 3. Righteousness and salvation are always one together, as Isa. lxii. 10—xlvii. 13.—ii. 3, 6, 8. Salvation does not stand alone, and righteousness itself, and righteousness the way in which it was wrought, by the righteousness of Christ. Or, the salvation includes all our gospel-privileges, and the righteousness all our gospel-duties: both are made known, for God has joined them together, and we must not separate them. Or, righteousness is here put for the way of our justification by Christ, which is revealed in the gospel to be by faith, Rom. i. 17. (2.) The meaning of this discovery; he has actually showed it, not in types and figures as under the law, but it is written as with a sun-beam, that he that runs may read it. Ministers are appointed to preach it with all plenitude of speech. (3.) The extent of this discovery; it is made in the sight of the heathen, and not of the Jews only; All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God; for to the Gentiles was the word of salvation sent. (4.) The end of this discovery; it is intended to fulfill the promises of the Old Testament, in this; (v. 3.) He has remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel. God had mercy in store for the seed of Abraham, and had given them many and great assurances of the kindness he designed them in the latter days; and it was in pursuance of all these, that he raised up his Son Jesus to be not only a Light to lighten the Gentiles, but the Glory of his people Israel; for he sent him, in the first place, to bless them. God is said, in sending Christ, to perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember the holy covenant, Luke i. 72. It was in consideration of that, and not of their merit.

4. Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all the earth; make a loud noise, and rejoice, and sing praise. 5. Sing unto the Lord with the harp; with the harp, and the voice of a psalm. 6. With trumpets, and sound of cornet, make a joyful noise before the Lord the King. 7. Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein. 8. Let the floods clap their hands: let the hills be joyful together. 9. Before the Lord: for he cometh to judge the earth: with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity.

The setting up of the kingdom of Christ is here represented as a matter of joy and praise. 1. Let all the children of men rejoice in it, for they all have, or may have, benefit by it. Again and again we are here called upon by all ways and means possible to express our joy, and give praise in it: Make a joyful noise, as before, xcv. 1. 2. Make a loud noise, as those that are affected with those glad tidings, and are desirous to affect others with them; Rejoice and sing praise; sing Hosanna; (Matt. xxi. 9.) sing Hallelujahs, Rev. xix. 6. Let him be welcomed to the throne, as new kings are, with acclamations of joy and loud shouts, till the earth ring again, as when Solomon was proclaimed, 1 Kings i. 40. And let the shouts of the creatures, as singers and players on instruments, (Ps. lxixvii. 7.—lxviii. 25.) as is usual in such solemnities. (1.) Let sacred songs attend the new King; "Sing praise, sing with the voice of a psalm. Express your joy; thus proclaim it, thus excite it yet more, and thus propagate it among others. (2.) Let these be ass sted with sacred music, not only with the soft and gentle melody of the harp, but, since it is a victorious King, whose glory is to be celebrated, who goes forth conquering and to conquer, let him be proclaimed with the martial sound of the trumpet and cornet, v. 6. Let all this joy be directed to God, and expressed in a solemn religious manner; Make a joyful noise to the Lord, v. 4. Sing to the Lord; (v. 5.) do it before the Lord, the King, v. 6. Carnal mirth is an enemy to this holy joy. When David danced before the ark, he pleaded that it was before the Lord; and the piety and devotion of the intention not only vindicated what he did, but commend ed it. We must rejoice before the Lord, whenever we draw near to him, (Deut. xii. 12.) before the Lord Jesus, and before him, not only as the Saviour, but as the King, the King of kings, the church's King, and our King.

2. Let the inferior creatures rejoice in it, v. 7—9. This is to the same purport with what we had before set forth; Let the sea roar, and let that be called, not as it used to be, a dreadful noise, but a joyful noise; for the coming of Christ, and the salvation wrought out by him, have quite altered the property of the troubles and terrors of this world, so that when the floods lift up their voice, lift up their waves, we must not construe that to be the sea roaring against us, but rather rejoicing with us. Let the floods express their joy, as men do when they clap their hands; and let the hills that tremble for fear, before God, when he came down to give the law at mount Sinai, dance for joy, before him, when his gospel is preached, and that word of the Lord goes forth from Zion in a still small voice; Let the hills be joyful together before the Lord. This intimates that the kingdom of Christ would be a blessing to the whole creation; but that, as the inferior creatures declare the glory of the Creator, (xix. 1.) so they declare the glory of the Redeemer, for by him all things not only subsist in their being, but consist in their order. It intimates likewise, that the children of men would be wanting in paying their due respects to the Redeemer, and to God, that he might make him his honour from the sea and the floods, which would shame the stupidity and ingratitude of mankind. And perhaps respect is here had to the new heavens and the new earth, which we yet, according to his promise, look for; (2 Pet. iii. 13.) and this second mention of his coming, after the like, (Ps. xcvi.) may principally refer to his second coming, when all these things shall be dissolved as to be refined; then shall he come to judge the world with righteousness. In the prospect of that day all that are sanctified do rejoice, and even the sea, and the floods, and the hills, would rejoice, if they could. One would think that Virgil had these psalms in his eye, as well as the oracles of the Cuman Sibyl, in his fourth eclogue, where he either ignorantly, or basely, applies to Asinus Pollio the ancient prophecies, which at that time were expected to be fulfilled; for he lived in the reign of Augustus Caesar, which was the highest of Sali vour's birth. He owns they looked for the birth of a child from heaven, that should be a great blessing to the world, and restore the golden age.

Jann nova porgenes eolo demittitur alto—
A new race descends from the holy sky;
and that should take away sin;
Te deus, si qua manent acersis vestigia nostri,
Irrisa perpetuo sollicita terras—
Thou dost apply eternal care to every stain of corruption.
And free the world from alarm.

Many other things he says of this long-looking for child, which Ludovicus Vives, in his notes on that eclogue, thinks applicable to Christ; and he concludes, as the psalmist here, with a prospect of the rejoicing of the whole creation herein:

Aspice, venturo latentur ut omnia aequo—
See, how this promised age makes all rejoice.

And if all rejoice, why should not we?

PSALM XCIX.

Still we are celebrating the glories of the kingdom of God among men, and are called upon to praise him, as in the foregoing psalms; but those psalms looked forward to the times of the gospel, and prophesied of the graces and comforts of those times; this psalm seems to dwell more upon the Old Testament dispensation, and the manifestation of God's glory and grace in that. The Jews were not, in expectation of the Messiah's kingdom and the evangelical worship, to neglect the divine regi men they were then under, and the ordinances that were then given them, but in them to see God reigning, and to worship before him according to the law of Moses. Prophecies of good things to come, must nobly instruct our es teem of good things present. "To Israel indeed perhaps the promises, which they were bound to believe; but to them pertained also the giving of the law, and the service of God, which they were also bound dutifully and conscientiously, Rom. xiii. 11—12. for this they are called to do, in this psalm; where yet there is much of Christ, for the government of the church was in the hands of the Eternal Word before he was incarnate; and, besides that, he was here considered in very many respects and figures of evangelical worship. The people of Israel are here required to praise and exalt God, and to worship before him, in consideration of these two things: I. The happy constitution of the temple, and government were under, both in sacred and civil things, v. 1—5. II. Some instances of the happy administration of it, v. 6—9. In singing this psalm, we must set ourselves to exalt the name of God, as it is made known to us in the gospel, which we have much more reason to do than they had who lived under the law.
1. THE Lord reigneth; let the people tremble: he sitteth between the cherubims; let the earth be moved. 2. The Lord is great in Zion, and he is high above all people. 3. Let them praise thy great and terrible name; for it is holy. 4. The king’s strength also loveth judgment; thou dost establish equity: thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob. 5. Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at his footstool; for he is holy.

The foundation of all religion is laid in this truth, That the Lord reigns. God governs the world by his providence, governs the church by his grace, and doeth every thing according to his will. We are to believe not only that the Lord loves, but that the Lord reigns. This is the triumph of the Christian church, and here it was the triumph of the Jewish church, that Jehovah was their King; and hence it is inferred, Let the people tremble, that is, (1.) Let even the subjects of this kingdom tremble; for the Old Testament dispensation had much of terror in it; at Mount Sinai, Israel, and even Moses himself, did tremblingly flee to God, and there he was terrible in his holy places; even when he appeared in his people’s behalf, he did terrible things. But we are not now come to that mount that burned with fire, Heb. xii. 18. Now that the Lord reigns, let the earth rejoice: then he ruled more by the power of holy fear, now of holy love. (2.) Much more let the enemies of this kingdom tremble; for he will either bring them into obedience to his golden sceptre, or crush them with his fiery sword. The Lord reigns, thou art terrible among king. Heaven and earth shall be shaken, and the Lord will be revealed in his glory. The heaven that cannot be shaken, shall remain, Heb. xii. 27. In these is continuance, Isa. lxiv. 5.

God’s kingdom, set up in Israel, is here made the subject of the psalmist’s praise.

1. God presided in the affairs of religion; He sitteth between the cherubims, (v. 1.) as on his throne, to give law by the oracles thence delivered: as on the mercy-seat, to receive petitions. This was the honour of Israel, that they had among them the Sheechinah, or special presence of God, attended by the holy angels: the temple was the royal palace, and the Holy of holies was the presence-chamber. The Lord is great in Zion; (v. 2.) there he is known and praised, (xxvi. 1, 2.) there he is adored as great, more than any where else; he is high there above all people; as that which is high is exposed to view, and looked up to, so in Zion the perfections of the divine nature appear more conspicuous and more glorious than any where else. Therefore let them that dwell in Zion, and worship there, praise thy great and terrible name, and give thee the glory due unto it, for it is holy. The holiness of God’s name makes it truly great to his friends, and terrible to his enemies, v. 3. This is that which they above adore, Holy, holy, holy.

2. He was all in all, in their civil government, v. 4. As in Jerusalem was the testimony of Israel, whether the tribes went up, so there were set thrones of judgment, (cxxx. 4, 5.) their government was a theocracy: he raised up David to rule over them, (and some think this psalm was penned upon occasion of his quiet and happy settlement in the throne,) and he is the king whose strength loves judgment. He is strong, all his strength he has from God, and his strength is not abused for the oppression of the weak, as the power of great princes often is, but it loves judgment; he does justice with his power, and does it with delight; and herein he was a type of Christ, to whom God would give the throne of his father David, to do judgment and justice. He has power to crush, but his strength loves judgment; he does not rule with rigour, but with moderation, with wisdom, and with tenderness. The people of Israel had a good king; and he did not abuse his power, but they are here taught to look up to God, as he is by whom their kingdom reigns. Thou dost establish equity; God gave them those excellent laws by which they were governed; and thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob, not only by his immediate provisions often executed and enforced his own laws, but look care for the administration of justice among them by civil magistrates, who reign by him, and by him did decree justice. Their judges judged for God, and their judgments were just. 2 Chron. xix. 6.

Putting these two things together, we see what was the happiness of Israel above any other people, as Moses had described it, (Deut. iv. 7, 8.) that they had God so nigh unto them, sitting between the cherubims, and that they had statutes and judgments so righteous, by which equity was established, and God himself ruled in Jacob; from which he infers this command to that happy people; (v. 3.) Exalt ye the Lord our God, and worship at his footstool; give him the glory of the good government you are under, as it is now established, both in church and state.” Note, (1.) The greater the public mercies are, which we have a share in, the more we are obliged to bear a part in the public homage paid to God: the setting up of the kingdom of Christ, especially, ought to be the matter of our praise. (2.) When we draw nigh to God, we must worship him, our hearts must be filled with high thoughts of him, and he must be exalted in our souls. (3.) The more we abase ourselves, and the more prostrate we are before God, the more we exalt him. We must worship at his footstool, at his ark, which was as the footstool to the mercy-seat between the cherubims; or, we must cast ourselves down upon the pavement of his courts; and good reason we have to be thus reverent, for he is holy; and his holiness should strike and awe upon us, as it does on the angels themselves, Isa. vi. 2, 3.

6. Moses and Aaron among his priests, and Samuel among them that call upon his name: they called upon the Lord, and he answered them. 7. He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar: they kept his testimonies, and the ordinance that he gave them. 8. Thou answerest them. O Lord our God: thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions. 9. Exalt the Lord our God, and worship at his holy hill: for the Lord our God is holy.

The happiness of Israel in God’s government is here further made out by some particular instances of his administration, especially, with reference to those that were, in their generation, the prime leaders, and more active and useful governors, of that people, Moses, Aaron, and Samuel, in the former of whom the theocracy or divine government began, (for they were employed to form Israel into a people,) and in the last of whom that form of government, in a great measure, ended; for when the people rejected Samuel, and urged him to resign, they are said to reject God himself, that he should not be so immediately in their hands as he had been, (1 Sam. viii. 7) for now they would have a king, like all the nations. Moses, as well as Aaron, is said to be among his priests, for he executed the priest’s office till Aaron was settled in it, and he consecrated Aaron and his sons; therefore the Jews call him the Priest of the priests.

Now concerning these three chief rulers obse(bled:

1. The intimate communion they had with God, and the wonderful favour to which he admitted them. None of all the nations of the earth could produce three such men as these, that had such an intercourse with Heaven, and whom God knew by name, Exod. xxxiii. 17.

Here is, (1.) Their gracious observance of God: no kingdom had men that honoured God so as these three men of the kingdom of Israel did. They honoured him, (1.) By their prayers. Samuel, though not among his priests, yet was among them that called on his name; and for this they were all famous, They called upon the Lord; they relied not on their own wisdom or virtue, but in every emergency had recourse to God, toward him was their desire, and on him their dependence. [2.] By their obedience; They kept his testimonies, and the ordinance that he gave them; they made conscience of their duty; and in every thing made God’s word and law their rule, as knowing; that, unless they did so, they could not expect their prayers should be answered, Prov. x.xviii. 9. Moses did all according to the pattern showed him; it is often repeated, According to all that God commanded Moses, so did he: Aaron and Samuel did likewise. Those were the greatest men and most honourable, that were most eminent for keeping God’s testimonies, and conforming to the rule of his word.

(2.) God’s gracious acceptance of them; He answered them, and granted them the things which they called upon him for: they all wonderfully prevailed with God in prayer; miracles were wrought at their special instance and request; nay, he not only condescended to do that for them which they desired, as a prince for a petitioner, but he communed with them as one friend familiarly converses with another; (v. 7.) He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar. He often spake to Samuel, from his childhood the word of the Lord was good in his mouth, and probably, sometimes he spake to him by a bright cloud overshadowing him: however, to Moses and Aaron he often spake out of the famous cloudy pillar, Exod. xvi. 10. Numb. xii. 5. Israel are now reminded of this, for the confirming of their faith, that though they had not every day such sensible tokens of God’s presence as the cloudy pillar was, yet to them that were their first founders, and to him that was their great reformer, God was pleased thus to manifest his presence.

2. The good offices they did to Israel. They interceded for the people, and for them also they obtained many an answer of peace. Moses stood in the gap, and Aaron between the living and the dead; and when Israel was in distress, Samuel cried unto the Lord for them, 1 Sam. vii. 9. This is here referred to; (v. 8.) Thou answerest them, O Lord our God, and, at their prayer, thou didst fulﬁll the requisition which they prayed for; and though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions, yet thou didst not cut them off from being a people, as their sin deserved. “Thou wast a God that was propitious for them,” (so Dr. Hammond,) for their sakes, and sparedst the people at their request, then, when thou wast about to take vengeance of their inventions, when thy wrath was so highly provoked against them, that it was just ready to break in upon them, to their utter overthrow.” These were some of the many remarkable instances of God’s demigod in Israel, more than in any other nation, for which the people are again called upon to praise God; (v. 9.) Exalt the Lord our God, on account of what he has done for us formerly, as well as of late, and worship at his holy hill of Zion, on which he has now set his temple, and will shortly set his Kings, (ii. 6.) the former a type of the latter: there, as the centre of unity, let all God’s Israel meet, with their adorations, for the Lord our God is holy, and appears so, not only in his holy law, but in his holy-gospel.

PSALM C.

It is with good reason that many sing this psalm very frequently in their religious assemblies, for it is very proper both to express, and to excite, pious and devout affections toward God in our approach to him in holy ordinances; if our hearts go along with the words, we shall make a melody in it to the Lord. The Jews say it was penned to be sung with their thank-offerings; perhaps it was; but we say that as there is nothing in it peculiar to their economy, so its beginning with a call to all lands to praise God, plainly extends it to the gospel-church. Here, I. We are called upon to praise God, and rejoice in him, v. 1, 2, 4. II. We are furnished with matter for praise; we must praise him, considering his being and relation to us, (v. 3.) and his mercy and truth, v. 5. These are plain and common things, and therefore the more fit to be the matter of devotion.

A psalm of praise.

1. MAKE a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands. 2. Serve the Lord with gladness; come before his presence with singing. 3. Know ye that the Lord he is God: it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves: we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture. 4. Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise: be thankful unto him, and bless his name. 5. For the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations.

Here

1. The exhortations to praise are very important; the psalm does indeed answer to the title, A psalm of praise; it begins with that call which of late we have several times met with, (v. 1.) Make a joyful noise unto the Lord, all ye lands, or all the earth, all the inhabitants of the earth. When all nations shall be disciplined, and the gospel preached to every creature, then this summons will be fully answered to. But if we take the foregoing psalm to be (as we have opened it) a call to the Jewish church to rejoice in the advent of the Messiah, which the Jews were under, (as the four psalms before it were calculated for the days of the Messiah,) this psalm, perhaps, was intended for proselytes, that came over out of all lands to the Jews’ religion. However, we have here,

1. A strong invitation to worship God; not that God needs us, or any thing we have or can do, but it is his will that we should serve the Lord, should devote ourselves to his service, and employ ourselves in it; and that we should not only serve him in all instances of obedience to his law, but that we should come before his presence in the ordinances which he has appointed, and in which he has promised to manifest himself, (v. 2.) that we should enter into his gates, and into his courts, (v. 4.) that we should attend upon him among his servants, and keep there where he keeps court. In all acts of religious worship, whether in secret or in our fundi
1. We come into God's presence, and serve him; but it is in public worship especially that we enter into his gates, and into his courts. The people were not permitted to enter into the holy place, there the priests only went in to minister; but let the people be thankful for their place in the courts of God's holiness, to which they were admitted, and where they gave their attendance.

2. Great encouragement given us, in worshipping God, to do it cheerfully; (v. 2.) Serve the Lord with gladness. This intimates a prediction that in gospel-times there should be special occasion for joy; and it prescribes this as a rule of worship; Let God be served with gladness. By holy joy we do really serve God; it is an honour to him to rejoice with him in his kingdom. Gospel-worshippers should be joyful worshippers; if we serve God in uprightness, let us serve him with gladness; we must be willing and forward to it; glad when we are called to go up to the house of the Lord, (cxxii. 1.) looking upon it as the comfort of our lives to have communion with God; and we must be pleasant and cheerful in it, must say, It is good to be here; approaching to God in every duty, as to God our exceeding joy, xlii. 4. We must consider ourselves possessed of a heavenly treasure, not only songs of joy, but songs of praise; (v. 4.) Enter into his gates with thanksgiving. We must not only comfort ourselves, but glorify God with our joy, and let him have the praise of that which we have the pleasure of. Be thankful to him, and bless his name; that is, (1.) We must take it as a favour to be admitted into his service, and give him thanks that we have liberty of access to him, that we have ordinances instituted, and opportunity continued of waiting upon God in these ordinances. (2.) We must intermix praise and thanksgiving with all our services; this golden thread must run through every duty, (Heb. xiii. 15.) for it is the work of angels. In every thing give thanks; in every ordinance, as well as in every providence.

II. The matter of praise, and motives to it, are very important, v. 3, 5. Know ye what God is in himself, and what he is to you. Note, Knowledge is the Mother of devotion, and of all obedience; blind sacrifices will never please a seeing God. "Know it; consider and apply it, and then you will be more close and constant, more inward and serious, in the worship of him." Let us know then these seven things concerning the Lord Jehovah, with whom we have to do, in all the acts of religious worship: 1. That the Lord he is God, the only living and true God; that he is a Being infinitely perfect, self-existent, and self-sufficient, and the Foundation of all being; he is God, and not a man as we are. He is an eternal Spirit, incomprehensible and independent; the first Cause, and last End. The heathen worshipped the creature of their own fancy; the workmen made it, therefore it is not God; we worship him that made us and all the world; he is God, and all other pretended deities are vanity and a lie, and such as he has triumphed over.

2. The Father is the Lord of hosts. It is he that has made us, and not we ourselves. I find that I am, but cannot say, I am that I am, and therefore must ask, Whence am I? Who made me? Where is God my Maker? And is it the Lord Jehovah. He gave us being, gave us this being; he is both the Former of our bodies, and the Father of our spirits. We did not, could not, could not make, ourselves; it is God's prerogative to be his own Cause, our being is derived and dependent on him.

3. That therefore he is our rightful Owner. The Mazorites, by altering one letter in the Hebrew, read it, He made us, and his we are, or to him we belong. Put both the readings together, and we learn, that because God made us, and not we our-dwell with me: he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me. 7. He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house; he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight. 8. I will early destroy all the wicked of the land, that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord.

David here cuts out to himself and others a pattern both of a good magistrate, and a good master of a family; if these were careful to discharge the duty of their place, it would contribute very much to the honor of God. C. 1.

I. The chosen subject of the psalm; (v. 1.) I will sing of mercy and judgment; that is, 1. Of God's mercy and judgment, and then it looks back upon the dispensations of Providence that had respected him since he was first anointed to be king; during which time he had met with many a rebuke, and much hardship, on the one hand, and yet, on the other hand, had many wonderful deliverances wrought for him, and favours bestowed upon him; often he will sing unto God. Note, (1.) God's provinences concerning his people are commonly mixed—mercy and judgment; God has set the one against the other, and appointed them April-days, showers and sun-shine. It was so with David and his family; and when there was mercy in the return of the ark, there was judgment in the death of Uzziah. (2.) When God in his providence exercises us with a mixture of mercy and judgment, it is our duty to sing, and sing unto him, both of the one and of the other; we must be suitably affected with both, and make suitable acknowledgments to God for both. The Chaldee paraphrase of this is observable; If thou bestowedst mercy upon me, or If thou bring any judgment upon me, before thee, O Lord, will I sing my hymns for all. Whatever our outward condition is, whether joyful or sorrowful, still we must give glory to God, and sing praises to him; neither the laughter of a prosperous condition, nor the tears of an afflicted condition, must put us out of tune for sacred songs. Or, 2. It may be understood of David's mercy and judgment; he would, in this psalm, promise to be merciful, and just, or wise, for judgment is often put for discretion. To do justly, and love mercy, is the sum of our duty; these he would covenant to make conscience of in that place and relation to which God had called him; and this, in consideration of the various providences of God that had occurred to him. Family-mercies, and family-afflictions, are both of them calls to family-religion. David puts his vow into a song or psalm, that he might the better keep it in his own mind, and frequently repeat it, and that it might the better be communicated to others, and preserved in his family, for a pattern to his sons and successors.

II. The general resolution David took up to conduct himself carefully and conscientiously in his court, v. 2. We have here, 1. A good purpose concerning his conversation—concerning his conversation in general, how he would behave himself in every thing; he would live by rule, and not at large, not walk at all adventures; he would, though a king, by a solemn covenant, bind himself to his good behaviour—and concerning his conversation in his family particularly, not only how he would walk with his family, but how he would walk within his house, where he was more out of the eye of the world, but where he still saw himself under the eye of God. It is not enough to put on our religion when we go abroad, and appear before men; but we must govern ourselves by it in our families. Those that are in public stations are not thereby excused from care in governing their families; nay rather, they are more concerned to set a good example of ruling their own houses well, 1 Tim. iii. 4. When David had his hands full of public affairs, yet he returned to his house; 2 Sam. vi. 20. He resolves, (1.) To act conscientiously, and with integrity, to walk in a perfect way, in the way of God's commandments, that is a perfect way, for the law of the Lord is perfect. This he will walk in, with a perfect heart, with all sincerity, not dissenting either with God or men. When we make the word of God our rule, and are ruled by it, the glory of God our end, and aim at it, then we walk in a perfect way, with a perfect heart. (2.) To act conscientiously, and with integrity, to walk wisely; I will understand, or instruct myself in a perfect way; so some. I will walk circumspectly. Note, We must all resolve to walk by the rules of Christian prudence, in the ways of Christian piety. We must never turn aside out of the perfect way, under pretence of behaving ourselves wisely; but, while we keep to the good way, we must be wise as serpents. 2. Here is a good prayer; O when wilt thou come to me? a prayer that God would come to him, and dwell with him in it; and those may expect God's presence, that walk with a perfect heart, in a perfect way. If we compare the account which the historian gives of David, (1 Sam. xviii. 14.) we shall find how exactly it answers his purpose and prayer, and that neither was in vain. David, as he purposed, behaved himself wisely in all his ways; and, as he prayed, the Lord was with him.

III. His particular resolution to practise no evil himself; (v. 3.) "I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes; I will not design or aim at any thing but what is for the glory of God, and the public welfare." He will never have it in his eye to enrich himself by impoverishing his subjects, or enlarge his own prerogative by encroaching on their property. In all our worldly business, we must see that that be right and good which we set our eyes upon, and not any forbidden fruit; and that we never seek that which we cannot have without sin. It is the character of a good man, that he shuts his eyes from seeing evil, Isa. xxxiii. 15. "Nay, I hate the works of them that turn aside from the paths of equity; (Job xxxvi. 7.) not only I avoid it, but I abhor it, it shall not cleave to me. If any blot of injustice should come on my hands, it shall be washed off quickly." IV. His further resolution not to keep bad servants, nor to employ those about him that were vicious. He will not content themselves, nor show them any favour, lest thereby he should harden them in their wickedness, and encourage others to do like them. He will not converse with them himself, nor admit them into the company of his other servants, lest they should spread the infection of sin in his family. He will not confide in them, nor put them in power under him; for they who hated to be reformed would certainly hinder every thing that is good.

When he comes to mention particulars, he does not mention drunkards, adulterers, murderers, or blasphemers; such gross sinners as these he was in no danger of admitting into his house; nor did he need to covenant particularly against, having fellowships with them, but he mentions those others who were less scandalous, but no less dangerous, and in reference to whom he needed to stand upon his guard with caution, and to behave himself wisely.

1. He will have nothing to do with spiteful malicious people, who are ill-natured, and will bear a grudge a great while, and care not what mischief they do to those they have a pique against; (v. 4.) A soward heart, one that delights to be cross and stubborn, will depart from me, as not fit for society, the bond of which is love. I will not know, that is, I will have no acquaintance or conversation, if I can help it, with such a wicked person; for a little of the leaven of malice and wickedness will leaven the whole lump.

2. Nor with slanderers, and those who take a pleasure in wounding their neighbour's reputation secretly; (v. 5.) Whoso privily slanders his neighbour, either in his face or behind his back, and writes him the praises of a good name, him will I cut off from my family and court. Many endeavour to raise themselves into the favour of princes by unjust representations of persons and things, which they think will please their prince; If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked, Prov. xxix. 12. But David will not only not hearken to them, but will prevent the preferment of those that hope thus to curry favour with him; he will punish not only those that falsely accuse one another in open court, but those that privily slander one another. I wish David had remembered this yow, in the case of Me-Phiboseth and Ziba.

3. Nor with hasty, concited, ambitious, people; none do more mischief in a family, in a court, in a church, for only by pride comes contention; Therefore, him that has a high look, and a proud heart, will I not suffer; I will have no patience with his insolent pride and arrogant manner. From a believer, for it is certain that they do not aim at doing good, but only at aggrandizing themselves and their families. God resists the proud, and so will David.

4. Nor with false deceitful people, that scruple not to tell lies, or commit frauds; (v. 7.) He that worketh deceit, though he may insinuate himself into my family, yet, as soon as he is discovered, he shall not dwell within my house. Some great men know how to serve their own purposes by such as are skilful to deceive, and are fit tools for them to work by; but David will make use of no such agents for him; He that tells lies, shall not tarry in my sight, but shall be expelled the house with indignation. Herein David was a man after God's own heart, for a proud look and a lying tongue are things which God hates; and he was also a type of Christ, who will, in the great day, banish from his presence all that love and make a lie, Rev. xxi. 15.

V. His resolution to put those in trust under him that were honest and good; (v. 6.) Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful in the land. In choosing his servants, and ministers of state, he kept to the land of Israel, and would not employ foreigners; none shall be preferred but true-born Israelites, and those such as were Israelites indeed, the faithful in the land, for even in that land there were those that were unfaithful. Those faithful ones his eyes shall be upon, to discover them and find them out, for they were modest, did not crowd into the city to court preferment, but lived retired in the land, in the country, out of the way of it. Those are commonly most fit for places of honour and trust that are least fond of them; and therefore wise princes will spy out such in their recesses and privacies, and take them to do great things for them. He that walks in a perfect way, that makes conscience of what he says and does, he shall serve me; the kingdom must be searched for honest men to make courtiers of; and if any man is better than another, he must be preferred. This was a good resolution of David's; but either he did not keep to it, or else his judgment was imposed upon, when he made Abihophel his right hand. It should be the care and endeavour of all masters of families, for their own sakes and their children's, to take such servants into their families as they have reason to hope favor God. The Son of David has his eyes upon the faithful in the land; his secret is with them, and he will dwell with him. Saul chose servants for their goodwill, (1 Sam. viii. 16.) but David for their goodness.

Lastly, His resolution to extend his zeal to the reformation of the city and country, as well as of the court; (v. 8.) I will early destroy all the wicked of the land, all that are discovered and convicted; the law shall have its course against them. He would do his utmost to destroy all the wicked, so that there might be none left that were notoriously wicked. He would do it early; he would not wait, to spare time, and spare no pains, he would be forward and zealous in promoting the reformation of manners and suppression of vice; and those must rise betimes that will do any thing to purpose in that work. That which he aimed at, was, not only the securing of his own government, and the peace of the country, but the honour of God in the purity of his church, That I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord; not Jerusalem only, but the whole land was the city of the Lord; so is the gospel-church. It is the interest of the city of the Lord to be purged from wicked doers, who both blemish it and weaken it; and it is therefore the duty of all to do what they can, in their places, toward so good a work, and to be zealously affected in it. The day is coming when the Son of David shall cut off all wicked doers from the New Jerusalem, for there shall not enter into it any that do iniquity.

PSALMS CII.

Some think that David penned this psalm at the time of Absalom's rebellion; others that Daniel, Nehemiah, or some other that was in captivity in Babylon, because he seems to speak of the ruin of Zion, and of a time set for the rebuilding of it, which Daniel understood by books, Dan. x. 2. Of perhaps the psalmist was himself in great affliction, which he complains of in the beginning of this psalm, but (as in Ps. lxviii. and elsewhere) he comforts himself under it with the consideration of God's eternity, and the church's prosperity and perpetuity, how much soever it was now disconsolate, the time would be when the city of the Lord: so is the gospel-church. It is the interest of the city of the Lord to be purged from wicked doers, who both blemish it and weaken it; and it is therefore the duty of all to do what they can, in their places, toward so good a work, and to be zealously affected in it. The day is coming when the Son of David shall cut off all wicked doers from the New Jerusalem, for there shall not enter into it any that do iniquity.

A prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the Lord.

1. H E A R my prayer, O Lord, and let my cry come unto thee. 2. Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble; incline thine ear unto me: in the day when I call, answer me speedily. 3. For my days are consumed like smoke, and my bones are burned as a hearth. 4. My heart is smitten, and withered like grass; so that I forget to eat my bread. 5. By reason of the voice of my groaning, my bones cleave to my skin. 6. I am like a pelican of the wilderness; I am like an owl of the...
PSALMS, or, and to free them. For I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping; 10. Because of thine indignation and thy wrath: for thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down. 11. My days are like a shadow that declineth; and I am withered like grass.

The title of this psalm is very observable: it is a prayer of the afflicted; it was composed by one that was himself afflicted, afflicted with the church, and for it; on those the was reduced by his afflictions, afflictions of that kind lie heavier than any other. It is calculated for an afflicted state, and is intended for the use of others that may be in the like distress; for whatsoever things were written before time, were written designedly for our use. The whole word of God is of use to direct us in prayer; but here, as often elsewhere, the Holy Ghost has drawn up our petition for us, has put words into our mouths; (Hos. xiv. 2.) Take with thee words. Here is a prayer in the hearts and hands of the afflicted; let them set, not their hands, but their hearts, to it, and present it to God. Note. 1. It is often the lot of the best saints in this world to be sorely afflict ed. 2. Even good men may be almost overwhelmed with their afflictions, and may be ready to faint under them. 3. When our state is afflicted, and our spirits overwhelmed, it is our duty and interest to pray, and by prayer to pour out our complaints before the Lord; while the heavens are free with him, and the liberty of speech we have before him, as well as liberty of access to him; it in timates, also, what an case it is to an afflicted spirit to unburthen itself by an humble representation of its grievances and griefs.

Such a representation we have here; in which, 1. The psalmist humbly begs of God to take notice of his affliction, and of his prayer in his affliction; he may pray for mercy. It should be our care that God would graciously hear us; for, if our prayers be not pleasing to God, they will be to no purpose to ourselves. Let this therefore be in our eye, that our prayer may come unto God, even to his ears, (xviii. 6.) and, in order to that, let us lift up the prayer, and our souls with it. 2. It may be our hope that God will graciously hear us, because he has appointed us to seek him, and has promised we shall not seek him in vain. If we put up a prayer in faith, we may in faith say, Hear my prayer, O Lord! (1.) "Manifest thyself to me; hide not thy face from me in displeasure, when I am in trouble. If thou dost not immediately free me, yet let me know that thou favourest me; if I see not the operations of thy hand for me, yet let me see the smiles of thy face upon me." God's hiding his face is trouble enough to a good man, even in his prosperity; (xxx. 7.) Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled; but if, when we are in trouble, God hides his face, the case is sad indeed. (2.) "Manifest thyself for me; not only hear me, but answer me; grant me the deliverance I am in want of, and in pursuit of; answer me speedily, even in the day when I call." When troubles press hard upon us, God gives us leave to be thus pressing in prayer; yet with humility and patience.

I. His body was maccerated and emaciated, and he was become a perfect skeleton, nothing but skin and bones. As prosperity and joy are represented by making fat the bones, and the bones flourishing like an herb, so great trouble and grief are here represented by the contrary; My bones are burnt as a hearth, (v. 3.) they cleave to my skin, (v. 5.) my heart is unsted, and withered like grass; (v. 4.) it touches the vitals, and there is a sensible decay there. I am withered like grass, (v. 11.) scorched with the burning heat of my troubles. If we be thus brought low and miserable, we should not think it strange; the body is like grass, weak, and of the earth, no wonder then that it withers.

2. He was very melancholy, and of a sorrowful spirit. He was so taken up with the thoughts of his troubles, that he forgot to eat his bread; (v. 4.) he had no appetite to his necessary food, nor could he relish it. When God hides his face from a soul, the delights of sense will be sapsless things. He was always sighing and groaning, as one pressed above his measure; (v. 5.) and this wasted him, and exhaust ed his spirits; he affected solitude, as melancholy people do; his friends deserted him, and were shy of him, and he cared as little for their company; (v. 6, 7.) "I am like a pelican of the wilderness, or a bittern, (so some,) that make a doleful noise; I am like an owl, that affects to lodge in deserted ruined buildings; I watch, and am as a sparrow upon the house-top. I live in a garret, and there spend much of my time, and am melancholy-minded, and mourning myself." Those who do thus, when they are in sorrow, humour themselves indeed; but they prejudice themselves, and know not what they do, nor what advantage they hereby give to the tempter. In affliction, we should sit alone, to consider our ways, (Lam. iii. 28.) but not sit alone, to indulge an inordinate grief.

3. He was evil spoken of by his enemies, and all mankind were against him. When his friends went off from him, his foes set themselves against him; (v. 8.) Mine enemies reproach me all the day; designing thereby both to create vexation to himself, (for an ingenuous mind regrets reproach,) and to bring an odium upon him before men. When they could not otherwise reach him, they shot these arrows at him, even bitter words; in this they were unwearyed, they did it all the day, it was a continual dropping. His enemies were very out of breath to make manifest this, and very much and unresistible. They are sworn against me; as the Jews that bound themselves with an oath that they would kill Paul; or, They have sworn against me as accusers, to take away my life.

4. He fasted and wept under the tokens of God's displeasure; (v. 9, 10.) "I have eaten ashes like bread; instead of eating my bread, I have laid down in dust and ashes, and I have mingled my drink with weeping; when I should have refreshed myself with drinking, I have only cased myself with weeping." And what is the matter? He tells us; (v. 10.) Because of thy wrath. It was not so much the trouble itself that troubled him, as the wrath of God which he was under the apprehensions of, as the cause of the trouble. This, this was the wormwood and the gall, in the affliction and the misery; Thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down, that which we cast to the ground, with a design to dash it to pieces, we lift up first, that we may throw it down with the more violence; or, "Thou hast formerly lifted me up in honour, and joy, and uncommon prosperity; but the remembrance of that aggravates the present grief, and makes it the more grievous." We must eye the hand of God both in lifting us up, and casting us down, and say, "Blessed be the name of the Lord, who both gives and takes away." 5. He looked upon himself as a dying man, My days are consumed like smoke, (v. 3.) which vanishes away quickly. Or, They are consumed in smoke, of which nothing remains.
they are like a shadow that declines. (v. 11.) like the evening-shadow, or a forerunner of approaching night. Now all this, though it seems to speak the psalmist’s personal calamities, and therefore is properly a prayer for a particular person afflicted, yet is supposed to be a description of the afflictions of the church of God, with which the psalmist sympathizes, making public grievances his own. The mystical body of Christ is sometimes like the psalmist’s body here, withered and farcated, nay, like dead and dry bones. The church sometimes is forced into the wilderness, seems lost, and gives up herself for gone, under the tokens of God’s displeasure.

12. But thou, O Lord, shalt endure for ever, and thy remembrance unto all generations. 13. Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion; for the time to favour her, yea, the set time, is come. 14. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favour the dust thereof. 15. So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, and all the kings of the earth thy glory. 16. When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory. 17. He will regard the prayer of the desolate, and not despise their prayer. 18. This shall be written for the generation to come; and the people which shall be created shall praise the Lord. 19. For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the Lord behold the earth; 20. To hear the groaning of the prisoner, to loose those that are appointed to death; 21. To declare the name of the Lord in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem; 22. When the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms, to serve the Lord.

Many exceeding great and precious comforts are here thought of, and mustered up, to balance the foregoing complaints; for unto the upright there arises light in the darkness, so that though they are cast down, they are not in despair. It is bad with the psalmist himself, bad with the people of God; but he has many considerations to revive himself with.

I. We are dying creatures, and our interests and comforts dying, but God is an everliving, everlasting, God; (v. 12.) “My days are like a shadow; there is no remedy, night is coming upon me; but thou, O Lord, shalt endure for ever.” Our life is transient, but thine is permanent; our friends die, but thou our God diest not; what threatened us cannot touch thee; our names will be written in the dust, and buried in oblivion, but thy remembrance shall be unto all generations, to the end of time, nay, to eternity, thou shalt be known and honoured. A good man loves God better than himself, and therefore can balance his own sorrow and death with the pleasing thought of the unchangeable blessedness of the Eternal Mind. God endures for ever, his church’s faithful Patron and Protector; and his honour and perpetual remembrance being very much bound up in her interests, we may be confident that they shall not be neglected.

II. Poor Zion is now in distress, but there will come a time for her relief and succour; (v. 13.) Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion; the hope of deliverance is built upon the goodness of God; “Thou wilt have mercy upon Zion; for she is become an object of thy pity;” and upon the power of God, “Thou shalt arise and have mercy, shalt stir up thyself to do it, shalt do it in contemplation of all the opposition made by the church’s enemies;” the zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this. That which is very encouraging, is, that there is a time set for the deliverance of the church, which not only will come some time, but will come at the time appointed, the time which is appointed, the very time, and therefore it is the best time; at the time which Eternal Truth has fixed it to, and therefore it is a certain time, and shall not be forgotten or further adjourned. At the end of 70 years, the time to favour Zion, by delivering her from the daughter of Babylon, was to come, and at length it did come.

Zion was now in ruins, that is, the temple that was built in the city of David; the favouring of Zion is the building of the temple up again, as it is explained, v. 16. This is expected from the favour of God; that will set all to rights, and nothing but that, and therefore Daniel prays, (Dan. ix. 17.) Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary, which is desolate. The building up of Zion is as great a favour to any people as they can desire. No blessing more desirable to a ruined state than the restoring and re-establishing of their church privileges.

Now this is here wished for, and longed for. Because the Lord should be kind to Zion’s friends; (v. 14.) Thy servants take pleasure even in the stones of the temple, though they were thrown down and scattered, and favour the dust, the very rubbish and ruins, of it. Observe here, that when the temple was ruined, yet the stones of it were to be had for a new building, and there were those who encouraged themselves with that, for they had a favour even for the dust of it. Those who truly love the church of God, love it when it is in sedition as well as when it is in prosperity; and it is a good ground to hope that God will favour the ruins of Zion, when he puts it into the heart of his people to favour them, and to show that they do so by their prayers and by their endeavours; as it is also a good plea with God for mercy for Zion, that there are those who are so affectionately concerned for her, and are waiting for the salvation of the Lord.

Because it should be kind to Zion’s neighbours, v. 15. It will be a happy means perhaps of their conversion, at least, of their conviction; for so the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord, shall have high thoughts of him and his people, and even the kings of the earth shall be affected with his glory; they shall have better thoughts of the church of God than they have had, when God by his providence thus puts an honour upon it; they shall be afraid of doing any thing against it, when they see God taking its part; nay, they shall say, We will go with you, for we have seen that God is with you, Zech. viii. 23. Thus it is said, (Esth. viii. 17.) that many of the people of the land became Jews, for the fear of the Jews fell upon them.

3. Because it would redound to the honour of Zion’s God; (v. 16.) When the Lord shall build up Zion; they take it for granted it will be done, that is, in his own due time; and therefore it is expedient, that the Lord shall shine in his glory and then appear in his glory; and, for that reason, all that have made his glory their highest end desire it and pray for it. Note, The edifying of the church will be the glorifying of God, and therefore we may be assured it will be done in the set time. They that pray in faith, Father, glorify thy name, may receive the same answer to that prayer which was given to Christ himself by a voice from heaven, I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again, though now for a time it may be eclipsed.

III. The prayers of God’s people now seem to be slighted, and no notice taken of them, but they will be reviewed, and greatly encouraged; (v. 17.) He will regard the prayer of the destitute. It was said, (v. 16.) that God will appear in his glory, such a glory as kings themselves shall stand in awe of, v. 13. When great men appear in their glory, they are apt to look with disdain upon the poor they apply to them, and yet God will not do so. Observe, 1. The meanness of the petitioners; they are the destitute: it is an elegant word that is here used, which signifies the heath in the wilderness, a low shrub, or bush, like the hyssop of the wall. They are supposed to be in a low and broken state, enriched with spiritual blessings, but destitute of temporal good things; the poor, the weak, the desolate, the script; thus variously is the word rendered; or it may signify that low and broken spirit which God looks for in all that draw nigh to him, and which he will graciously look upon. This will bring them to their knees; destitute people should be praying people, 1 Tim. v. 2. The favour of God to them, notwithstanding their meanness; He will regard their prayer, and will look at it, will peruse their petition, (2 Chron. vi. 40.) and he will not despise their prayer. More is implied than we have here; the Lord will be pleased with it, and will return an answer of peace to it, which is the greatest honour that can be put upon it. But it is thus expressed, because others despise their praying; they themselves fear God will despise it; and he was thought to despise it, while their affliction was prolonged, and their prayers lay unanswered. When we consider our own meanness and vileness, our darkness and deadness, and the manifold defects in our prayers, we have cause to expect that our prayers will be received with disdain in heaven; but we are here assured of the contrary, for we have an Advocate with the Father, and are under grace, not under the law.

This instance of God's favour to his praying people, though they are destitute, will be a lasting encouragement to prayer; (v. 18.) This shall be written for the generation to come, that none may despise; though they be destitute, nor think their prayers unheeded, because they have not an answer to them immediately. The experiences of others should be our encouragements to seek unto God and trust in him. And, if we have the comfort of the experiences of others, it is fit that we should give God the glory of them; The people which shall be created shall praise the Lord for what he has done both for them and for their predecessors; many that are now unborn, by reading the history of the church, shall be brought upon to turn presbyteries. The people that shall be created anew by divine grace, that are a kind of first-fruits of his creatures, shall praise the Lord for his answers to their prayers when they were more destitute.

IV. The prisoners under condemnation unjustly, seem as sheep appointed for the slaughter, but care shall be taken for their discharge; (v. 19, 20.) God was looked down from the height of his sanctuary, from heaven, where he has prepared his throne, to that high place, that holy place; thence did the Lord behold the earth, for it is a place of prospect, and nothing of this earth is, or can be, hid from his all-seeing eye; he looks down, not to take a view of the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them, but to do acts of grace, to hear the groaning of the prisoners; (which we should desire to be out of the hearing of) and not only to hear them, but to help them, to carry them out of that and the gates of death, then when there is but a step between them and death. Some understand it of the release of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon; God heard their groaning there, as he did when they were in Egypt, (Exod. iii. 7, 9.) and came down to deliver them.

God takes notice not only of the prayers of his afflicted people, which are the language of grace, but even of their groans, which are the language of nature. See the divine pity in hearing the prisoners' groans, and the divine power in loosing the prisoners bonds, even when they are appointed to death, and are pinioned and double-shackled. We have an instance in Peter, Acts xii. 9.

Such instances as these of the divine condescension and compassion, will help, 1. To declare the name of the Lord in Zion, and to make it appear that he answers his name which he himself proclaimed, The Lord God, gracious and merciful, and this declaration of his name in Zion shall be the matter of his praise in Jerusalem, v. 21. If God by his providences declare his name, we must by our conduct make it clear, both in the name of the Messiah, which is said to be the echo of his name, God will discharge his people that were prisoners and captives in Babylon, that they may declare his name in Zion, the place he has chosen to put his name there, and his praise in Jerusalem, at their return thither; in the land of their captivity they could not sing the songs of Zion, (cxxxvii. 3, 4.) and therefore God brought them again to Jerusalem, that they might sing them there. For this end, God gives liberty from bondage; Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name; (exil. 7.) for this, he gives life from the dead; Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee, exix. 175. 2. They will help to draw in others to the worship of God; (v. 22.) When the people of God are gathered together at Jerusalem, (as they were, after their return out of Babylon,) many out of the kingdoms joined with them to serve the Lord. This was fulfilled, (Ezra vi. 21.) where we find that not only the children of Israel that were come out of captivity, but many that had separated themselves from them among the heathen, did keep the feast of unleavened bread with joy. But it may look further, at the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ in the latter days. Christ has proclaimed liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to the them that were bound, that they may declare the name of the Lord in the gospel-church, in which Jews and Gentiles shall unite.

23. He weakened my strength in the way; he shortened my days. 24. I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days: thy years are throughout all generations. 25. Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the work of thy hands. 26. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed: 27. But thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. 28. The children of thy servants shall continue, and their seed shall be established before thee.

We may here observe, 1. The imminent danger that the Jewish church was in, of being quite extirpated and cut off by the captivity in Babylon; (v. 23.) He weakened my strength in the way. They were for many ages in the way to the performance of the great promise made to their fathers concerning his Messiah, longing as much for it as ever a traveller did to be at his journey's end; the legal institutions led them in the way; but when the ten tribes were lost in Assyria, and the two almost lost in Babylon, the strength that nation was weakened, and, in all appearance, its day shortened, for they said, Our hope is lost, we are cut off for our parts, Ezek. xxxvii. 11. And then what comes of the promise that shall attend and be the reward of Jacob, and the Messiah out of the family of David? If these fail, the promise fails. This the psalmist speaks of as in his own person, and it is very applicable to two of the common afflictions of this time. 1. To be sickly; bodily distempers soon weaken our strength in the way, make the keepers of the house to tremble, and the strong men to bow themselves. 2. To be short-lived; where the former is felt, this is feared; when, in the midst of our days, according to a course of nature, our strength is weakened, what can we expect but that the number of our months should be cut off in the midst; and what should we do but provide accordingly? We must own God's hand in it, for in his hand our strength and time are; and must reconcile it to his love, for it has often been the lot of those that have used their strength well, to have it weakened; and of those that could very ill be spared, to have their days shortened.

II. A prayer for the continuance of it; (v. 24.) "O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days; let not this poor church be cut off in the midst of the days assigned it by the promise; let it not be cut off till the Messiah is come, Destroy it not, for that blessing is in her," Isa. lxv. 8. She is a criminal, but, for the sake of that blessing which is in her, she pleads for a reprieve. This is a prayer for the afflicted, and which, with submission to the will of God, we may in faith put up, that God would not take us away in the midst of our days, but that, if it be his will, he would spare us to do him further service, and to be made riper for heaven.

III. A plea to enforce this prayer, taken from the eternity of the Messiah promised, v. 25-27. The apostle quotes these verses, (Heb. i. 10-12.) and tells us; He saith this to the Son, and in that exposition we must acquiesce. It is very commonly supposed that this plea observe how to illustrate the eternity of the Creator; he compares it with the mutability of the creature; for it is God's sole prerogative to be unchangeable.

1. God made the world, and therefore had a being before it from eternity; the Son of God, the Eternal Word, made the world. It is expressly said, All things were made by him, and without him was not anything that was made; and therefore they are the same was in the beginning, from eternity, with God, and was God, John i. 1-3. Col. i. 16. Eph. iii. 9. Heb. i. 2. Earth and heaven, and the hosts of both, include the universe and its fulness, and these derive their being from God by his Son; (v. 23.) "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth, that is founded on the seas, and on the floods, and yet it abides; much more shall the church, which is built on a rock, abide, for the work of thy hands, and by thee are all their motions and influences directed." God is therefore the Fountain, not only of all being, but of all power and dominion. See how fit the great Redeemer is to be intrusted with all power, both in heaven and in earth, since he himself, as Creator of both, perfectly knows both, and is entitled to both. 2. God will unmake the world again, and therefore shall have a being to eternity; (v. 26, 27.) They shall perish, for thou shalt change them by the same almighty power that made them, and therefore, no doubt, thou shalt endure; thou art the same. God and the world, and Christ and the creature, are rivals for the highest and uppermost place in the soul of man, the immediate object. What is here said, one would think, were enough to decide the controversy immediately, and to determine, as for God and Christ. For, (1.) A portion in the creature is fading and dying; They shall perish, they will not last so long as we shall last; the day is coming when the earth and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up; and then what will become of the God that has laid up the treasure in it? Heaven and earth shall wax old as a garment; not by a gradual decay, but, when the set time comes, they shall be set aside like an old garment that we have no more occasion for; As a vesture shall thou change them, and they shall be changed; not annihilated, but altered, it may be, so that they shall not be at all the same, but new heavens and a new earth. See God's sovereign dominion over heaven and earth; he can change them as he pleases, and when he pleases, and the creature shall be subject to, in the revolutions of day and night, summer and winter, are earnest of their last and final change, when the heavens and time shall be no more. (2.) A portion in God is perpetual and everlasting; Thou art the same, subject to no change; and thy years have no end, v. 27. Christ will be the same in the same performance that he was in the promise; the same to his innermost power in captivity that he was to his church at liberty. Let not the church fear the weakening of her strength, or the shortening of her days, while Christ himself is both her Strength and her Life; he is the same, and has said, Because I live, ye shall live also. Christ came in the fulness of time, and set up his kingdom in spite of the power of the Old Testament Babylon, and he will keep it up in spite of the New Testament Babylon.

IV. A confirmation of an answer to this prayer; (v. 28.) The children of thy servants shall continue; since Christ is the same, the church shall continue from one generation to another; from the eternity of the Head, we may infer the perpetuity of the body, though often weak and distempered, and even at death's door. They that hope to wear out the saints of the Most High will be mistaken. Christ's servants shall have children; those children shall have a seed, a succession of professing people; the church is as old as the world, is under the influence of that blessing, Be fruitful and multiply. These children shall continue, not in their own persons, by reason of death, but in their seed, which shall be established before God, that is, in his service, and by his grace; the entail of religion shall not be cut off while the world stands, but, as one generation of good people passes away, another shall come, and thus the throne of Christ shall endure.

This psalm calls more for devotion than exposition; it is a most excellent psalm of praise, and of general use. The psalmist, I. Stirs up himself and his own soul to praise God, (v. 1.) for his favour to him in particular, (v. 5.) to let himself be in general, and to all good men, to whom he is, and will be, just, and kind, and constant, (v. 6., 18.) and for his government of the world, v. 19. II. He desires the assistance of the holy angels, and all the works of God, in dealing with his enemies. In writing this psalm, we must in a special manner get our hearts affected with the goodness of God, and enlarged in love and thankfulness. A psalm of David.

1. BLESS the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name. 2. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits: 3. Who forgiveth all thine iniquities, who healeth all thy diseases; 4. Who redeemeth thy life from destruction, who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies; 5. Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things; so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle.'

David is here communing with his own heart, and he is no fool that thus talks to himself, and excites his own soul to that which is good. Observe, how he stirs up himself to the duty of praise; v. 1, 2. 1. It is the Lord that is to be blessed and spoken of, for he is the Fountain of all good, whatever are the channels or cisterns; it is to his name, his holy name, that we are to consecrate our praise, giving thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. 2. It is the soul that is to be employed in blessing God, and all that is within us. We make nothing of our religious performances, if we do not make heart-work of them; if that which is within us, may, if all that is within us, be not engaged in them. The work requires the inward man, the whole man, and all little enough. 3. In order to our return of praises to God, there must be a grateful remembrance of the mercies we have received from him; Forget not all his benefits. If we do not give thanks for them, we do forget them; and that is unjust as well as unkind; since in all God's favours there is so much that is memorable; "O my soul, to thy shame be it spoken, thou hast forgotten many of his benefits; but surely thou wilt not forget them all, for thou shouldest not have forgotten any." II. How he furnishes himself with abundant matter for praise, and that which is very affecting; "Come, my soul, consider what God has done for thee. 1. "He has pardoned thy sins, (v. 3.) he has forgiven, and doth forgive, all thine iniquities." This is mentioned first, because, by the pardon of sin, that is taken away which kept good things from us, and we are restored to the favour of God, which bestows good things on us. Think what the provocation was, it was iniquity, and yet pardoned; how many the provocations were, and yet all pardoned; He has forgiven all our trespasses. It is a continued act; he is still forgiving, as we are still sinning and repenting. 2. "He has cured thy sickness." The corruption of nature is the sickness of the soul, it is its disorder, and threatens its death; this is cured in sanctification; when sin is mortified, the disease is healed; though complicated, it is all healed. Our crimes were capital, but God saves our lives by pardoning them; our diseases were mortal, but God saves our lives by healing them. These two go together, for as for God, his work is perfect, and not done by halves; if he take away the guilt of sin by pardoning mercy, he will break the power of it by renewing grace. Where Christ is made Righteousness to any soul, he is made Sanctification, 1 Cor. i. 30.

3. "He has rescued thee from danger." A man may be in peril of life, not only by his crimes, or his diseases, but by the power of his enemies; and therefore here also we experience the divine goodness; Who redeemeth thy life from destruction, (v. 4.) He sent the Chaldeans from the second death. The redemption of the soul is precious, we cannot compass it, and therefore are the more indebted to divine grace that has wrought it out to him who has obtained eternal redemption for us. See Job xxxiii. 24, 25.

4. "He has not only saved thee from death and ruin, but has made thee truly and completely happy, with honour, pleasure, and long life. (1.) "He has given thee true honour and great honour; no less than a crown; He crowns thee with his loving-kindness and tender mercies," and what greater dignity is a poor soul capable of, than to be advanced into the love and favour of God? This honour have all his saints. What is the crown of glory but God's favour? (2.) "He has given thee true pleasure; He satisfieth thy mouth with good things," (v. 5.) It is only the favour and grace of God, that can give satisfaction to a soul, can suit its capacities, supply its needs, and answer to its desires; nothing but divine wisdom can undertake to fill its treasures; (Prov. viii. 21.) other things will surfeit, but not satiate, Excl. vi. 7. Isa. lv. 2. (3.) "He has given thee a prospect and pledge of long life; Thy youth is renewed like the eagle." The eagle is long-lived, and, as naturalists say, when she is near 100 years old, casts all her feathers, (as indeed she changes them in a great measure every year at molting time,) and fresh ones come, so that she becomes young again. When God, by the graces and comforts of his Spirit, recovers his people from their decays, and fills them with new life and joy, which is to them an earnest of eternal life and joy, then they may be said to return to the days of their youth, Job xxxiii. 25.

6. The Lord executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed. 7. He made known his ways unto Moses, his acts unto the children of Israel. 8. The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy. 9. He will not always chide; neither will he keep his anger for ever. 10. He hath not dealt with us after our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. 11. For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him. 12. As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us. 13. Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him. 14. For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust. 15. As for man, his days are as grass; as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth: 16. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more. 17. But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children's children; 18. To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them.

Hitherto the psalmist had only looked back upon his own experiences, and thence fetched matter for praise; here he looks abroad, and takes notice of his favour to others also, for in them we should rejoice, and give thanks for them; for the Lord is fed at a common table, and sharing in the same blessings.

1. Truly God is good to all; (v. 6.) He executes righteousness and judgment, not only for his own people, but for all that are oppressed; for, even in common providence, he is the Patron of wronged innocence, and, one way or other, will plead the cause of those that are injured against their oppressors. It is his honour to humble the proud, and help the helpless.
II. He is in a special manner good to Israel, to every Israelite indeed, that is of a clean and upright heart.

1. He has revealed himself and his grace to us; (v. 7.) He made known his ways unto Moses, and by him his acts to the children of Israel; not only by his rod to those who then lived, but by his pen to those who have since lived. Dr. Dallas says the first grand and greatest of divine favours with which the church is blessed; for God restores us to himself by revealing himself to us, and gives us all good by giving us knowledge. He has made known his acts and his ways, his nature, and the methods of his dealing with the children of men, that they may know both what to conceive of him, and what to expect from him; so Dr. Hammond. Or, by his acts we may understand his precepts, the the which he requires us to walk in; and by his acts, or designs, (as the word signifies,) his promises and purposes as to what he will do with us. Thus fairly does God deal with us.

2. He has never been rigorous and severe with us, but always tender, full of compassion, and ready to forgive.

(1.) It is in his nature to be so; (v. 8.) The Lord is merciful and gracious; this was his way which he made known to Moses at mount Horeb, where he thus proclaimed his name, (Exod. xlv. 6, 7,) in answer to Moses’s request, (ch. xxxiii. 13.) I beseech thee, show me thy way, that I may know thee. It is my way, says God, to pardon sin. [1.] He is not so soon angry, v. 8. He is slow to anger, not extreme to mark what we do amiss, nor ready to take advantage against us. He bears long with those that are very provoking, deters punishing, that he may give space to repent, and does not speedily execute the sentence of his law. He could not be thus slow to anger, if he were not plentiful in mercy, the very Father of mercies. [2.] He is not long angry; for, (v. 9.) He will not always chide, though we always offend, and deserve chiding. Though he signifies his displeasure against us for our sins, by the rebukes of Providence, and the reproaches of our own consciences, and thus cause grief, yet he will have compassion, and will not always keep us in pain and terror, not for our sins, but, after the manner of bondages, will give the spirit of adoption. How unlike are those to God, who always chide, who take every occasion to chide, and never know when to cease! What would become of us, if God should deal so with us? He will not keep his anger for ever, against his own people, but will gather them with everlasting mercies, Isa. lvi. 8.—lvii. 16.

(2.) We have found him so; we, for our parts, must own that he has not dealt with us after our sins, v. 10. The scripture says a great deal of the mercy of God, and we may all set to our seal, that it is true, that we have experienced it. If he had not been a God of patience, we had been in hell long ago; but he has not rewarded us after our iniquities; so they will say who know what sin deserves. He has not inflicted the judgments which we have merited, nor delivered us of the comforts which we have forfeited; which would make us think the worse, and not the better, of sin; for God’s patience should lead us to repentance, Rom. ii. 4.

3. He has pardoned our sins; not only mine iniquity, (v. 3.) but our transgressions; (v. 12.) though it is of our own benefit, by the pardoning mercy of God, that we are to take the comfort, yet of the benefit others have by it we must give him the glory. Observe, (1.) The transcendence of God’s mercy, (v. 13.) What God’s mercy is high above the earth, (so high, that the earth is but a point to the vast expanse,) so God’s mercy is above the merits of those that fear him most: so much above and beyond them, that there is no proportion at all between them; the greatest performances of man’s duty cannot demand the least tokens of God’s favour as a debt, and therefore all the seed of Jacob will join with him in owning themselves less than the least of all God’s mercies, Gen. xxxii. 10. Observe, God’s mercy is thus great toward them that fear him, not toward them that trifle with him. We must fear God, and his goodness. (2.) The fulness of his pardons, if we consider the fulness of his mercy; (v. 12.) As far as the east is from the west, so are his mercies toward them that fear him. The sins of believers shall not be remembered no more, shall not be mentioned unto them, they shall be sought for, and not found. If we thoroughly forsake them, God will thoroughly forgive them.

4. He has pitied our sorrows, v. 13, 14. Observe, (1.) Whom he pitied; them that fear him, all good people, who in this world may become objects of pity on account of the grievances to which they are not only born, but born again. Or it may be understood of those who have not yet received the spirit of adoption, and are yet trembling at his word; those he pitied, Jer. xxxi. 18, 20. (2.) How he pitied; as a father pitied his children, and does them good as there is occasion. God is a Father to them that fear him, and owns them for his children, and he is tender of them as a father. The father pitied his children that are weak in knowledge, and instructed them; pitied them when they are forward, and bears with them; pitied them when they are sick, and comforts them; pitied them; (Isa. lv. 18.) When they were as little children, up, up again; pitied them when they have offended, and forgives them, and when they are wronged, and rights them; thus the Lord filleth them that fear him. (3.) Why he pitied; for he knew our frame. He has reason to know our frame, for he framed us; and, having himself made man of the dust, he remembered that he is dust, not only by constitution, but by sentence; Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. (4.) He pitied the frailty of our souls, how little we can do, and accordingly from us, how little we can bear, and lays accordingly upon us; in all which appears the tenderness of his compassion.

5. He has perpetuated his covenant-mercy, and thereby provided relief for our frailty, v. 15-18. See here.

(1.) How short man’s life is, and of what uncertain continuance; the lives even of good men and good men are so; and neither their greatness nor their goodness can alter the property of them; As for man, his days are as grass, which grows out of the earth, rises but a little way above it, and soon withers, and returns to it again. See Isa. xl. 6, 7. Man, in his best estate, seems somewhat more than grass, he flourishes and looks gay; yet then he is but like a flower of the field, which, though distinguished a little from the grass, will wither with it. The flower of the garden is commonly more choice and valuable, and, though in its own nature withering, will last the longer for its being sheltered by the garden wall, and the gardener’s care; but the flower of the field, (to which life is here compared) is not only withering in itself, but exposed to the cold blasts, and liable to be corrupt, and wrung on by the beasts of the field. Man’s life is not only wasting of itself, but it is often anticipated by a thousand accidents. When the flower is in its perfection, a blasting wind, unseen, unlooked for, passes over it, and it is gone; it hangs the head, drops the leaves, dwindles into the ground again, and the place thereof, which was proud of it, now knows it no more. Such a thing is man: God considers it, and pities him; let him consider his end, and be wise, for God will be holy, dead to this world, and thoughtful of another.

(2.) How long and lasting God's mercy is to his people; (v. 17, 18.) it will continue longer than their lives, and will survive their present state. Observe, [1.] The description of these to whom this mercy belongs; they are such as fear God, such as are truly religious, from principle. First, They live a life of faith; for they keep God's commandments, have taken hold of it, they keep hold of it, fast hold, and will not let it go. They keep it as a treasure, keep it as their portion, and would not for all the world part with it, for it is their life. Secondly, They live a life of obedience; they remember his commandments to do them, else they do not keep his covenant. Those only shall have the benefit of God's promises that make conscience of his precepts. See who they are that have a good memory, as well as a good understanding, (ex. 10.) those that remember God's commandments, not to talk of them, but to do them, and to be ruled by them. [2.] The continuance of the mercy which belongs to such as these: it will last them longer than their lives on earth, and therefore they need not be troubled though their lives be short, since death itself will be no abridgment, no infringement, of their bliss. God's mercy is better than life, for it will outlive it. If God's glory be their life, (Isa. 57:19.) then shall the mercy of the Lord be from everlasting to everlasting; from everlasting in the councils of it, to everlasting in the consequences of it; in their election before the world was, and their glorification when this world shall be no more; for they are destined to the inheritance, (Eph. i. 11.) and look for the mercy of the Lord, the Lord Jesus, unto eternal life. Secondly, To their seed, which shall be kept up to the end of time; (c. ii. 28.) His righteousness shall be their treasure; God's children and children's children; provided they tread in the steps of their predecessors' piety, and keep his covenant, as they did, then shall mercy be preserved to them, even to a thousand generations.

19. The Lord hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all. 20. Bless the Lord, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word. 21. Bless ye the Lord, all ye his hosts; ye ministers of his that do his pleasure. 22. Bless the Lord, all his works, in all places of his dominion: bless the Lord, O my soul. Here is,

I. The doctrine of universal providence laid down, v. 19. He has secured the happiness of his peculiar people by promise and covenant, but the order of mankind, and the world in general, he secures by common providence. The Lord has a throne of his own, a throne of glory, a throne of government; he that rules all rules absolutely, without all a given by him; he has prepared his throne, has fixed and established it that it cannot be shaken; he has ordained all the measures of his government, and does all according to the counsel of his own will. He has prepared it in the heavens, above us, and out of sight; for he holds back the face of his throne, and spreads a cloud upon it, (Job xxvi. 9.) yet can himness judge through the dark cloud, Job xxii. 13. Hence the heavens are said to rule, (Dan. iv. 26.) and we are led to consider this by the influence which even the visible heavens have upon this earth, their dominion, Job xxxviii. 33. Gen. i. 16. But though God's throne is in heaven, and there he keeps his court, and thither we are to direct to him, (our Father which art in heaven,) yet his kingdom rules over all. He takes cognizance of all the inhabitants, and all the affairs, of this lower world, and disposes all persons and things according to the counsel of his will, to his own glory; (Dan. iv. 35.) His kingdom rules over all kings, and all kingdoms, and from it there is no exempt jurisdiction.

II. This inference drawn from it; if all are under God's dominion, all must do him homage. 1. Let the holy angels praise him; (v. 20, 21.) Bless the Lord, ye his angels; and again, Bless the Lord, all ye his hosts, ye ministers of his. David had been stirring up himself and others to praise God, and here, in the close, he calls upon the angels to do it: not as if they needed any excitement of ours to praise God, they do it continually; but thus he expresses his high thoughts of God as worthy of the adorations of the holy angels; thus he quickens himself and others to the duty, with this consideration, That it is the work of angels; and comforts himself, in reference to his own weakness and defect in the performance of this duty, with this consideration, That there is a world of holy angels who dwell in God's house, and are still praising him. In short, the blessed angels are glorious attendants upon the blessed God. Observe, (1.) How well qualified they are to do this great work, for they excel in strength; they are mighty in strength, so the word is: they are able to bring great things to pass, and to abide in their work without weariness. And they are as willing as they are able; they are willing to know their work; for they hearken to the voice of his word; they stand expecting commission and instructions from their great Lord, and always behold his face, (Matt. xvi. 9.) that they may take the first import of his mind. They are willing to do their work; they do his commandments, (v. 20.) they do his pleasure, (v. 21.) they dispute not any divine command, but readily address themselves to the execution of them: nor do they delay, but fly swiftly. They do his commandments at hearing; or, as soon as they hear the voice of his word; so Dr. Hammond. To obey is better than sacrifice; for angels obey, but men do not, such as sacrifice not; (Gen. ii. 7.) they are his angels, and ministers of his; his, for he made them, and made them for himself; his, for he employs them, though he does not need them; his, for he is their Owner and Lord, they belong to him, and he has them at his beck. All the creatures are his servants, but not as the angels that attend the presence of his glory. Soldiers, and seraphims, and all good subjects, serve the king, but not as the courtiers do, the ministers of state, and those of the household.

[1.] They occasionally serve God in this lower world; they do his commandments, go on his errands, (Dan. ix. 21.) fight his battles, (2 Kings vi. 17.) and minister for the good of his people, Heb. i. 14. [2.] They continually praise him in the upper world; they began betimes to do it, (Job xxxviii. 7.) and it is still their business, from which they rest not day or night, Rev. iv. 8. It is God's glory, that he has such attendants, but more his glory, that he neither needs their services for his own benefit, nor can be without them.

2. Let all his works praise him; (v. 22.) all, in all places of his dominion; for, because they are his works, they are under his dominion; and they were made, and are ruled, that they may be unto him for a name and a praise. All his works, that is, all the children of men, in all parts of the world, let them all praise God; yea, and the inferior creatures too, which are God's works also, let them praise him objectively, though they cannot actually do it; (xxiv. 10.) yet all this shall not excuse David from
When we are addressing ourselves to any religious service, we must stir up ourselves to take hold on God in it; (Isa. lxxv. 7.) so David does here. “Come, my soul, where art thou? What art thou thinking of? Here is work to be done, good work, angels’ work; set about it in good earnest, let all thy powers and faculties be engaged and employed in it; Bless the Lord, O my soul.”

In these verses:

I. The psalmist looks up to the divine glory shining in the upper world, of which, though it is one of the things not seen, faith is the evidence. With what reverence and holy awe does he begin his meditation with that acknowledgment, O Lord my God, thou art very great! It is the joy of the saints, that he will be that God to a great God; the grandeur of the prince is the pride and pleasure of all the good subjects. The majesty of God is here set forth by divers instances, alluding to the figure which great princes in their public appearances covet to make, their equipage, compared with his, (even of the eastern kings, who most affected pomp,) is but as the light of a glow-worm, compared with that of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Princes appear great.

1. In their robes: and what are God’s robes? Thou art clothed with honour and majesty, v. 1. God is seen in his works, and these bespeak him infinitely wise and good, and all that is great. Thou coverest thyself with light, as with a garment, v. 2. God is light, (1 John i. 5.) the Father of lights; (Jam. i. 17.) he dwells in light, (1 Tim. vi. 16.) he clothes himself with it. The residence of his glory is in the highest heaven, that light which was created at the first day, Gen. i. 3. Of all visible beings, light comes nearest to the nature of a spirit, and therefore with that God is pleased to cover himself, that is, to reveal himself under that similitude, as men are seen in the clothes with which they cover themselves; and so only, for his face cannot be seen.

2. In their palaces, or pavilions, when they take the field: and what is God’s palace, and his pavilion? He stretches out the heavens like a curtain; (v. 2.) so he did at first, when he made the firmament, which in the Hebrew has its name from its being expanded or stretched out, Gen. i. 7. He made it to divide the waters as a curtain divides between two apartments: so he does still; he now stretches out the heavens like a curtain, keeps them upon the stretch, and they continue to this day according to his ordinance. The regions of the air are stretched out about the earth, like a curtain about a bed, to keep it warm, and drawn between us and the upper world, to break its dazzling light; for though God covers himself with light, yet, in compassion to us, he makes darkness his pavilion; thick clouds are a covering to him. The vastness of this pavilion may lead us to consider how great, how very great, he is, that fills heaven and earth. He has his chambers, his upper rooms, so the word signifies, the beams whereof he lays in the waters, the waters that are above the firmament, (v. 2.) as he has foundations the earth upon the seas and floods, the waters beneath the firmament. Though air and water be fluid bodies, yet, by the divine power, they are kept as tight and as firm in the place assigned them, as a chamber is with beams and rafters. How great a God is he, whose presence-chamber is thus reared, thus fixed!

3. In their coaches of state, and their stately houses, whose add much to the magnificence of their entries: but God makes the changes of his counsels, in which he rides strongly, swiftly, and far above out of the reach of opposition, when at any time he will act by uncommon providences in the government of this world. He descended in a cloud, as in a chariot, to mount Sinai, to give the law, and to mount Tabor, to proclaim the gospel, (Matt. xvii. 5.) and he walks (a gentle pace indeed, yet stately) upon the wings of the wind. See xviii. 10, 11. He communds the winds, directs them as he pleases, and serves his own purposes by them.

4. In their retinue or train of attendants: and here also God is very great; for (v. 4.) he maketh his angels spirits. This is quoted by the apostle, (Heb. i. 7.) to prove the pre-existence of Christ as the word of God.

The earth and the firmament are said to be his angels and his ministers, for they are under his dominion, and at his disposal; they are winds, and a flame of fire, that is, a flame, in wind and fire, so some; or, they are as swift as winds, and pure as flames; or he maketh them spirits, so the apostle quotes it. They are spiritual beings; and, whatever vehicles they may have proper to their nature, it is certain they have not bodies, as we have.
Being spirits, they are so much the further removed from the incumbrances of the human nature, and so much the nearer allied to the glories of the divine nature. And they are bright and quick, and ascending as fire, as a flame of fire. In Ezekiel's vision, they ran and returned like a flash of lightning, Ezek. i. 14. Thence they are called Seraphim, burners. Whatever they are, they are what God made them, what he still makes them; they derive their being from him, having the beginning of life from him, and the continuance of life by him, and he makes what use he pleases of them.

II. He looks down, and looks about, to the power of God shining in this lower world. He is not so taken up with the glories of his court, as to neglect even the remoter of his territories; no, not the sea and dry land.

1. He has founded the earth; (v. 5.) though he has hung it upon nothing, (Job xxvi. 2.) neither has his greatness been equalled by its own weight; yet it is as immovable as if it had been laid upon the surest foundations. He has built the earth upon her basis, so that though it has received a dangerous shock
by the sin of man, and the malice of hell strikes at it, yet it shall not be removed for ever, that is, not till the end of time, when it must give way to the new earth. Dr. Hammond's paraphrase of this is worth noting: "God has fixed so strange a place for the earth, that being a heavy body, one would think it should fall every minute; and yet, which way soever we would imagine it to stir, it must, contrary to the nature of such a body, fall upwards, and so can have no possible ruin but by tumbling into heaven."

2. He has set bounds to the sea; for that also is his.
(1.) He brought it within bounds in the creation.
At first, the earth, which, being the more porous body, would subside of course, was covered with the deep, (v. 6.) the waters were above the mountains; and so it was unfit to be, as it was designed, a habitation for man; and therefore, on the third day, God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered unto one place, and let the dry land appear, Gen. i. 9. This command of God is here called his rubuke, as if he gave it because he was pleased that the earth was thus covered with water; and not fit for man to dwell on. Power went along with this word, and therefore it is also called here the voice of his thunder, which is a mighty voice and produces strange effects, v. 7. At thy rubuke as if they were made sensible that they were out of their place, they fled, they hastened away; (they called, and not in vain, to the rocks and mountains to cover them:) as it is said, on another occasion, (lxvii. 16.) The waters saw thee, O God, the waters witnessed, and the rocks stood up; and as these fluid bodies received the impression of God's terror, But was the Lord displeased against the rivers? No it was for the salvation of his people, Hab. ii. 8, 13.
So here God rebuked the waters for man's sake, to prepare room for him; for men must not be made as the fishes of the sea, (Hab. i. 14.) they must have air to breathe in. Immediately, therefore, with all speed, the waters retired, v. 8. They go over hill and dale, (as we say,) go up by the mountains, and down by the valleys; they will neither stop at the former, nor lodge in the latter, but make the best of their way to the place which thou hast founded for them, and there they make their bed. Let the obsequiousness even of the unstable waters teach us obedience to the word and will of God: for shall man alone of all the creatures be obstinate? Let their retiring to, and resting in, the place assigned them, teach us to acquiesce in the disposals of that wise providence which appoints us the bounds of our habitation.

(2.) He keeps it within bounds, (v. 9.) The waters are forbidden to pass over the limits set them; they may not, and therefore they do not, turn again to cover the earth. Once they did, in Noah's flood, because God bade them, but never since, because he forbids them, having promised not to drown the world again. God himself glories in this instance of his power, (Job xxxviii. 8, &c.) and uses it as an argument with us to fear him, Jer. v. 22. This, if duly considered, would keep the world in awe of the Lord and his goodness, That the waters of the sea would soon cover the earth, if God did not restrain them.

10. He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills. 11. They give drink to every beast of the field: the wild asses quench their thirst. 12. By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches.
13. He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied, with the fruit of thy works. 14. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man, that he may bring forth food out of the earth; 15. And wine that maketh the heart of man glad, and oil that maketh his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart. 16. The trees of the Lord are full of sap: the cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted; 17. Where the birds make their nests: as for the stork, the fir	rees are her house. 18. The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats, and the rocks for the conies.

Having given glory to God, as the powerful Protector of this earth, in saving it from being deluged, here he comes to acknowledge him as its bountiful Benefactor, who provides conveniences for all the creatures.

1. He provides fresh water for their drink; He sends the springs into the valleys, v. 10. There is water enough indeed in the sea, that is, enough to drown us, but not one drop to refresh us, he we ever so thirsty, it is all so salt; and therefore God has graciously provided water fit to drink. Naturalists dispute about the origin of fountains; but, whatever are their second causes, here is their first Cause; it is God that sends the springs into the brooks, which walk by easy steps between the hills, and receive in them the streams that descend from them.
These give drink, not only to man, and those creatures that are immediately useful to him, but to every beast of the field; (v. 11.) for where God has given life, he provides a livelihood, and takes care of all the creatures; even the wild asses, though un tameable, and therefore of no use to man, are wel to quench their thirsts; and we have no reason to grudge it them, for we are better provided for, though born like the wild ass's colt. We have rea son to thank God for the plenty of fair water which he has provided the habitable part of his earth, which otherwise would not be habitable.

That ought to be reckoned a great mercy, the want of which would be a great affliction: and the more common it is, the greater mercy it is; Usis communis aqueant—Water is for common use.

II. He provides food convenient for them, both for man and beast, for he makes the earth to hear the earth, but God hears them, Hos. ii. 21.

He waters the hills from his chambers, (v. 13.) from those chambers spoken of, (v. 3.) the beams of which he lays in the waters, those store-chambers, the clouds that distil the fruitful showers. The hills that are not watered by the rivers, as Egypt was by Nile, are watered by the rain from heaven, which is called the river of God, (Hos. 9.) as Canaan was, Dout. xi. 11, 12. Thus the earth is satisfied with the fruit of his works; either with the rain it drinks in, (the earth knows when it has enough,) it is pity that any man should not, or with the pro ducts it brings forth. It is a satisfaction to the earth to bear the fruit of God's works for the bene fit of man, for thus it answers the end of its creation.

The food which God brings forth out of the earth,

(v. 14.) is the fruit of his works, which the earth is satisfied with. Observe how various and how valu able its products are: for the cattle there is grass, and the beasts of prey, that live not on grass, feed on those that do. For man there is herb, a better sort of grass, (and a dinner of herbs and roots is not to be despised,) nay, he is furnished with wine, and oil, and bread, v. 15.

We may observe here, concerning our food, that which will help to make us both humble and thank ful. 1. To make us humble, let us consider that we have a necessary dependence upon God for all the supports of this life; we live upon alms, we are at his finding, for our own hands are not sufficient for us: that our food comes all out of the earth, to remind us whence we ourselves were taken, and whether we must return; and that, therefore, we must not think to live by bread alone, for that will feed the body only, but must look into the word of God for the meat that endures to eternal life; and, finally, we have in this as in our fellow-commoners with the beasts: the same earth, the same spot of ground, that brings grass for the cattle, brings corn for man. 2. To make us thankful, let us con sider, (1.) That God not only provides for us, but for our servants: the cattle that are of use to man are particularly taken care of; grass is made to grow in great abundance for them, when the young lions, that are not for the service of man, often lack, and suffer hunger. (2.) That our food is nigh us, and not at a distance: our habitation on earth is there we have our storehouse, and depend not on the merchant-ships that bring food from afar, Prov.

xxxii. 14. (3.) That we have even from the pro ducts of the earth, not only for necessity, but for or nament and delight; so God has a Master do serve.

1. Does nature call for something to support it, and repair its daily decays? Here is bread, which strengthens man's heart, and is therefore called the satiety of the flesh, when we have the bread we want. [2.] Does nature go further, and covet something pleasant? Here is wine, that makes glad the heart, refreshes the spirits, and exhilarates them, when it is soberly and moderately used; that we may not only go through our business, but go through it cheerfully. It is pity that should be abused to overcharge the heart, and unfit men for their duty, which was given to revive their heart, and quicken them in their duty. [3.] Is nature yet more humoursome, and does it crave something for ornament too? Here is that also out of the earth;

oil to make the face to shine, that the countenance may not only be cheerful but beautiful, and we may be the more acceptable to those we worship.

Nay, the Divine Providence not only furnishes animals with their proper food, but vegetables also with theirs; (v. 16.) The trees of the Lord are full of sap; not only men's trees, which they take care of, and have an eye to, in their orchards, and parks, and other enclosures, but God's trees, which grow in the wildernesses, and are taken care of only by his Providence, they are full of sap, and want no nourishment. [4.] The fowl of the air, an open forest, though they are high and bulky, and require a great deal of sap to feed them, have enough from the earth; they are trees which he has planted, and which therefore he will protect and provide for.

We may apply this to the trees of righteousness, which are the planting of the Lord, planted in his vineyard; these are full of sap; for what God plants

he will water; and they that are planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God, xci. 13.

III. He takes care that they shall have suitable habitations to dwell in. To men God has given dis cretion to build for themselves, and for the cattle that are serviceable to them; but there are some creatures which God more immediately provides a settlement for.

The birds. Some birds, by instinct, make their nests in the bushes near rivers, (v. 12.) By the springs that run among the hills, some of the fowls of heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches. They sing, according to their capacity, to the honour of their Creator and Bene factor; and their singing may shew our silence. Our heavenly Father feeds them, (Matth. vi. 26.) and therefore they are easy and cheerful, and take no thought for the morrow. The birds being made to fly above the earth, (as we find, Gen. i. 26.) they make their nests on high, in the tops of trees, (v. 17.) it should seem as if nature had arose to this in planting the cedars of Lebanon, that they might be receptacles for the birds. Those that fly heaven ward shall not want resting-places. The stork is particularly mentioned; the fir-trees, which are very high, are her house, her castle.

2. The lesser sort of beasts; (v. 18.) The wild gazelle, having neither strength nor swiftness to secure themselves, are guided by instinct to the high hills, which are a refuge to them; and the rabbins, which are also helpless animals, find a shelter in the rocks, where they can set the beasts of prey at de fiance. Does God provide thus for the inferior creatures, and will he not himself be a Refuge and Dwelling-Place to his own people?

19. He appointeth the month for seasons:

the sun knoweth his going down. 20. Thou maketh darkness, and it is night, wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth. 21

The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God. 22. The sun ariseth, they gerather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens. 23. Man goeth forth unto his work, and to his labour, until the evening. 24. O Lord, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. 26. There go the ships; there is that Leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein. 27. These wait all upon thee, that thou mayest give them their meat in due season. 28. That thou givest them, they gather: thou openest thy hand, they are filled with good. 29. Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled; thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust. 30. Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created: and thou renewest the face of the earth.

We are here taught to praise and magnify God.

I. For the constant revolutions and succession of day and night, and the dominion of sun and moon over them. The heaven were so affected with the light and influence of the sun and moon, and their serviceableness to the earth, that they worshipped them as deities; and therefore the scripture takes all occasions to show that the gods they worshipped are the same as those of the true God: (Gen. 1. 14.) He appointed the moon for seasons, for the measuring of the months, the directing of the seasons for the business of the husbandman, and the governing of the tides. The full and change, the increase and decrease, of the moon, exactly observe the appointment of the Creator; so does the sun, for he keeps as punctually to the time and place of his going down as if he were an intellectual being, and knew what he did.

God herein fulfills the comfort of man.

1. The shadows of the evening befriend the repose of the night; (v. 20.) Thou madest darkness, and it is night, which, though black, contributes to the beauty of nature, and is as a foil to the light of the day; and under the protection of the night all the beasts of the forest creep forth to feed, which they are afraid to do in the day, God having put the fear and dread of man upon every beast of the earth. (Gen. ii. 20.) which contributes as much to man's safety as to his honor. See how nearly allied they are to the disposition of the wild beast, who wait for the twilight, (Job xxiv. 15.) and have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; and compare to this the danger of ignorance and melancholy, which are both darkness to the soul; when, either of these ways, it is night, then all the beasts of the forest creep forth, Satan's temptations then assauls, and have advantage against us. Then the young lions roar after their prey; and, as naturalists tell us, their roaring terrifies the timorous beasts, so that they have not strength or spirit to outrun them, which otherwise they might do, and so they become an easy prey to them. They are said to seek their meat from God, because it is not prepared for them by the care and forecast of man, but more immediately by the providence of God. (Ps. cxii. 1.) and of the young lions, like the crying of the young ravens, is interpreted, asking their meat of God. Does God put this construction upon the language of mere nature, even in venemous creatures, and shall he not much more interpret favourably the language of grace in his own people, though it be weak and broken groanings which cannot be uttered?

2. The light of the morning befriends the business of the day; (v. 22, 23.) The sun arises, (for, as he knows his rising, so doth he to God, knowing his rising again,) and then the wild beasts awake themselves to their rest, even they have some society among them, for they gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens, which is a great mercy to the children of men, that while they are abroad, as become honest travellers, between sun and sun, care is taken that they shall not be set upon by wild beasts, for they are then drawn out of the field, and the sluggard shall have no opportunity to excuse himself from the business he durst not take for that. There is a lion in the way. Therefore, man goes forth to his work and to his labour; the beasts of prey creep forth with fear, man goes forth with boldness, as one that has dominion. The beasts creep forth to spoil and do mischief, man goes forth to work and do good. There is the work of every day, which is to be done in its day, which man must apply to every morning, for the lights are set up for us to work by, not to play by; and which we must stick to till evening: it will be time enough to rest when the night comes, in which no man can work.

II. For the replenishing of the ocean; (v. 25, 26.) As the earth is full of God's riches, well-stocked with animals, and those well provided for, so that it is seldom that any creature dies merely for want of food; so is this great and wide sea, which seems a useless part of the globe, at least, not to answer the room it takes up; yet God has appointed it its place, and it is well-stocked with navigation and navigation, (there go the ships, in which goods are conveyed to countries vastly distant, speedily, and much cheaper than by land-carriage,) and also to be the storehouse for fish; God made not the sea in vain, any more than the earth, he made it to be inhabited, for there are things swimming innumerable, both small and great animals, which serve for man's dainty food. The whale is particularly mentioned in the history of the creation, (Gen. i. 21.) and is here called the Leviathan, as Job xli. 1. He is made to play in the sea: he has nothing to do, as man has, who goes forth to his work; he has nothing to fear, as the beasts have, that lie down in their dens; and therefore he plays with the waters. It is pity that any of the children of men, who have nobler powers, and were made for nobler purposes, should live as if they were sent into the world, like Leviathan into the waters, to play therein; spending all their time in pastime. The Leviathan is said to play in the waters, because he is so well armed against all assaults, that he sets them at defiance, and laughs at the shaking of a spear, Job xli. 29.

III. For the seasonable and plentiful provision which is made for all the creatures, v. 27, 28. 1. God is a bountiful Benefactor to them; he gives them their meat; he opens his hand, and they are filled with good. He supplies them with the air of heaven and earth; even the meanest creatures are not below his cognizance. He is open-handed in the gifts of his bounty, and is a great and good Housekeeper that provides for so large a family. 2. They are patient expectants from him. They all wait upon him; they seek their food, according to the natural instinct God has put into them, and in the proper season for it; and affect not any other food, or at any other time, than when there is the obtaining of it; what God gives them they gather, and expect not that Providence should put it into their mouths; and what they gather they are satisfied with: they are filled with good; they desire no more than what God sees fit for them, which may shame our murmurings and discontent, and dissatisfaction with our lot.

IV. For the absolute power and sovereign dominion which he has over all creatures, which no species of each is still continued, though the individuals of each are daily dying and dropping off. See here, 1. All the creatures perishing; (v. 29.) Thou hidest thy face, withdrawest thy supporting power, thy supplying bounty, and they are troubled immediately. Every creature has as necessary a dependence upon God's favours as every saint is sensible he has, and therefore says with David, (Ps. xxx. 7.) Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. God's displeasure against this lower world for the sin of man is the cause of all the vanity and barrenness which the whole creation groans under. Thou takest away their breath, which is in thy hand, and then they die and return to their dust, to their first principles. The spirit of the beast, which goes downward, is at God's command, as well as the spirit of a man, which goes upward. The death of cattle was one of the plagues of Egypt, and is particularly taken notice of in the drowning of the world. 2. All preserved notwithstanding, in a succession; (v. 30.) Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created; the same spirit, the same divine will and power, by which they were all created at first, still preserves the several sorts of creatures in their being, and place, and usefulness; so that, though one generation of them passes away, another comes, and from time to time they are created; new ones rise up instead of the old ones, and this is a continual creation. Thus the face of the earth is renewed from day to day by the light of the sun, which beautifies it, and at every morning from year to year by the products of it, which enrich it anew every spring, and put quite another face upon it from what it had all winter. The world is as full of creatures as if none died, for the place of those that die is filled up. This (the Jews say) is to be applied to the resurrection, which every spring is an emblem of, when a new world rises out of the ashes of the old one.

In the midst of this discourse the psalmist breaks out into wonder at the works of God; (v. 24.) O Lord, how manifold are thy works! They are numerous, they are various, of many kinds, and many of every kind; and yet in wisdom hast thou made them all. When men undertake many works, and of different kinds, commonly some of them are neglected, and not done with due care; but God's works, though many, and of very different kinds, are all made in wisdom, and with the greatest exactness; there is not the least flaw or defect in them. The works of art, the more closely they are looked upon with the help of microscopes, the more rough they appear; the works of nature through these glasses appear more fine and exact. They are all made in wisdom, for they are all made to answer the end they were designed to serve, the good of the universe, in order to the glory of the universal Monarch.

31. The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever: the Lord shall rejoice in his works. 32. He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth; he toucheth the hills, and they smoke. 33. I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live; I will sing praise to my God while I have my being. 34. My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the Lord. 35. Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. Bless thou the Lord, O my soul. Praise ye the Lord.

The psalmist concludes this meditation with speaking.

1. Praise to God, which is chiefly intended in the psalm.

(1.) He is to be praised. [1.] As a great God, and as a God of matchless perfection; The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever, v. 31. It shall endure to the end of time, in his works of creation and providence; it shall endure to eternity, in the felicity and adorations of saints and angels. Man's glory is fading, God's glory is everlasting; creatures change, but with the Creator there is no variability. [2.] As a gracious God; The Lord shall rejoice in his works. He continues that complacency in the products of his own wisdom and goodness which he had when he saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good, and rested the seventh day from his work. God in his review, we cannot rejoice in, but are displeased at, and wish undone again, blaming our own management. But God always rejoices in his works, because they are all done in wisdom. We regret our bounty and beneficence, but God never does; he rejoices in the works of his grace, his gifts and callings are without repentance. [3.] As a God of almighty power; (v. 32.) He looketh on the earth, and it trembles, as unable to bear his broils. Even as Sodom, at the presence of the Lord. He toucheth the hills, and they smoke. The volcanoes, or burning mountains, such as ætna, are emblems of the power of God's wrath fastening upon proud unhumbled sinners. If an angry look and a touch have such effects, what will the weight of his heavy hand do, and the operations of his outstretched arm? Who knows the power of his anger? Who dare presume to dare it? It is intolerable, as man himself, as God's people, cannot endure it. He will rejoice in his works, because they are all so observer of him; and he will in like manner take pleasure in them that fear him, and that tremble at his word. (2.) The psalmist will himself be much in praising him; (v. 33.) I will sing unto the Lord, unto my God, will praise him as Jehovah, the Creator, and as my God, a God in covenant with me, and this not now only, but as long as I live, and while I have my being. Because we have our life and being from God, and depend upon him for the support and continuance of it, as long as we live and have our being, we must continue to praise God; and when we have no life, no being on earth, we hope to have a better life and better being in a better world, and there to do this work in a better manner, and in better company.

2. Joy to himself; (v. 34.) My meditation of him shall be sweet; it shall be fixed and close, it shall be finding and influencing thought; the reference shall be sweet. Thoughts of God will then be most pleasing when they are most powerful. Nete, Divine meditation is a very sweet duty to all that are sanctified. I will be glad in the Lord, it shall be a pleasure to me to praise him; I will be glad of all opportunities to set forth his glory; and I will rejoice in the Lord always, and in him only. All my joys shall centre in him, and in them they shall be full.

3. Terror to the wicked; (v. 35.) Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. (1.) They that oppose the God of power, and fight against him, will certainly be consumed: none can prosper that harden themselves against the Almighty. (2.) They that rebel against the light of such convincing evidence of God's being, and refuse to serve him, whom all the creatures serve, will perish. The earth shall be so lofty, that earth to grow under the burden of their impieties, which God thus fills with his riches, deserve to be consumed out of it, and that it should spue them out. (3.) They that heartily desire to praise God themselves, cannot but have a holy indignation at those that blaspheme and dishonour him, and a holy satisfaction in the prospect of their destruction, and the honour that God will give to himself by their punishment. It is very seasons, and the matter of their praise; While sinners are consumed out of the earth, let my soul bless the Lord that I am not cast away with the workers of iniquity, but distinguished from them by the special grace of God. When the wicked are no more, I hope to be praising PSALMS, CV.

God world without end: and therefore Praise ye the Lord; let all about me join with me in praising God. Hallelujah; sing praise to Jehovah." This is the first time that we meet with Hallelujah; and it comes in here upon occasion of the destruction of the wicked; and the last time we meet with it is upon the like occasion; when the New Testament Babylon is consumed, this is the burden of the song, Hallelujah, Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6.

PSALM CV.

Some of the psalms of praise are very short, others very long, to teach us, that in our devotions, we should be more observant how our hearts work than how the psalms pass; and neither overstretch ourselves, by coveting to be long, nor overstretch ourselves, by coveting to be short, but either the one or the other, as we find in our hearts to pray. This is a long psalm; the general scope is the saying that we give him the glory of his God, but the subject matter is particular. Every time we come to the throne of grace, we may, if we please, furnish ourselves out of the Word of God (out of the history of the New Testament, as this out of the history of the Old) with new songs, with fresh thoughts—so copious, so various, so inexhaustible, is the subject. In the foregoing psalm, we are taught to praise God for his wondrous works of common providence, with reference to the world in general; in this, we are directed to praise him for his special favours to his church. We find the eleven first verses of this psalm in the beginning of that psalm which David delivered to Asaph to be used (as it should seem) for the daily service of the sanctuary, where the ark was fixed in the place he had prepared for it; by which it appears both who penned it, and when, and upon what occasion, it was penned, 1 Chron. xvii. 7, &c. David by it designed to instruct his people in the obligations they lay under to adhere faithfully to their holy religion. Here is the preface, (v. 1-7) and the history itself in several articles. 1. God's covenant with the patriarchs, v. 8-11. II. His care of them while they were in Egypt, v. 12-15. III. His raising up Hi-8. to be the shepherd and stone of Israel, v. 16-22. IV. The increase of Israel in Egypt, and their deliverance out of Egypt, v. 23-38. V. The care he took of them in the wilderness, and their settlement in Canaan, v. 39-45. In singing this, we must give to God the glory of his wisdom and power, his goodness and faithfulness; must look upon ourselves as concerned in the affairs of the Old Testament church, both because to it were committed the oracles of God, which are our treasure, and out of it Christ arose, and these things happened to it for examples.

1. Give thanks unto the Lord; call upon his name; make known his deeds among the people. 2. Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him: talk ye of all his wondrous works. 3. Glory ye in his holy name: let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord. 4. Seek the Lord, and his strength; seek his face evermore. 5. Remember his marvellous works that he hath done; his wonders, and the judgments of his mouth; 6. O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen. 7. He is the Lord our God; his judgments are in all the earth.

Our devotions are here warmly excited; and we are stirred up, that we may stir up ourselves to praise God. Observe, I. The duties we are here called to, and they are many; but the tendency of them all is to give unto God the glory due unto his name. (1.) We must give thanks to him, as one who has always been our bountiful Benefactor, and requires only the thanks, that he may give him thanks for his favours; poor returns for rich receivings. (2.) Call upon his name; as one whom you depend upon for further favours. Praying for further mercies is accepted as an acknowledgment of former mercies; because he has inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him. (3.) Make known his deeds, (v. 1.) that others may join with you in praising him. Talk ye of all his wondrous works, (v. 2.) as we talk of things that we are full of and much affected with, and desire to tell others with. God's wondrous works ought to be the subject of our familiar discourses with our families and friends, and we should talk of them, and sit in the house, and as we walk in the way; (Deut. vi. 7.) not merely for entertainment, but for the exciting of devotion, and the encouraging of our own and others' faith and hope in God. Even sacred things may be the matter of common talk, provided it be with due reverence. (4.) Sing psalms to God's honour, as those that rejoice in him, and desire to testify that joy for the encouragement of others, and to transmit it to posterity, as memorable things anciently were handed down by songs, when writing was scarce. (5.) Glory in his holy name; let those that are disposed to glory not boast of their own accomplishments and achievements, but of their acquaintance with God, and their relation to him, Jer. ix. 23, 24. Praise ye his holy name, so some; but it comes all to one, for in glorying in him we give glory to him. (6.) Seek him; place your happiness in him, and then pursue the way that leads to him, and with all the psalms, Seek the Lord and his strength, that is, the ark of his strength; seek him in the sanctuary, in the way wherein he has appointed us to seek him. Seek his strength, that is, his grace, the strength of his Spirit, to work in you that which is good, which we cannot do but by strength derived from him, for which he will be inquired of. Seek the Lord, and be strengthened; so divers ancient versions read it. They that would be strengthened must receive strength from God by faith and prayer. Seek his strength, and then seek his face; for by his strength we hope to prevail with him for his favour, as Jacob did, Hos. xii. 3. "Seek his face evermore; seek to have his favour to eternity, and therefore continue seeking it to the end of the time of your probation. Seek it while you live in this world, and you shall have it while you live in the other world, and even there shall be for ever seeking it, and as long as you live there progress in it, and be satisfied in it." (7.) Let the hearts of those rejoice that do seek him, (v. 3.) for they have chosen well, are well fixed, and well employed, and they may be sure that their labour will not be in vain; for he will not only be found, but he will be found the Rewarder of those that diligently seek him. If these have reason to rejoice that seek the Lord, much more those that have found him.

2. Some arguments to quicken us to these duties. (1.) Consider both what he has said, and what he has done, to engage us for ever to him; you will see yourselves under all possible obligations to give thanks to him, and call upon his name, if you remember the wonders which should make deep and durable impressions upon you; the wonders of his providence which he has wrought for you, and those who are gone before you, the marvellous works that he has done, which will be had in everlasting remembrance with the thoughtful and with the grateful; the wonders of his law, which he has written to you, and intrusted you with; the judgments of his mouth, as well as the judgments of his hand, v. 5. (2.) Consider the relation you stand in to him; (v. 6.) Ye are the seed of Abraham his servant; you are born in his house, and being thereby entitled to the privilege of his servants, are also bound to do the duty of servants, to attend your Master, consult his honour, obey his commands, and do what you can to advance his interests. You are the children of Jacob his chosen, and are chosen and beloved for the fathers' sake, and therefore ought to tread in the steps of these whose honours you inherit. You are the children of godly parents, do not degenerate; you are God's church upon earth, and if you do not praise him, who should?

(3.) Consider your interest in him; He is the Lord our God, v. 7. We depend upon him, are devoted to him, and from him our expectation is. Should not a people seek unto their God, (Isa. viii. 19.) and praise their God? Dan. v. 4. He is Jehovah, our God; he that is our God is self-existent and self-sufficient, has an irresistible power and incontestable sovereignty. His judgments are in all the earth; he governs the whole world in wisdom, and gives law to all nations, even to those that know him not. The earth is full of the proofs of his power.

8. He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations: 9. Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac; 10. And confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant; 11. Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance: 12. When they were but a few men in number; yea, very few, and strangers in it. 13. When they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people, 14. He suffered no man to do them wrong; yea, he reproved kings for their sakes; 15. Saying, Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm. 16. Moreover, he called for a famine upon the land: he brake the whole staff of bread. 17. He sent a man before them, even Joseph, who was sold for a servant; 18. Whose feet they hurt with fetters: he was laid in iron; 19. Until the time that his word came; the word of the Lord tried him. 20. The king sent and loosed him; even the ruler of the people, and let him go free. 21. He made him lord of his house, and ruler of all his substance; 22. To bind his princes at his pleasure, and teach his senators wisdom. 23. Israel also came into Egypt, and Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham. 24. And he increased his people greatly, and made them stronger than their enemies.

We are here taught, in praising God, to look a great way back, and to give him the glory of what he did for his church in former ages, especially when it was in the founding and forming, which those in its latter ages enjoy the benefit of, and therefore should give thanks for. Doubtless we may fetch as proper matter for praise from the histories of the gospels, and the acts of the apostles, which relate the birth of the Christian church, as the gospels here does from the histories of Genesis and Exodus, which relate the birth of the Jewish church; and our histories greatly outshine theirs.

Two things are here made the subject of praise; 1. God's promise to the patriarchs, that great promise, that he would give to their seed the land of Canaan for an inheritance, which was a type of the promise of eternal life made in Christ to all believers.

In all the marvellous works which God did for Israel, he remembered his covenant, (v. 8.) and he will remember it for ever; it is the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. See here the power of the promise; it is the word, which he commanded, and which will take effect; see the perpetuity of the promise; it is commanded to a thousand generations, and the entail of it shall not be cut off. In the parallel place it is expressed as our duty: (1 Chron. xvi. 15.) Be ye mindful always of his covenant. God will not forget it, and therefore we must not. The promise is here called a covenant, because there was something required on man's part as the condition of its being fulfilled. Observe, 1. The persons with whom this covenant was made—with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, grandfather, father, and son, all eminent believers, Heb. xi. 8. 9. 2. The ratifications of the covenant; it was made sure by all that is sacred. Is that sure which is sworn to? It is his oath to Isaac and to Abraham. See to whom God swore by himself, Heb. vi. 13. 14. Is that sure which is passed into a law? He confirmed the same for a law, a law never to be repealed. Is that sure which is reduced to a mutual contract and stipulation? This is confirmed for an everlasting covenant, inviolable. 3. The covenant itself; Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, v. 11. The patriarchs had a right to it, not by providence, but by promise; and their seed should be put in possession of it, not by the common ways of settling nations, but by miracles; God will give it them himself, as it was with his own hand; it shall be given them as their lot, which God assigns them, and makes it sure to them; as the lot of their inheritance, a sure title, by virtue of their birth; it shall come to them by descent, not by purchase; by the favour of God, and not on merit of their own. Heaven is the inheritance we have obtained, Eph. i. 11. And this is the promise which God has promised us, (as Canaan was the promise he promised them,) even eternal life, 1 John ii. 25. Tit. i. 2.

11. His providences concerning the patriarchs, while they were waiting for the accomplishment of this promise; which represent to us the care God takes of his people in this world, while they are yet on this side the heavenly Canaan; for these things happened unto them for examples, and encouragements to all the heirs of promises that live by faith as they did.

They were wonderfully protected and sheltered, and (as the Jewish masters express it) gathered under the wings of the Divine Majesty. This is accounted for, v. 12-15. Where we may observe, (1.) How they were exposed to injuries from men. To the three renowned patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, God's promises were very rich; again and again he told them he would be their God; but his performances in this world were so little proportionable, that, if he had not prepared for them a world in the other world, he would have been ashamed to have been called their God, (see Heb. xi. 16.) because he was always generous; and yet, even in this world, he was not wanting to them, but, that he might appear to do uncommon things for them, he exercised them with uncommon trials. [1.] They were few, very few; Abraham was called alone; (Isa. lii. 2.) he had but two sons, and one of them he cast out; Isaac had but two, and one of them he forced to the field; one of them Jacob had more, but some of them, instead of being a defence to him, exposed him, when (as he himself pleads, Gen. xxxiv. 30.) he was but few in number, and therefore might easily be destroyed by the natives, he and his house. God's chosen are but a little flock, few, very few; and yet upheld. [2.] They were strangers, and therefore were the more likely to be abused and to meet with strange usage, and
1. He was humbled, greatly humbled; (v. 17, 18.) God sent a man before them, even Joseph; many years before the famine began, he was sent before them, to nourish them in the famine; so vast are the foresights and forecasts of Providence, and so long its reaches. But in what character did he go to Egypt, who was to provide for the reception of the church there? He went not in quality of an ambassador, nor in form of a servant; but he was sold thither for a slave, a servant for life, without any prospect of being ever set at liberty. This was low enough, and, one would think, set him far enough from any probability of being great; and yet he was brought lower, he was made a prisoner, (v. 18.) His feet they with fetters, being unjustly charged with a crime no less heinous than a rape upon his mistress; the iron casted into his soul, was very painful to him, and was a false accusation, which was the cause of his imprisonment, did in a special manner grieve him, and went to his heart; yet all this was the way to his preferment.

2. He was exalted, highly exalted; he continued a prisoner, neither tried nor bailed, until the time appointed of God for his release, (v. 19.) when his word came, his interpretations of dreams came effectually to the point, and his advice in the affairs of Egypt, (which he gave when the chief butler was in prison, and when the chief baker was there?) was received by the chief of the household, and he was set free. Then he was discharged from prison, (v. 20.) he let him go free. God has often, by wonderful turn of providence, pleaded the cause of oppressed innocence. Secondly, He advanced him to the highest posts of the kingdom; for he was put into the chamberlain of his household; (he made him lord of his house;) nay, he put him into the office of lord treasurer, the ruler of all his substance. He made him prime minister of state, lord president of his council, to command his princes at his pleasure, and teach them wisdom; general of his forces; According to thy word shall all my people be ruled, Gen. xii. 40, 43, 44. He made him lord chief justice, to sit on his bench, and judge his peers; a situation that was very honourably and comfortably provided for many years. Thus the New Testament church has a place provided for her, even in the wilderness, where she is nourished for a time, times, and half a time; (Rev. xii. 14.) verily she shall be fed.

3. They were wonderfully multiplied, according to the promise; nay, so multiplied, that his seed should be as the sand of the sea for multitude, v. 24. In Egypt he increased his people greatly; they multiplied like fishes, so that in a little time they became stronger than their enemies, and formidable to them. Pharaoh took notice of it, (Exod. i. 9.)
The children of Israel are more and mightier than we; when God pleases, a little one shall become a thousand: and God's promises, though they work slowly, work surely.

25. He turned their heart to hate his people, to deal subtly with his servants. 26. He sent Moses his servant, and Aaron whom he had chosen. 27. They showed his signs among them, and wonders in the land of Ham. 28. He sent darkness, and made it dark; and they rebelled not against his word. 29. He turned their waters into blood, and slew their fish. 30. The land brought forth frogs in abundance, in the chambers of their kings. 31. He spake, and there came divers sorts of flies, and lice in all their coasts. 32. He gave them hail for rain, and flaming fire in their land. 33. He smote their vines also, and their fig-trees; and brake the trees of their coasts. 34. He spake, and the locusts came, and eater-pillars, and that without number, 35. And did eat up all the herbs in their land, and devoured the fruit of their ground. 36. He smote also all the first-born in their land, the chief of all their strength. 37. He brought them forth also with silver and gold; and there was not one feeble person among their tribes. 38. Egypt was glad when they departed; for the fear of them fell upon them. 39. He spread a cloud for a covering, and fire to give light in the night. 40. The people asked, and he brought quails, and satisfied them with the bread of heaven. 41. He opened the rock, and the waters gushed out; they ran in the dry places like a river. 42. For he remembered his holy promise, and Abraham his servant. 43. And he brought forth his people with joy, and his chosen with gladness; 44. And gave them the lands of the heathen: and they inherited the labour of the people; 45. That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws. Praise ye the Lord.

After the history of the patriarchs, follows here the history of the people of Israel, when they grew into a nation.

I. The affliction in Egypt; (v. 25.) He turned the heart of the Egyptians, who had protected them, to hate them, and deal subtly with them. God's goodness to his people exasperated the Egyptians against them; and though their old antipathy to the Hebrews (which we read of, Gen. xliii. 32.—xlvi. 34.) was laid asleep for a while, yet now it revived with more violence than ever: formerly they hated them, because they despised them, now because they feared them. They dealt subtly with them, set all their politics on work, to find out ways and means to weaken them, and waste them, and prevent their growth; they made their burdens heavy, and their lives bitter, and slew their male children as soon as they were born. Malice is crafty to destroy: Satan has the serpent's subtlety, with his venom. It was God that turned the hearts of the Egyptians against them; for every creature is that to us that he makes it to be, a friend or an enemy. Though God is not the Author of the sins of men, yet he serves his own purposes by them.

II. Their deliverance out of Egypt, that work of wonder, which, that it might never be forgotten, is set forth into the preface to the ten commandments. Observe,

1. The instruments employed in that deliverance; (v. 26.) He sent Moses his servant on this errand, and joined Aaron in commission with him. Moses was designed to be the lawgiver and chief magistrate, Aaron to be their chief priest; and therefore, that they might respect them the more, and submit to them the better, God made use of them as their deliverers.

2. The means of accomplishing that deliverance; these were the plagues of Egypt. Moses and Aaron observed their orders, in summoning them just as God appointed them, and they rebelled not against his word, (v. 28.) as Jenah did, who, when he was sent to denounce God's judgments against Nineveh, went to Tarshish. Moses and Aaron were not moved, either with a foolish fear of Pharaoh's wrath, or a foolish pity of Egypt's misery, to relax or retard any of the plagues which God ordered them to inflict on the Egyptians, but stretched forth their hand to inflict them as God appointed. They that are intrusted to execute judgment, will find their remissness construed into a rebellion against God's word. The plagues of Egypt are here called God's signs and his wonders; (v. 27.) they were not only proofs of his power, but tokens of his wrath, and to be looked upon with admiration and holy awe. They showed the words of his signs, so it is in the original; for every plague had an exposition going along with it; they were not, as the common works of creation and providence, silent signs, but speaking ones, and they spake aloud. They are all, or most, of them here specified, though not in the order in which they were inflicted.

(1.) The plagues of darkness, v. 28. This was one of the last, though here mentioned first. God sent darkness, and, coming with commission, it came with efficacy; his command made it dark. And then they, that is, the people of Israel, rebelled not against God's word, a command which some think was given them to circumcise all among them that had not been circumcised; in doing which, the three days' darkness would be a protection to them. The Old Translation follows the Septuagint, and reads it, They rebelled not against God's command; which may be applied to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who, notwithstanding the terror of this plague, would not let the people go; but there is no ground for it in the Hebrew.

(2.) The turning of the river Nilus (which they idolized) into blood, and all their other waters, which slew their fish; (v. 29.) and so they were deprived, not only of their drink, but the daintiest of their meat.

(3.) The frogs, abodes of which their land brought forth, which poured in upon them, not only in such numbers, but with such fury, that they could not keep them out of the chambers of their kings and great men, whose hearts had been full of vermin, more nauseous, and more noxious—contempt of, and enmity to, both God and his Israel.

(4.) Flies of divers sorts swarmed in their air, and lice in their clothes. (v. 31.) Or, v. 17, 24. Now God can make use of the meanest, and weakest, and most desppicable, animals, for the punishing and humbling of proud oppressors, to whom the impotency of the instrument cannot but be a great mortification, as well as an undeniable conviction of the divine omnipotence.

(5.) Hail-stones shattered their trees, even the strongest timber trees in their coasts, and killed their vines, and their other fruit trees, v. 32, 33. Instead of rain to cherish their trees, he gave them hail to crush them, and with it thunder and lightning, and to that degree, that the fire ran along upon the ground, as if it had been a stream of kindled brimstone, Exod. ix. 23.

(6.) Locusts and caterpillars destroyed all the herbs and grain, and to the service of man, and ate the bread out of their mouths, v. 34, 35. See what variety of judgments God has, whereby to provoke proud oppressors, that will not let his people go. God did not bring the same plague twice, but, when there was occasion for another, it was still a new one; for he has many arrows in his quiver. Locusts and caterpillars are God's armies; and, how weak soever they are singly, he can raise such numbers of them as to make them formidable, Joel 4. 6.

(7.) Having mentioned all the plagues, but those of the murrain and boils, he concludes with that which gave the conquering stroke, and that was the death of the first-born, v. 36. In the dead of the night, the joys and hopes of their families, the chief of their strength, and flower of their land, were all struck dead by the destroying angel. They would not release God's first-born, and therefore God saved all their first-born of their males, and then commanded them to dismiss his too, when it was too late to retrieve their own; for when God judges, he will overcome, and they will certainly sit down losers at last, that contend with him.

3. The mercies that accompanied this deliverance. In their bondage, (1.) They had been impoverished, and yet they came out rich and wealthy. God not only brought them forth, but he brought them forth with silver and gold, v. 37. The Israelites, which were a meandering, wandering people, were now put in possession of an established dominion. They were endowed with the land of Canaan, which was all new and unproductive, and there they were rich and wealthy; where otherwise they had been a wandering people, and perhaps had been driven out of the land by their enemies. (2.) The Israelites were free, and they were free as never before; and as free as they were rich and wealthy. When God brought them forth, there was not one feeble person, none sick, none so much as sickly, among their tribes. They went out that very night that the plague swept away all the first-born of Egypt, and yet they came out all in good health, and brought not with them any of the diseases of Egypt. Surely never was the like, that among so many thousands there was not one sick! So false was the representation which the enemies of the Jews, in after ages, gave of this matter, that they were all sick of a leprosy, or some leathern disease, and that therefore the Egyptians thrust them out of their land. (3.) They had been trampled upon, and insulted over; and yet they were brought out with honour; (v. 38.) Egypt was glad when they departed; for God had so wonderfully ordered all, and pleased their cause, that the fear of Israel fell upon them, and they owned themselves baffled and overthrown. God can and will make his church a bulwark strong to all that have at it, and seek to displace it, so that they shall think themselves happy, that get out of its way; (Zech. xii. 3.) when God judges, he will overcome. (4.) They had spent their days in sorrow and in sighing, by reason of their bondage; but now he brought them forth with joy and gladness, v. 43. When Egypt's cry for grief was loud, their first-born and oldest in their strain, Israel's call was of joy, and were as loud; both when they looked back upon the land of slavery out of which they were rescued, and when they looked forward to the pleasant land to which they were hastening. God now put a new song into their mouth.

4. The special care God took of them in the wilderness. (1.) For their shelter; beside the canopy of heaven, he provided them another heavenly canopy; he spread a cloud for a covering, (v. 39.) which was to them not only a screen and umbrella, but a cloth of state. A cloud was often God's pavilion, (xviii. 11.) and now it was Israel's; for they also were his people, and called his name; and are represented in the Old Testament, 11. 23. For the further security of them in the dark, he appointed a pillar of fire to give light in the night, that they might never be at a loss. Note, God graciously provides against all the grievances of his people, and furnishes them with convenient succours for every condition, for day and night, till they come there where it will be all day to eternity. (3.) He fed them both with necessary and dainties. Sometimes he furnished them with sweet manna, and sometimes with manna sweeter, of tables of wild fowl; (v. 40.) These people asked, and he brought quails; and when they were not thus fed, yet they were abundantly satisfied with the bread of heaven; those are curious and covetous indeed, who will not be so satisfied. Man did eat eagles' food, and that constantly, and on free cost. And as every bit they ate, had miracle in it, so had every drop they drank; (v. 41.) He opened the rock, and the waters gushed out, v. 41. Common provision fetches waters from heaven, and bread out of a rock; but God's grace is as plentiful as the streams of the rivers, and bread from the clouds, and water from the rocks: so far is the God of nature from being tied to the laws and courses of nature. The water did not only gush out at once, but it ran like a river, plentifully and constantly, and attended their camp in all their removes; hence they are said to have the rock follow them; (1 Cor. x. 4.) and, which increased the miracle, this river of God (so it might be truly called) was a constant supply of water and food, and so far God went in their supply as to make it abundantly so, and tasted and lost it, as one would expect it should have been, by the sands of the desert of Arabia. To this that promise alludes, I will give rivers in the desert, to give drink to my chosen, Isa. xlix. 19, 20.

5. Their entrance, at length, into Canaan; (v. 44.) He gave them the lands of the heathen; put them in possession of that which they had long been put in hopes of; and what the Canaanites had taken pains to get, and had and yet left behind them, God has inherited the labour of the people, and the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just. The Egyptians had long inherited their labours, and now they inherited the labours of the Canaanites. Thus sometimes one enemy of the church is made to pay another's scores.

6. The reasons why God did all this for them. (1.) Because he would himself perform the promises of the word, v. 42. They were unworthy and unfaithful, yet he did those great things in their favour, because he remembered the word of his holiness his covenant, with Abraham his servant, and he would not suffer one iota or tittle of that to fall to the ground. See Deut. vii. 8. (2.) Because he would have them to perform the precepts of the word, to bind them to which was the greatest kindness he could put upon them. He put them in possession of Canaan, not that they might live in plenty and pleasure, in ease and honour, and might make a figure among the nations, but that they might observe his statutes and keep his laws; that, being formed into a people, they might be under God's immediate government, and revealed religion might be the basis of their national constitution; that, having a good land given them, they might out of the profits of it bring sacrifices to God's altar; and that, God, having thus done them good, they might be the people of God, the salt of the earth, the chosen church, that also designed for their good, and might be sensible of their obligations in gratitude to live in obedience to him. We are therefore made, maintained, and redeemed, that we may live in obedience to the will of God; and the hallelujah, with which the psalm concludes, may be taken both as a thankfull acknowledgment of God's favours, and as a cheerful concurrence with this great intention of them. Has God done so much for us, and yet does he expect so little from us? Praise ye the Lord.

PSALM CVI.

We must give glory to God by making confession, not only of his goodness, but our own badness, which serve as foils to each other: our badness makes his goodness appear more in its true light, and our badness the more heinous and scandalous. The foregoing psalm was a history of God's goodness to Israel; this is a history of their rebellions and provocations, and yet it begins and ends with Hallelujah; for even sorrow for sin is not put us out of tune for praising God. Some think it was penned at the time of the captivity in Babylon, and the dispersion of the Jewish nation thereupon, because of that prayer in the close, v. 47. I rather think it was penned by David at the same time with the foregoing psalm, because we find the first verse and the two last in that psalm which David delivered to Asaph, at the bringing up of the ark to the place he had prepared for it; (1 Chron. xvi. 34-36.) Gather us from among the heathen; for we may suppose that in Saul's time there was a great dispersion of pious Israelites, when David was forced to wander. In this psalm, we have, I. The preface to the narrative, speaking honour to God, (v. 1.) comfort to the saints, (v. 5.) and the desire of the faithful toward God's favour, v. 4, 5. II. The narrative itself, of the sins of Israel, aggravated by the great things God did for them, an account of which is intermixed. Their great favours are compared to that sea, (v. 9, 10.) justly; in which the Jews were to drink, (v. 13-15.) mutinying; (v. 16, 18.) worshipping the golden calf; (v. 19, 23.) murmuring; (v. 24, 27.) joining themselves to Baal-peor; (v. 28, 31.) quarrelling with Moses; (v. 32, 33.) incorporating themselves with the nations of Canaan, v. 34, 35. To which is added an account how God had rebuked them for their sins, and yet saved them from ruin, v. 40. 46. III. The conclusion of the psalm with prayer and praise, v. 47, 48. It may be of use to us as well as the psalm, that, being stirred up by it, we may humble ourselves, and yet not despair of mercy, which even rebellious Israel often found with God.

1. PRAISE ye the Lord. O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever. 2. Who can utter the mighty acts of the Lord; who can show forth all his praise? 3. Blessed are they that keep judgment, and he that doth righteousness at all times. 4. Remember me, O Lord, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people: O visit me with thy salvation. 5. That I may see the good of them that are chosen, and be as happy as thy saints are; and happier I do not desire to be. God's people are here called his chosen, his nation, his inheritance; for he has set them apart for himself, incorporated them under his own government, is served by them, and glorified in them. The chosen people of God have a good which is peculiar to them, which is the matter both of their gladness, and of their glorying, which is their pleasure, and their praise. God's people have reason to be a cheerful people, and to boast in their God all the day long; and they who have that gladness, that glory, need not envy any of the children of men their pleasure or pride. The gladness of God's nation, and the glory of his inheritance, are enough to satisfy any man; for they have everlasting joy and glory at the end of them.

6. We have sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly. 7. Our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt; they remembered not the multitude of thy mercies; but provoked him at the sea, even at the Red Sea. 8. Nevertheless, he saved them for his name's sake, that he might make his mighty power to be known. 9. He rebuked the Red Sea also, and it was dried up: so led he them through the depths, as through the wilderness. 10. And he saved them from the hand of him that hated them, and redeemed them from the hand of the enemy. 11. And the waters covered their enemies; there was not one of them left. 12. Then believed they his words; they sang his praise.
church was in distress; for thus we must justify God in all that he brings upon us, acknowledging that therefore he has done right, because we have done wrong; and the remembrance of former sins, notwithstanding which God did not cast off his people, is an encouragement to us to hope that though we are justly corrected for our sins, yet we shall not be utterly abandoned.

1. God's afflicted people here own themselves guilty before God; (v. 6) "We have sinned with our fathers, like our fathers, after the similitude of their transgression." The inheritance of guilt, and filled up the measure of our fathers' iniquity, to augment yet the fierce anger of the Lord," Numb. xxxii. 14. Matth. xxii. 32. And see how they lay loads upon themselves, as becomes penitents; "We have committed iniquity, that which is in its own nature sinful; and we have done wickedly; we have sinned with a high hand, presumptuously." Or, this is a confession, not only of their imitation of, but their interest in, their fathers' sins. We have sinned with our fathers, for we were in their loins, and we bear their iniquity, Lam. v. 7.

II. They bewail the sins of their fathers, when they were first formed into a people; which, since children often smart for, they are concerned to sorrow for, even further than to the third and fourth generation. Even we now ought to take occasion, from the history of Israel's rebellions, to lament the pravity and perverseness of man's nature, and its unaptness to be amended by the most probable means. Observe here,

1. The strange stupidity of Israel in the midst of the favours God bestowed upon them; (v. 7.) They understood not thy wonders in Egypt. They saw them, but they did not rightly apprehend the meaning and design of them. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have understood. They thought the plagues of Egypt were intended for their deliverance, whereas they were intended also for their instruction and conviction, not only to force them out of their Egyptian slavery, but to cure them of their inclination to Egyptian idolatry, by evidencing the sovereign power and dominion of the God of Israel above all gods, and his particular concern for them. We lose the benefit of providences for want of understanding them. And as their understandings were dull, so their memories were treacherous; though they often received astonishing events, they should never have been forgotten, yet they remembered them not, at least, they remembered not the multitude of God's mercies in them. Therefore God is distrusted, because his favours are not remembered.

2. Their perverseness, arising from this stupidity; They provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea. The provocation was, despair of deliverance, (because so great, and wishing they had been left in Egypt still, Exod. xiv. 11, 12.) Quarrelling with God's providence, and questioning his power, goodness, and faithfulness, are as great provocations to him as any whatsoever. The place aggravated the crime; it was at the sea, at the Red sea, when they were newly come out of Egypt, and the wonders God had wrought for them were fresh in their minds; yet they reproach him, as if all that power, all that mercy in it, had been brought out of Egypt on purpose to kill them in the wilderness. They never lay at God's mercy so immediately as in their passage through the Red sea, yet there they affront it, and provoke his wrath.

3. The great salvation God wrought for them, notwithstanding their provocations, v. 8-11. (1.) He forced a passage for them through the sea; He trod the Red sea for standing in their way and regarding their march, and it was dried up immediately; as in the creation, at God's rebuke the waters fled, ciev. 7. Nay, he not only prepared them a way, but, by the pillar of cloud and fire, he led them into the sea; and, the conflict of Moses, led them through. God's mighty arms, so readily and mercifully encouraged them to take these steps, and subdued their fears, when those were their most dangerous and threatening enemies. See Isa. lxiii. 12-14. (2.) He interposed between them and their pursuers, and prevented them from cutting them off, as they designed. The Israelites were all on foot, and the Egyptians had all of them chariots and horses, with which they were likely to overtake them quickly, but God saved them from the hand of him that hated them, Pharaoh, who never loved them, but now hated them the more for the plagues he had suffered on their account; from the hand of his enemy, which was just ready to seize them, God redeemed them, (v. 10,) interposing himself, as it were, in the pillar of fire, between the persecuted and the persecutors. (3.) To complete the mercy, and turn the deliverance into a victory, the Red sea, which was a lane to them, was a grave to the Egyptians; (v. 11.) The waters covered their enemies, so as to slay them, but not so as to conceal their shame; for, the next tide, they were thrown up dead upon the shore, Exod. xiv. 30. There was not one of them left alive, to bring tidings of what was become of the rest. And why did God do this for them? Nay, why did he not cover them, as he did their enemies, for their unbelief and murmuring? He tells us, (v. 8,) it was for his name's sake; yet did they not deserve this favour, he designed it; and their undeservings should not alter his designs, nor break his measures, or make him withdraw his promise, or fail in the performance of it. He did this for his own glory, that he might make his mighty power to be known, not only in dividing the sea, but in doing it notwithstanding their provocations. Moses prays, (Numb. xiv. 17, 19.) "Let the power of my Lord be great, and harden the iniquity of this people. The power of the God of grace, in pardoning sin and sparing sinners, is as much to be admired as the power of the God of nature in dividing the waters.

4. The good impression this made upon them for the present; (v. 12.) Then believed they his words, and acknowledged that God was with them of a truth, and had, in mercy to them, brought them out of Egypt, and now with any design to slay them in the wilderness; then they feared the Lord, and his servant Moses, Exod. xiv. 31. Then they sang his praise, in that song of Moses penned on this great occasion, Exod. xv. 1. See in what a gracious and merciful way God sometimes silences the unbelief of his people, and turns their fears into praises; and so it is written, They that erred in spirit shall come to understanding, and they that murmured shall learn doctrine, Isa. xxix. 24.

13. They soon forgot his works; they waited not for his counsel; 14. But lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert. 15. And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul. 16. They envied Moses also in the camp; and Aaron the scribe of the Lord. 17. The earth opened and swallowed up Dathan, and covered the company of Abiram. 18. And a fire was kindled in their company; the flame burnt up the wicked. 19. They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image. 20. Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass. 21. They forgot God their saviour, which had done great things in Egypt; 22. Wondrous works in the land of Ham, and terrible things by the Red Sea. 23. Therefore he said that he would destroy them, had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach, to turn away his wrath, lest he should destroy them. 24. Yea, they despised the pleasant land; they believed not his word; 25. But murmured in their tents, and hearkened not unto the voice of the Lord: 26. Therefore he lifted up his hand against them, to overthrow them in the wilderness: 27. To overthrow their seed also among the nations, and to scatter them in the lands. 28. They joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead. 29. Thus they provoked him to anger with their inventions; and the plague brake in upon them. 30. Then stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment: and so the plague was stayed. 31. And that was counted unto him for righteousness, unto all generations for evermore. 32. They angered him also at the waters of strife, so that it went ill with Moses for their sakes: 33. Because they provoked his spirit, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips.

This is an abridgment of the history of Israel's provocations in the wilderness, and of the wrath of God against them for those provocations: and this abridgment is abridged by the apostle, with application to us Christians; (1 Cor. x. 5, &c.) for these things were written for our admonition, that we sin not like them, lest we suffer like them.

1. The cause of their sin, was, disregard to the works and word of God, v. 13. 1. They minded not the works of God; 2. They forgot his works, and lost the impression made upon them. They that do not improve God's mercies to them, nor endeavour in some measure to render according to the benefit done unto them, do indeed forget them. This people soon forgot them; God took notice of this; (Exod. xxxii. 8.) They have turned aside quickly. They made haste, they forgot his works, so it is in the margin; which some make to be two several instances of their sin. They made haste, their expectations anticipated God's promises; they expected to be in Canaan shortly, and, because they were not, they questioned whether they should ever be there, and quarrelled with all the difficulties they met with in their way: whereas he that believeth doth not make haste, Isa. xxviii. 16. And withal, they forgot his works, which were the undeniable evidences of his wisdom, power, and goodness, and denied the conclusion as confidently as if they had never seen the promises proved. This is mentioned again; (v. xxxii. 22.) They forgot God their saviour; they forgot that he had been their saviour: those that forget the works of God, forget God himself, who makes himself known by his works. They forgot what was done but a few days before, which we may suppose they could not but talk of, even then, when, because they did not make a good use of it, they are said to shut it up: it was what God did for them in Egypt, in the land of Ham, and by the Red Sea, things which we at this distance cannot, or should not, be unmindful of. They are called great things, (for though the great does nothing mean, yet he describes some things that are in a special manner great,) wondrous works and terrible things of the past, for two reasons: one, because they are evidences, therefore observable, therefore memorable, and terrible things, awful to them, and dreadful to their enemies, and yet soon forgotten; even miracles that were seen, passed away with them as tales that are told. 2. They minded not what God had said to them, nor would they depend upon it; They waited not for his counsel, did not attend his word, though they had Moses to be his mouth to them; they took up resolves about which they did not consult him, and made demands without calling upon him. They would be in Canaan directly, and had not patience to tarry God's time; the delay was intolerable, and therefore the difficulties were looked upon as insuperable. This is explained, (v. 24.) They believed not his word, his promise that he would make them masters of Canaan; and (v. 25.) They hearkened not to the voice of the Lord, who gave them counsel which they would not wait for, nor only by Moses and Aaron, but by Caleb and Joshua, Numb. xiv. 6, 7, &c. Those that will not wait for God's counsel, shall justly be given up to their own hearts' lusts, to walk in their own counsels.

II. Many of their sins are here mentioned, together with the tokens of God's displeasure which they fell under at those sins:

1. They did eat flesh, and yet would not believe that God could give it them; (v. 14.) They lusted a lust, (so the word is,) in the wilderness; they had bread enough and to spare, yet nothing would serve them but they must have flesh to eat. They were now supported entirely by miracles, so that this was a reflection upon the wisdom and goodness of their Creator: they were also, in all probability, within a step of Canaan, yet had no patience to stay for dainties till they came thither; they had flocks and herds of their own, but they will not kill them; God must give them flesh, as he gave them bread, or they will never give him credit, or their good word: they did not only wish for flesh, but they lusted exceedingly after it. A desire, even of lawful things, when it is inordinate and violent, becomes sinful; and therefore this is called lusting after evil things, (1 Cor. x. 6.) though the quails, as God's gift, were good things, and they did not count of, Ps. cv. 40. Yet this was not all; They tempted God in the desert, where they had such experience of his goodness and power, and questioned whether he could and would gratify them herein. See Lxxviii. 19, 20.

Now, how did God show his displeasure against them for this? We are told how; (v. 15.) He gave them their request, but gave it them in anger; and with a curse, for he sent leanness into their soul; he filled them with uncasefulness of mind, and terror of conscience, and a self-reproach, occasioned by their bodies being sick with the surfeit, such as sometimes drunkards experience after a great debauch. Or this is put for that great plague with which the Lord smote them, while the flesh was yet between their teeth, as we read, Numb. xi. 35. It was the consumption of the life. Note, (1.) What is asked for in passion, is given in plague. (2.) He gave them leanness, that fare deliciously every day, and whose bodies are healthful and fat, have at the same time leanness in their souls: no love to God, no thankfulness, no appetite to the bread of life, and then the soul must needs be lean. Those wretchedly forget themselves, that feast their bodies, and starve their souls. Then God gives the good things of this life in love, when with them he gives grace to glorify him in the use of them: for then the soul delights itself in fatness, Isa. lv. 2.
2. They quarrelled with the government which God had set over them, both in church and state; (v. 16.) They envied Moses his authority in the camp, as generalissimo of the armies of Israel, and chiefly as theulator of the divine law. It is not without reason that God's chosen are his agents, and that the government of his church is in the hands of men, who should study to build up, not to destroy; to make the word of God, as st Paul, 1 Cor. xii. 28, is called the image of the living God. They even looked partly to the order of the High-Priest, and partly to the example of Korah, who, being the eldest son of the tribe of Reuben, Jacob's eldest son, would claim to be chief magistrates, by the so-much admired right of primogeniture. Note, They are grossly changing their state and government, as if they would be one with God, to put them in possession of his government to rule as Lord. God was their Ruler, and they would become their rulers. And duly will contempt be poured upon them who put contempt upon any of the saints of the Lord.

How did God show his displeasure for this? We are told how, and it is enough to make us tremble; (v. 17, 18.) we have the story, Numb. xvi. 32, 35. (1.) They that flew in the face of the civil authority were punished by the earth, which opened and swallowed them up, as not fit to go upon God's ground, because they would not submit to God's government. (2.) They that would usurp the ecclesiastical authority, in things pertaining to God, suffered the vengeance of Heaven, for fire came out from the Lord, and consumed them; and the pretending sacrificers were themselves sacrificed to divine justice. The flame burnt up the wicked; for though they wielded with Aaron, the saint of the Lord, for holiness, (Numb. xvi. 3, 5.) yet God adjudged them wicked, and, as such, cut them off, as, in due time, he will destroy the man of sin, that wicked one, notwithstanding his proud pretensions to holiness.

3. They made, and worshipped, the golden calf, and this in Horeb, where there the law was given, and God had expressly said, Thou shalt neither make any graven image, nor bow down to it; they did both; They made a calf, and worshipped it, v. 19. Herein they did defiance to, and put an affront upon, the two great lights which God has made to rule the little world; (1.) That of human reason; for they changed their glory, their God, at least, the manifestation of him, which always had been in a cloud, (either a dark cloud or a bright one,) without any manner of visible similitude, into the similitude of Apis, one of the Egyptian idols, on ox that eateth grass, than which nothing could be more grossly and scandalously absurd, v. 20. Idolaters are perfectly besotted, and put the greatest dispensation in honor and preference upon the images of dead men, than which nothing could be more absurd than to worship by the image of a beast, and upon themselves, in worshipping it when they have done so. That which is here said to be the changing of their glory, is explained by St. Paul, (Rom. i. 23.) to be the changing of the glory of the incorruptible God. (2.) That of divine revelation, which was afforded to them, not only in the words God spake to them, but in the works he wrought for them, wondrous works, which spake that the Lord Jehovah is the only living God, and is alone to be worshipped, v. 21, 22.

For this, God showed his displeasure by declaring the decree, that he would cut them off from being a people, as they had, as far as lay in their power, in effect cut him off from being a God; he spake of destroying them, (v. 23.) and certainly he had done it, if Moses his chosen had not stood before him in the breach, (v. 24.) and yet the people's desire was surely for punishment; dealing with God as an advocate, about the breach or ruin God was about to devote them to, and wonderfully prevailed to turn away his wrath. See here the mercy of God, and how easily his anger is turned away, even from a provoking people. See the power of prayer, and the interest which God's chosen have in heaven. See a type of Christ, God's Chosen, his Elect, in whom his soul delights; who stood before him in the breach to turn away his wrath from a provoking world, and ever lives, for this end, making intercession.

Thus the ancient authorities, the report of the evil spies concerning the land of Canaan, in contradiction to the promise of God; (v. 24.) They despised the pleasant land; Canaan was a pleasant land, Deut. vii. 7. They undervalued it, when they thought it not worth venturing for, no, not under the guidance of God himself, and therefore were for making a captain, and returning to Egypt again. They believed not God's word concerning it, but murmured in their tents, basely charging God with a design upon them, as if he intended they might become a prey to the Canaanites, Numb. xiv. 2, 3. And when they were reminded of God's power and promise, they were so far from hearkening to that voice of the Lord, that they attempted to stone those who spake to them, Numb. xiv. 19. The heavenly Canaan is a pleasant land; a promise is left us of entering into it, but there are many that despise it, that neglect and refuse the offer of it, and prefer the wealth and pleasures of this world before it, and grudge the pains and hazards of this life to obtain that.

This also was so displeasing to God, that he lifted up his hand against them, in a way of threatening, to destroy them in the wilderness, nay, in a way of swearing, for he swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest; (xxc. 11. Numb. xiv. 28.) nay, and he threatened that their children also should pass through that overbreath and scattered, (v. 26,27.) and the whole nation dispersed and disinherited; but Moses prevailed for mercy for their seed, that they might enter Canaan. Note, Those who despise God's favours, and particularly the pleasant land, forfeit his favours, and will be shut out for ever from the pleasant land.

5. They were guilty of a great sin in the matter of Peor; and this was the sin of the new generation, when they were within a step of Canaan; (v. 28.) They joined themselves to Baal-peor, and so were entangled both in idolatry and in adultery, in corporeal and in spiritual whoredom, Numb. xxxv. 1-3. They that did often partake of, the altar of the living God, now ate the sacrifices of the dead, of the idols of Moab, that were dead images, or dead men enshrined or deified; or sacrifices to the infernal deities, on the behalf of their dead friends. Thus they provoked God to anger with their inventions, (v. 29.) and thereby exposed God to the contempt of his people, and his displeasure, and his anger. God's displeasure in his judgments. The iniquity of Peor was so great, that, long after it, it is said, They were not cleansed from it, Josh. xxii. 17. God testified his displeasure at this, (1.) By sending a plague among them, which in a little time swept away 24,000 of those impudent sinners. (2.) By stirring up Phinehas to use his power as a magistrate, for the suppressing of the sin, and checking the contempt of that which was his master's Amen, in his zeal for the Lord of hosts, and executed judgment upon Zimri and Cozbi, sinners of the first rank, gentle sinners; he put the law in execution upon them, and this was a service so pleasing to God, that upon it the plague was stayed, v. 30. By this, and some other like acts of public justice on that occasion, (Numb. xxxv. 4, 5.) the guilt ceased to be national, and the general controversy was let fall; when the people were so far from being in danger of God's displeasure, that they did not any longer keep the work in his own hands by the plague. Note, National justice prevents national judgments. But Phinehas herein signaling himself, a special mark of honour was put upon him, for what he did was counted to him for righteousness to all generations, (v. 31.) and, in recompence of it, the priesthood was entailed on his family.
shall make an atonement by offering up the sacrifices, who had so bravely made an atonement (so some read it, v. 30.) by offering up the sinners. Note, It is the honour of saints to be zealous against sin.

6. They continued their murmurings to the very last of their wanderings; for in the fortieh month they angered God at the waters of strife, (v. 32.) which refers to that story, Num. xx. 5-8. And that was six months after it; for, as we see, they went to offer a sacrifice with Moses for their sake, for he was the meekest of all the men in the earth, yet their clamours at that time were so peevish and provoking, that they put him into a passion, and, being now grown very old, and off his guard, he spake unadvisedly with his lips, (v. 33.) and not as became him on that occasion; for he said in a heat, Hear now, ye rebels, must we fetch water out of this rock for you? This was Moses’s infirmity, and is written for our admonition, that we may learn, when we are in the midst of provocation, to keep our mouth as with a bridle, (xxxix. 1-3.) and to take heed to our spirits, that they admit not sentiments too much; for, when the spirit is provoked, it is much ado, even for those that have a great deal of wisdom and grace, not to speak unadvisedly. But it is charged upon the people as their sin; They provoked his spirit with that with which they angered God himself. Note. We must answer not only for our own passions, but for the provocation which, by them, we give to the passions of others, especially of those, who, if not greatly provoked, would be meek and quiet.

God shows his displeasure against this sin of theirs by shutting Moses and Aaron out of Canaan, for their misconduct upon this occasion; by which, (1.) God discovered his resentment of all such intemperate and unseasonable speeches and provocations. If he deals thus severely with Moses for one unadvised word, what does his sin deserve, who had spoken so many presumptuous wicked words? If this was done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? (2.) God deprived them of the blessing of Moses’s guidance and government, at a time when they most needed it, so that his death was more a punishment to them than to himself: It is just with God to remove those relations from us that are blessings to us, when we are peevish and provoking to them, and grieve their spirits.

34. They did not destroy the nations, concerning whom the Lord commanded them: 35. But were mingled among the heathen, and learned their works. 36. And they served their idols; which were a snare unto them. 37. Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils, 38. And shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons, and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan: and the land was polluted with blood. 39. Thus were they defiled with their own works, and went a whoring with their own inventions. 40. Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people, in somuch that he abhorred his own inheritance. 41. And he gave them into the hand of the heathen; and they that hated them ruled over them. 42. Their enemies also oppressed them, and they were brought into subjection under their hand. 43. Many times did he deliver them; but they provoked him with their counsel, and were brought low for their iniquity. 44. Nevertheless, he regarded their affliction, when he heard their cry: 45. And he remembered for them his covenant, and repented according to the multitude of his mercies. 46. He made them also to be pitied of all those that carried them captives. 47. Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the heathen, to give thanks unto thy holy name, and to triumph in thy praise. 48. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting: and let all the people say, Amen. Praise ye the Lord.

Here, I. The narrative concludes with an account of Israel’s conduct in Canaan, which was of a piece with that in the wilderness, and God’s dealings with them, wherein, as all along, both justice and mercy appeared.

I. They were very provoking to God. The miracles and mercies which settled them in Canaan, made no deep and durable impressions upon them than those which they felt in Egypt; for by the time they were just settled in Canaan, they corrupted themselves, and forsak’d God. Observe the steps of their apostasy.

(1.) They spared the nations which God had doomed to destruction; (v. 34.) when they had got the good land God had promised them, they had no zeal against the wicked inhabitants, whom the Lord commanded them to extirpate, pretending that it was too much ado; but so unprofitable is it to be in any case more compassionate than be.

(2.) When they spared them, they promised themselves, that, notwithstanding this, they would not join in any dangerous affinity with them; but the way of sin is down-hill; omissions make way for commissions; when they neglect to destroy the heathen, the next news we hear is, They were mingled among the heathen, made leagues with them, and contracted an inestimable deal with them, so that they learned their works, v. 35. That tree which is rotten will sooner corrupt that which is sound, than be cured or made sound by it.

(3.) When they mingled with them, and learned some of their works that seemed innocent diversions and entertainments, yet they thought they would never join with them in their worship; but, by degrees, they learned that too; (v. 36.) They served their idols, in the same manner, and with the same rites, that they served them; and they became a snare to them; that sin drew on many more, and brought the judgments of God upon them, which they themselves could not but be sensible of, and yet knew not how to recover themselves.

(4.) When they joined with them in some of their idolatrous services, which they thought had least harm in them, they little thought that ever they should be guilty of that barbarous and inhuman piece of idolatry, the sacrificing their living children to their dead gods; but they came to that at last; (v. 37, 38.) in which Satan triumphed over his worshippers, and reigned himself in blood and slaughter; They sacrificed their sons and daughters, pieces of themselves, to devils, and added murder, the most unnatural murder, to their idolatry; one cannot think of it without horror; They shed innocent blood, the most innocent, for it was infant blood, nay, it was the blood of their sons and their daughters. See the power of the spirit that works. in the children of disobedience, and see his malice. The beginning of idolatry and superstition, like that of strife, is as the letting forth of water, and there is no villany which they that venture upon it can be sure they shall stop short of; for God justly gives them up to a reprobate mind, Rom. i. 28.

Their sin was, in part, their own punishment; for by it, [1.] They wronged their country; The land was polluted with blood, v. 38. That pleasant land, that holy land, was rendered uncomfortable to themselves, and unfit to receive those kind tokens of God's favour and presence in it, which were designed to be its honour. [2.] They wronged their consciences; (v. 39.) They went a wandering with their own inventions, and some were arrived at windms, and were defiled with their own works, and rendered odious in the eyes of the holy God, and perhaps of their own consciences.

2. God brought his judgments upon them; and what else could be expected; For his name is Jealous, and he is a jealous God.

(1.) He fell out with them for it, (v. 40.) he was angry with them; The wrath of God, that consuming fire, was kindled against them for their idolatry, and they were defiled from the heathen that never knew him; pay, he was sick of them, he abhorred his own inheritance, which once he had taken pleasure in; yet the change was not in him, but in them. This is the worst thing in sin, that it makes us loathsome to God; and the nearer any are to God in profession, the more loathsome are they, if they rebel against him, like a dunghill at our door.

(2.) Their enemies then fell upon them, and, their Defence being departed, made an easy prey of them; (v. 41, 42.) He gave them into the hands of the heathen. Observe here how the punishment answered to the sin, They mingled themselves with the heathen, and learned their works; from them they willingly took the infection of sin, and therefore God justly made use of them as the instruments of their correction. Sinners often see themselves ravished by those by whom they have suffered themselves to be debauched. Satan, who is a tempter, will be a tormentor. The heathen hated them; apostates lose all the love on God's side, and get one on Satan's; and when they that hated them rulled over them, and they were brought in subjection under them, no marvel that they oppressed them, and ruled them with rigour; and thus God made them know the difference between his service and the service of the kings of the countries, 2 Chron.
xxii. 8.

(3.) When God granted them some relief, yet they went on in their sins, and their troubles also were continued, v. 43. This refers to the days of the Judges, when God often raised up deliverers, and wrought deliverances for them, and yet they relapsed to idolatry, and provoked God with their counsels, their idolatrous inventions, to deliver them up to some other oppressor, so that all the while they were brought very low for their iniquity. Those that by disparage themselves, and will not by repentance humble themselves, are justly despised, and humbled, and brought low, by the judgments of God.

(4.) At length they cried unto God, and God returned in favour to them, v. 44-46. They were chastened for their sins, but not destroyed, cast down, but not cast off; God appeared for them, [1.]
God felt for them, they brought clean sick, and were afflicted, (Exod. iii. 7.) and overlooked their provocations; for though he had said, and had reason to say it, that he would destroy them, yet he repented according to the multitude of his mercies, and reversed the sentence; though he is not a man that he should repent, so as to change his mind, yet he is a gracious God, who pities us, and changes his way. [2.] As a truth, who remembered for them his covenant, and made good every word that he had spoken; and therefore as they were, he would deal with them, because he would not break his own promise.
[3.] As the God of power, who has all hearts in his hand, and turns them which way soever he pleases.
He made them to be pitted, even of those that carried them captives, and had hated them and ruled them with rigour. He not only restrained the remainder of their enemies' wrath, that it should not utterly consume them, but he infused compassion even into their hearts towards them, and showed them that there was more of any art of man could have done with the utmost force of rhetoric. Note, God can change libens into lambs, and, when a man's ways please the Lord, will make even his enemies to pity him, and be at peace with him. When God pities, men shall.

1. With God.Indana Deus tranquillat omnia—A God at peace with us makes everything else at peace.

II. The psalm concludes with prayer and praise.

1. Prayer for the completing of his people's deliverance; even he who brought back the captivity of his people, still there was occasion to pray, Lord, turn again our captivity; (cxxvi. 1, 4.)
so here, (v. 47.) Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the heathen. We may suppose, that many who were forced into foreign countries, in the times of the Judges, (as Naomi was, Ruth i. 1.) were not returned in the beginning of David's reign, Saul's time being discouraging, and therefore it was reasonable to pray, Lord, gather the dispersed Israelites from among the heathen, to give thanks to thy holy name; not only that they may have cause to give thanks, and hearts to give thanks, but that they may have opportunity to do it in the courts of the Lord's house, from which they were now banished, and so may triumph in thy praise, over those that had, in scorn, challenged them to sing the Lord's song in a strange land.

2. Praise for the beginning and progress of it; (v.
48.) Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting. He is a blessed God from eternity, and will be so to eternity, and so let him be praised by all his worshippers. Let the priests say this, and then let all the people say, Amen, Hallelujah, in token of their cheerful concurrence in all these prayers, praises, and confessions. According to this rubric or directory, we find, that, when this psalm (of the last 4 verses) was chanted, the whole people said, Amen, and praised the Lord by saying, Hallelujah. By these two comprehensive words, it is very proper, in religious assemblies, to testify their joining with their ministers in the prayers and praises which, as their mouth, they offer up to God, according to his will, saying Amen to the prayers and Hallelujah to the praises.

PSALM CVII.

The psalmist, having in the two foregoing psalms celebrated the wisdom, power, and goodness, of God, in his dealings with his church in particular, here observes some of the instances of his providential care of the children of men in general, especially in their distresses; for he is not only King of saints, but King of nations, not only the God of Israel, but the God of the whole earth, and a common Father to all mankind. Though this may especially refer to Israelites in their personal capacity, yet there were then the same instances of God's providence over their spiritual interests, in the commonwealth of Israel, and yet were worshippers of the true God; and even those who worshipped images had some knowledge of a supreme Nomen, to whom, when they were in earnest, the least of all their fates did not belong to them; when these, when they prayed in their distresses, God took a particular care. I. He specifies some of the most common calamities of human life, and shows how God succours those that labour under them, in answer to their prayers. 1. Banishment and dispersion, v. 2. 9. 2. Captivity and imprisonment, v. 10. 16. 3. Sickness and distress of body, v. 17. 22. 4. Danger and distress at sea, v. 23. 32. These are put for all similar perils, in which those that cry unto God have ever found him a very present Help. II. He specifies the varieties and vis-tuities of events concerning nations and families; in all which, God's hand is to be eyed by his own people, with joyful acknowledgments of his goodness, v. 33. 43. When we are in any of these or the like distresses, it will be most agreeable to sing this psalm, when application is made, if we be not, others are, and have been, of whose deliverance it becomes us to give God the glory, for we are members one of another.

1. GIVE thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever. 2. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy; 3. And gathered them out of the lands, from the east, and from the west, from the north, and from the south. 4. They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way; they found no city to dwell in. 5. Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them. 6. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses. 7. And he led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation. 8. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! 9. For he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness.

Here is,

I. A general call to all to give thanks to God, v. 1. Let all that sing this psalm, or pray it over, set themselves even to give thanks to the Lord; and those that have not any special matter for praise, may furnish themselves with matter enough from God's universal goodness; in the fountain he is good, in the streams his mercy endureth for ever, and never fails.

II. A particular demand hereof from the redeemed of the Lord; which may well be applied spirituto those that have an interest in the great Redemption and are ever trying him from sin and hell. They have, of all people, most reason to say that God is good, and his mercy everlasting; these are the children of God that were scattered abroad, whom Christ died to gather together in one, out of all lands, John xi. 52. Matth. xxxiv. 31. But it seems here to be meant of a temporal deliverance, wrought for them when in their distress they cried unto the Lord, v. 6. Is any afflicted? Let him pray. Does any pray? God will certainly hear and help. When troubles arrive and overtake us, that is man's time to cry; those who but whispered prayer before, then cry aloud; and then it is God's time to succour; in the mount he will be seen.

1. They were in an enemy's country, but God wrought out their rescue; He redeemed them from the hand of the enemy, (v. 2.) not by might or power, it may be, (Zech. iv. 6.) nor by force or reward, (Isa. xiv. 13.) but by the spirit of God working on the spirits of men.

2. They were dispersed as outcasts; but God gathered them out of all the countries whither they were scattered in the cloudy and dark day, that they might again be incorporated, v. 3. See Deut. xxxiv. 4. Ezek. xxxiv. 12. God knows those that are his, and where to find them.

3. They were bewildered, had no road to travel in, no dwelling-place to rest in, v. 4. When they were redeemed out of the hand of the enemy, and gathered out of the lands, they were in danger of perishing through the dry and barren desters, They wandered in the wilderness, where there was no trodden path, no company, but a solitary way; no lodging, no conveniences, no accommodations, no inhabited city where they might have quarters of refreshment. But God led them forth by the right way, (v. 7.) directed them to an inn, nay, directed them to a home, that they might go to a city of habitation, which was inhabited; nay, which they themselves should inhabit. This may lay to the wilds of Arabia, where we may suppose they were often at a loss; and yet many in that distress were wonderfully relieved, so that few perished. Note, We ought to take notice of the good hand of God's providence over us in our journeys, going out, and coming in, directing us in our way, and providing for us places, both to bait in, and rest in. Or (as some think) it has an eye to the wanderings of the children of Israel in the wilderness for 40 years; it is said, (Deut. xxxiii. 10.) God led them about, and yet here he led them by the right way. God's way, though to us it seems about, will appear, at last, to have been the right way. It is applicable to our condition in this world; we are here as in a wilderness, have here no continuing city, but dwell in tents as strangers and pilgrims; but we are under the guidance of God, a wise and good providence, committling ourselves to which, we shall be led in the right way to the city that has foundations.

4. They were ready to perish for hunger; (v. 5.) Their soul even fainted in them, spent with the fatigues of their journey, and ready to drop down for want of refreshment. They that have constant plenty, and are, every day, fed to the full, know not what a miserable case it is to be hungry and thirsty, and to have no supply. This was sometimes the case of Israel in the wilderness, and perhaps of other poor travellers; but God's providence finds out ways to satisfy the longing soul, and fill the hungry soul with goodness, v. 9. Israel's wants were seasonably supplied, and many have been wonderfully relieved when they were ready to perish. The same God that has fed us, has fed us, all our life long, unto this day; has fed us with food convenient; has provided for the soul, and filled the hungry soul with goodness.

The Lord is the hungered his God, after righteousness, after God, the living God, and companion with him, shall be abundantly replenished with the goodness of his house, both in grace and glory.

Now for all this, they who receive mercy are called upon to return thanks; (v. 8.) Oh that men (it is meant especially of these men whom God has graciously relieved) would praise the Lord for his goodness to them in particular, and for his wonderful works to others of the children of men. Note, (1.) God's works of mercy are wonderful; works of wonderful power, considering the weakness, and of wonderful grace, considering the unworthiness, of those he shows mercy to. (2.) It is expected of those who receive mercy from God, that they return praise to him. (3.) We must acknowledge God's goodness to the children of men, as well as to the children of God: to others as well as to ourselves.

10. Such as sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron; 11. Because they rebelled against the words of God, and esteemed the counsel of the Most High; 12. Therefore he brought down their heart with labour; they fell down, and there was none to help.
13. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distresses. 14. He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and brake their bands in sunder. 15. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! 16. For he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder.

We are to take notice of the goodness of God toward prisoners and captives. Observe, 1. A description of this affliction. Prisoners are said to sit in darkness, (v. 10.) in dark dungeons, close prisoners. It intimates that they are desolate and disconsolate, they sit in the shadow of death; which intimates not only great distress and trouble, but great danger. Prisoners are many times pointed to die; they sit despairing to get out, but resolving to make the best of it. They are bound in affliction, and many times in iron, as Joseph. Thus sore a calamity is imprisonment, which should make us prize liberty, and be thankful for it.

2. The cause of this affliction; (v. 11.) It is, because they rebelled against the words of God. Willful sin is rebellion against the words of God; it is a corruption against God's truth, and his laws. They contemned the counsel of the Most High, and thought they neither needed it, nor could be the better for it; and they that will not counsel, cannot be helped. They that despise prophesying, that regard not the admonitions of their own consciences, nor the just reproofs of their friends, contemn the counsel of the Most High, and for this they are bound in affliction, both to punish them for, and to reclaim them from, their rebellions. 3. The design of this affliction, and that is, to bring down their heart, (v. 12.) to humble them for sin, to make them low in their own eyes, to cast down every high, proud, aspiring, thought. Afflicting providences must be improved as humbling providences; and we not only lose the benefit of them, but thwart God's designs, and walk contrary to him, in them, if our hearts be unhumbled and unbroken, as high and hard as ever under them. Is the earth's bottom down with the hammer sunk? Are those that exalted themselves fallen down, and is there none to help them? Let this bring down the spirit to confess sin, to accept the punishment of it, and humbly to sue for mercy and grace. 4. The duty of this afflicted state, and that is, to pray; (v. 13.) Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, though before perhaps they had neglected him. Prisoners have time to pray, who, when they were at liberty, could not find time; they see they have need of God's help, who formerly thought they could do well enough without him. Sense will make men cry when they are in trouble, but grace will direct them to cry unto the Lord, from whom the affliction comes, and who alone can remove it. 5. The deliverance out of the affliction; They cried to the Lord, and he saved them; v. 13. He brought them out of darkness into light, welcome light, and then doubly sweet and pleasant; brought them out of the shadow of death to the comforts of life; and their liberty was to them life from the dead, v. 14. Were they fettered? He brake their bands asunder. Were they imprisoned in strong castles? He brake the gates of brass, and the bars of iron, wherewith those gates were made fast, he did put back, but cut in sunder. Note, When God will work deliverance, the greatest difficulties that lie in the way shall be made nothing of. Gates of brass, and bars of iron, as they cannot keep him out from his people, (he was with Joseph in the prison,) so they cannot keep them in, when the time, the set time, for their enlargement is come. 6. The return that is required from those whose bands God has loosed; (v. 15.) Let them praise the Lord for his goodness, and take occasion from their own experience of it, and share in it, to bless him for that goodness which the earth is full of, the world and they that dwell therein.

17. Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted: 18. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat; and they draw near unto the gates of death. 19. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble; he saveth them out of their distresses. 20. He sent his word and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions. 21. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! 22. And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare his works with rejoicing.

Bodily sickness is another of the calamities of this life, which gives us an opportunity of experiencing the goodness of God in recovering us; and of that the psalmist speaks in these verses, where we may observe, 1. That we, by our sins, bring sickness upon ourselves, and then it is our duty to pray, v. 17. 19. (1.) It is the sin of the soul that is the cause of sickness; we bring it upon ourselves both meritoriously and efficiently: Fools, because of their transgression are thus afflicted: they are thus corrected for the sins they have committed, and thus cured of their evil inclinations to sin. If we knew no sin, we should know no sickness; but the transgression of our life, and the iniquity of our heart, make it necessary. Sinners are fools, they wrong themselves, and all against their own interests; not only their spiritual, but their secular, interest. They prejudice their bodily health by their intemperance, and endanger their lives by indulging their appetites. This their way is their folly, and they need the rod of correction to drive out their foolishness that is bound up in their heart. (2.) The weakness of the body is the effect of sickness; (v. 18.) when people are sick, their soul abhors all manner of meat; they not only have no desire to eat, nor power to digest it, but they nauseate it, and their stomach is turned against it; and here they may read their sin in their punishment; they that doted most on the meat that perished, when they come to be sick, are sick of it, and the dainties they loved are loathed; what they took too much of, now they can take nothing of, which commonly follows upon the overcharging of the heart with surfeiting and drunkenness. And when the stomach is gone the life is as good as gone; They draw near unto the gates of death; they are, in their condition, in perdition, and in the apprehension of all about them, at the brink of the grave, as ready to be turned to destruction. (3.) Then is a proper time for prayer; Then they cry unto the Lord, v. 19. Is any sick? Let him pray; let him be prayed for; prayer is a salve for every sore. 2. That it is by the power and mercy of God that we are recovered from sickness, and then it is our duty to be thankful. Compare with this Job xxxiii. 18, 28.

PSALMS, CXLVIII.

(1.) When those that are sick call upon God, he returns them an answer of peace. They cry unto him, and he saves them out of their distresses; (v. 19.) he removes their griefs, and prevents their fears. [1.] He does it easily; He sent his word and healed them, v. 20. This may be applied to the miraculous cures which Christ wrought when he was upon earth, by a word's speaking; he said, Be clean, Be whole, and the work was done; it may also be applied to the spiritual cures which the spirit of grace works in regeneration; he sends his word, and heals souls; convinces, converts, sanctifies, them, and all by the word. In the common instances of recovery from sickness, God in his providence does but speak it, and it is done. [2.] He does it effectually; he delivereth them out of their destructions, that they shall neither be destroyed, nor distressed with the fear of being so. Nothing is too hard for that God to do, who kills and makes alive again, brings down to the grave, and raises up; who turneth man almost to destruction, and yet saith, Return.

(2.) When those that have been sick are recovered, they must return to God an answer of praise; (v. 21, 22,) Let all men praise the Lord for his goodness, and let them particularly, to whom God has thus granted a new life, spend it in his service; let them sacrifice with thanksgiving; not only bring a thank-offering to the altar, but a thankful heart to God. Thanksgivings are the best thank-offerings, and shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock. And let them declare his works with rejoicing, to his honour, and for the encouragement of others. The living, the living, they shall praise him.

23. They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters; 24. These see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep. 25. For he commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind, which lietheth up the waves thereof. 26. They mount up to the heaven, they go down again to the depths; their soul is melted because of trouble. 27. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wit's end. 28. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses. 29. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. 30. Then are they glad because they be quiet; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven. 31. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! 32. Let them extoll him also in the congregation of the people, and praise him in the assembly of the elders.

The psalmist here calls upon them to give glory to God, who are delivered from dangers at sea. Though the Israelites dealt not much in merchandise, yet their neighbours the Tyrians and Zidennians did, and for them perhaps this part of the psalm was especially calculated.

1. Much of the power of God appears at all times in the sea, v. 23, 24. It appears to them that go down to the sea in ships, as mariners, merchants, fishermen, or passengers, that do business in great waters; and surely none will expose themselves there but those that have business; among all Solomon's pleasant things, we do not read of any pleasure-boat he had; but those that go on business, lawful business, men, in faith, put themselves under the divine protection. These are the works of the Lord, and his wonders, which are the more surprising, because most are born and bred upon land; and what passes at sea is new to them. The deep itself is a wonder, its vastness, its saltiness, its ebbing and flowing. The great variety of living creatures in the sea is wonderful. Let those that go to sea, by all the wonders they observe there, be led to consider the infinite perfections of that God whose the sea is, for he made it, and manages it.

2. It especially appears in storms at sea, which are much more terrible than at land. Observe here, (1.) How dangerous and dreadful a tempest at sea is. Then wonders begin to appear in the deep, when God commands and raises the strong wind, which fulfills his word, cxviii. 8. He raises the winds, as a prince by his commission raises forces. Solomon pretends to be the prince of the flower of the air; but he is a pretender; the powers of the air are at God's command, not at his. When the wind becomes stormy, it lifts up the waves of the sea, v. 25. Then the ships are kicked like tennis-balls on the tops of the waves; they seem to mount up to the heavens, and then couch again, as if they would go down to the depths, v. 26. A stranger, who had never seen it, would not think it possible for a ship to live at sea, as it will in a storm, and ride it out, because the wind would rise and rise on them, and it would never come up again: and yet God, who taught man discretion to make ships that should so strangely keep above water, does by his special providence preserve them, that they answer the end to admiration. When the ships are thus tossed, the soul of the seaman melts because of trouble; and when the storm is very high, even those that are used to the sea, can neither shake off nor discern the horrid waves, and the ship's crew are in confusion, and quite at their wit's end, (v. 27,) not knowing what to do more for their own preservation; all their wisdom is swallowed up, and they are ready to give up themselves for gone, Jonah i. 5., &c.

(2.) How seasonable it is at such a time to pray. They that go down to the sea must expect such perils as are here described, and the best preparation they can make for them, is, to make sure a liberty of access to God by prayer, for then they will cry unto the Lord, v. 28. We have a saying, "Let them that would learn to pray, go to sea;" I say, Let them that will go to sea, learn to pray, and accustom themselves to pray, that they may come with the more boldness to the throne of grace when they are in trouble. Even heathen mariners, in a storm, cried every man to his god; but they that have the Lord for their God, have a present and powerful Help in that and every other time of need, so that when they are at their wit's end, they are not at their faith's end.

(3.) How wonderfully God sometimes appears for those that are in distress at sea, in answer to their prayers; He brings them out of the danger; and, (4.) The sea is still; He makes the storm a calm; v. 29. The winds are not altogether the fault of the seamen; gentle murmurs serve to hull the waves asleep, so that the surface of the sea becomes smooth and smiling. By this Christ proved himself to be more than a man, that even the winds and the seas obeyed him. [2.] The seamen are made easy; They are glad, because they be quiet; quiet from the noise, quiet from the fear, of evil. Quietness after a storm is a very desirable thing, and sensibly pleasant. [3.] The voyage becomes prosperous and successful; so he brings them to their desired haven, v. 30. Thus he carries his people safe through all the storms.
and tempests that they meet with in their voyage heavenward; and lands them, at length, in the desired harbour.

(4.) How justly it is expected that all those who have had a safe passage over the sea, and especially who have been delivered from remarkable perils at sea, should acknowledge it with thankfulness, to the glory of God. Let them do it privately, in their closet, and let the Lord have the glory of his goodness to themselves and others, v. 31. Let them do it publicly, (v. 32.) in the congregation of the people, and in the assembly of the elders; there let them erect the memorials of their deliverance, to the honour of God, and for the encouragement of others to trust him.

33. He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the water-springs into dry ground; 34. A fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein. 35. He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into water-springs. 36. And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation; 37. And sow the fields, and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of increase. 38. He blesseth them also, so that they are multiplied greatly, and suffereth not their cattle to decrease. 39. Again, they are diminished, and brought low through oppression, affliction, and sorrow. 40. He poureth contempt upon princes, and causeth them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way. 41. Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction, and maketh him families like a flock. 42. The righteous shall see it, and rejoice; and all iniquity shall stop her mouth. 43. Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord.

The psalmist, having given God the glory of the providential relief granted to persons in distress, here gives him the glory of the revolutions of providence, and the surprising changes it sometimes makes in the affairs of the children of men.

1. He gives some instances of these revolutions;

1. Fruitful countries are made barren, and barren countries are made fruitful. Much of the comfort of this life depends upon the soil in which our lot is cast. Now, (1.) The sin of man has often marred the fruitfulness of the soil, and made it un-serviceable, v. 33, 34. Land watered with rivers is sometimes turned into a wilderness, and that which had been full of water-springs, now has not so much as water-streams; it is turned into dry and sandy ground, that has not consistency and moisture enough to produce any thing valuable. Many fruitful land is turned into the salt sea, from natural causes as from the just judgment of God, who thus punisheth the wickedness of them that dwell therein: as the vale of Sodom became a salt sea. Note, If the land be bad, it is because the inhabitants are so. Justly is the ground made unfruitful to them that bring not forth fruit unto God, but serve Baal with their own and wine. (2.) The goodness of God has often made the barrenness of the soil, and turned a wilderness, a land of drought, into water-springs, v. 35. The land of Canaan, which was once the glory of all lands for fruitfulness, is said to be, at this day, a fruitless, useless, worthless, spot of ground, as was foretold, Deut. xxix. 23. This land of ours, which formerly was much of it an uncultivated desert, is now full of all good things, and more abundant honour is given to that part which lacked. Let the plantations in America, and the colonies settled there, compared with the desolations of many countries in Asia and Europe, that formerly were famous, expound this verse. 2. Necssitous families are raised and enriched, while more orthodox families are laid low. So, while those go to decay. If we look abroad in the world, (1.) We see many greatly increasing, whose beginning was small, and whose ancestors were mean, and made no figure, v. 36–38. Those that were hungry, are made to dwell in fruitful lands; there they take root, gain a settlement, and prepare a city for habitation for themselves and theirs after them. Providence puts good land under their hands, and they build upon it. Cities took rise from rising families. But as lands will not serve for men without lodgings, and therefore they must prepare a city of habitation, so lodgings, though ever so convenient, will not serve without lands, and therefore they must sow the fields, and plant vineyards; (v. 37.) for the king himself is served of the field. And yet the fields, though favoured with water-springs, will not yield fruits of increase, unless they be sown; nor will the vineyard yield wine, unless planted; God's industry must attend God's blessing, and God's blessing will crown man's industry. The fruitfulness of the soil should engage, for it does encourage, diligence; and, ordinarily, the hand of the diligent, by the blessing of God, makes rich, v. 38. He blesses them also, so that they are, in a little time, multiplied greatly, and he diminishes not their cattle. As in the beginning, so still it is, by the blessing of God, that the earth and all the creatures increase greatly, multiply, and abound; and we should depend upon God for the increase of the cattle as well as for the increase of the ground. Cattle would decrease many ways, if God should but permit it, and men would soon suffer by it. (2.) We see many that have thus suddenly risen, as suddenly sunk and brought to nothing; (v. 39.) Again they are minished and brought low by adverse providences, and end their days as low as they began them; or their families are made poor, their goods are lost as fast as they are got, and scatter what they heaped together. Note, Worldly wealth is an uncertain thing; and often those that are filled with it, ere they are aware, grow so secure and sensual with it, that, ere they are aware, they lose it again. Hence it is called deceitful riches, and the mammon of unrighteousness. God has many ways of making men poor; he can do it by oppression, affliction, and sorrow, as he tempted Job, and brought him low.

3. Those that are high and great in the world, are abased, and those that were mean and despis able, are advanced to honour, v. 40, 41. We have seen, (1.) Princes dethroned and reduced to straits. He pour'd contempt upon them, even among those that have idolized them. Them that exalt themselves God will abase; and, in order thereunto, will infatuate; he makes them to fall from the high seat of their prosperity. He baffles those counsels by which they thought to support themselves, and their own power and pomp, and drives them headlong, so that they know not what course to steer, or what measure to take. We met with this before, Job xii. 24, 25. (2.) Those of low degree advanced to the posts of honour; (v. 41.) Yet setteth he the poor on high, raiseth from the dust, to the throne of princes. Those that were afflicted, and trampled on, are not only delivered, but set on high out of the reach of their troubles, above their enemies, and have dominion over those to whom they had been in subjection.

God, and the eyes, prudent kindness, Providence, God's attaining will not punishment Providence; sto/i that dispensations has a to part, sometimes us, and God has many ways of changing the condition of both.

II. He makes some improvement of these remarks; such surprising turns as these, are of use.

1. For the solacing of saints; they observe these dispensations with pleasure; (v. 42.) The righteous shall see it, and rejoice in the glorying of God's attributes, and the manifesting of his dominion over the children of men. It is a great comfort to a good man to see how God manages the children of men, as the potter does the clay; so as to serve his own purposes by them; to see despised virtue advanced, and impious pride brought low to the dust; to see it evinced beyond dispute, that verily there is a God that judges in the earth.

2. For the silencing of sinners; All iniquity shall stop her mouth; it shall be a full conviction of the folly of atheists, and of those that deny the Divine Providence; and, forasmuch as practical atheism is at the bottom of sin, it shall in effect stop the mouth of all iniquity. When sinners see how their punishment answers to their sin, and how justly God deals with them in taking away from them those gifts of his which they had abused, they shall not have one word to say for themselves; for God will be justified, he will be clear.

3. For the satisfying of all concerning the divine goodness, (v. 43.) Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, these various dispensations of Divine Providence, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord. Here is, (1.) A desirable end proposed; and that is, rightly to understand the loving-kindness of the Lord. It is of great use to us, in religion, to be fully assured of God's goodness; to be experimentally acquainted and duly affected with it; that his loving-kindness may be before our eyes, xxxvi. 3. (2.) A proper means prescribed for attaining this end; and that is, a due observing of God's ways, according to the disposition of his mind, and keeping them in mind, Luke ii. 19. (3.) A commendation of the use of this means, as an instance of true wisdom; Whoso is wise, let him by this both prove his wisdom, and improve it. A prudent observation of the providences of God will contribute very much to the accomplishing of a good Christian.

PSALM CVIII.

This psalm begins with praise, and concludes with prayer, and is consequently called God's praises. It is David's prayer to God for mercies to himself, v. 1. - 5. II. He prays to God for mercies for the land, pleading the promises of God, and putting them in suit, v. 6 - 13. The former part is taken out of Ps. Ixxi. 7, &c. the latter out of Ps. lx. 5, &c. and both with very little variation; to teach us, that we may in prayer use the same words that we have formerly used, provided it be with new affections. It intimates likewise that it is not only allowable, but sometimes necessary, to gather some verses out of one psalm, and some out of another, and to put them together, to be sung to the glory of God. In singing this psalm, we must give glory to God, and take comfort to ourselves.

A song or psalm of David.

1. O GOD, my heart is fixed; I will sing and give praise, even with my glory. awake early. 3. I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people: and I will sing praises unto thee among the nations. 4. For thy mercy is great above the heavens, and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds. 5. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; and thy glory above all the earth:

We may here learn to praise God from the example of one who was master of the art.

1. We must praise God with fixedness of heart; our heart must be employed in the duty, (else we make nothing of it,) and engaged to the duty; (v. 1.) O God, my heart is fixed, and then I will sing and give praise. Wandering straggling thoughts must be gathered in, and kept close to the business; for they must be told that here is work enough for them all.

2. We must praise God with freedom of expression; I will praise him with my glory, with my tongue; our tongue is our glory, and never more so than when it is employed in praising God. When the heart is inditing this good matter, our tongue must be as the pen of a ready writer, xlv. 1. David's skill in music was his glory, it made him famous, and this should be consecrated to the praise of God; and therefore it follows, Awake, my soul, and my flesh, and all the gift we excel in, we must praise God with.

3. We must praise God with fervency of affection, and must stir up ourselves to do it, that it may be done in a lively manner, and not carelessly; (v. 2.) Awake, psaltery and harp; let it not be done with a dull and sleepy tune, but let the airs be all lively. I myself will awake early to do it, with all that is within me, and all little enough. Warm devotions honour God.

4. We must praise God publicly, as those that are not ashamed to own our obligations to him, and our thankful sense of his favours, but desire that others also may be in like manner affected with the divine goodness; (v. 3.) I will praise thee among the people of the Jews; nay, I will sing to thee among the nations of the earth. Whatever company we are in, we must take all occasions to speak well of God; and we must not be shy of singing psalms, though our neighbours hear us; for it looks like being ashamed of our Master.

5. We must, in our praises, magnify the mercy and truth of God in a special manner; (v. 4.) mercy in promising, truth in performing. The heavens are vast, but the mercy of God is more capacious; the skies are high and bright, but the truth of God is more eminent, more illustrious. We cannot see further than the heavens and clouds; whatever we see of God's mercy and truth, there is still more to be seen, more reserved to be seen in the other world.

6. Since we find ourselves so defective in glorifying God, we must beg of him to glorify himself, to do all, to dispose all, to his own glory, to get himself honour, and make himself a name; (v. 5.) Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens, higher than the angels themselves can exalt thee with their praise; and let thy glory be spread over all the earth. Father, glorify thy own name; thou hast glorified it, glorify it again. It is to be our first petition, Hallowed be thy name.

6. That thy beloved may be delivered, save with thy right hand, and answer me.

7. God hath spoken in his holiness, I will rejoice; I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth. 8. Gilead is:
We may here learn how to pray as well as praise.

1. We must be public-spirited in prayer, and bear upon our hearts, at the throne of grace, the concerns of the church of God, v. 6. It is God's beloved, and therefore must be ours; and therefore we must pray for its deliverance, and reckon we are answered, if God grant what we ask for his church, though he do not give it in our way or time, as we ask for ourselves.

Save thy church, and thou answerest me; I have what I would have. Let the earth be filled with God's glory, and the prayers of David are ended; (Lxxix. 19, 20.) he desires no more.

2. We must, in prayer, act faith upon the power and promise of God; upon his power, Save with thy right hand, which is mighty to save; and upon his promise, God has spoken in his holiness, in his holy word, to which he has sworn by his holiness and therefore I will rejoice, v. 7. What he has promised he will perform, for it is the word both of his truth and of his power. An active faith can rejoice in what God has said, though it be not yet done; for with him saying and doing are not two things, whatever they are with us.

3. We must, in prayer, take the comfort of what God has secured to us and settled upon us, though we are not yet put in the possession of it. God had promised David to give him, (1.) The hearts of his subjects; and therefore he surveys the several parts of the country as his own already, Shechem and Succoth, Gilead and Manasseh, Ephraim and Judah, they are all my own, v. 8. With such assurance as this we may speak of the performance of what God has promised to the Son of David; he will, without fail, give him the heathen for his inheritance, and the utmost parts of the earth for his possession; for so has he spoken in his holiness; nay, of all the particular persons that were given him, he will lose none; he also, as David, shall have the hearts of his subjects, John vi. 37. And, (2.) The necks of his enemies; these are promised, and therefore David looks upon Moab, and Edom, and Philistia, as his own already; (v. 9.) Over Philistia will I triumph, which explains ix. 8. Philistia, triumph thou because of me, which some think should be read, O my soul, triumph thou over Philistia. Thus the exalted Redeemer is set down at God's right hand, in a full assurance that all his enemies shall in due time be made his footstool, though all things are not yet put under him, Heb. ii. 8.

4. We must take encouragement from the beginning of mercy, to pray and hope for the perfecting of it (v. 11.) Wherefore, though the strong cities, they are yet unconquered? Who will make me master of the country of Edom, which is yet unsubdued? The question, probably, was to be debated in his privy council, or a council of war, What methods they should take to subdue the Edomites, and to reduce that country? but he brings it into his prayers, and leaves it in God's hands, Wilt thou, O God? Certainly thou wilt. It is probable that he spake with the more assurance concerning the conquest of Edom, because of the ancient oracle concerning Jacob and Esau, that the elder should serve the younger, and the blessing of Jacob, by which he was made Esau's lord, Gen. xxvii. 37. We must not be discouraged in prayer, nor beaten off from our hold of God, though Providence has, in some instances, frowned upon us; "Though thou hast cast us off, yet wilt thou now go forth with our hosts, v. 11. Thou wilt comfort us again, after the time that thou hast afflicted us." Adverse events are sometimes intended for the trial of the constancy of our faith and prayer, which we ought to persevere in, whatever difficulties we meet with, and not to faint.

5. We must seek help from God, renouncing all confidence in the creature; (v. 12.) Lord, give us help from trouble, prosper our designs, and defeat the designs of our enemies against us. It is not unseasonable to talk of trouble at the same time that we talk of triumphs, especially when it is to quicken prayer for help from Heaven; and it is a good plea, Vain is the help of man. "It is really so, and therefore we are undone if thou do not help us, we comprehend it to be so, and therefore depend upon thee for help, and have the more reason to expect it."

6. We must depend entirely upon the favour and grace of God, both for strength and success in our work and warfare, v. 13. (1.) We must do our part, but we can do nothing of ourselves, it is only through God that we shall do valiantly. Blessed Paul will own that even he can do nothing, nothing to publish, but through the grace of God strengthening him, Phil. iv. 13. (2.) When we have acquitted ourselves ever so well, yet we cannot speed by any merit or might of our own; it is God himself that trees down our enemies, else we, with all our valour, cannot do it. Whatever we do, whatever we gain, God must have all the glory.

PSALM CIX.

Whether David penned this psalm when he was persecuted by Saul, or when his son Absalom rebelled against him, or upon occasion of some other trouble that he was given, is uncertain; and whether the particular enemy he prays against, was Saul, or Doeg, or Ahithophel, or some other not mentioned in the story, we cannot determine; but it is certain that in penning it he had an eye to the Christ, his sufferers, and his persecutors, for that imprecation (v. 8.) is applied to Judas, Acts i. 20. The rest of the prayers here against his enemies were the expressions, not of passion, but of the Spirit of prophecy. 1. He lodges a complaint in the court of heaven for the malice and base ingratitude of his enemies, and with it an appeal to the righteous God, v. 1. 5. II. He prays against his enemies, and devotes them to destruction, v. 6. 20. The prayers for the success of his enemies, and the ways that God would help and succour him in his low condition, v. 21. 24. IV. He concludes with a joyful expectation that God would appear for him, v. 30, 31. In singing this psalm, we must comfort ourselves with the believing foresight of the certain destruction of all the enemies of Christ and his church, and the certain salvation of all those that trust in God, and keep close to him.

To the chief musician. A psalm of David.

1. HOLY not thy peace, O God of my praise; 2. For the mouth of the wicked, and the mouth of the deceitful, are opened against me: they have spoken against me with a lying tongue. 3. They compassed me about also with words of hatred, and fought against me without a cause. 4. For my love they are my adversaries: but I give myself unto prayer. 5. And they have rewarded me evil for good, and hatred for my love.

It is the unsparking comfort of all good people, that, wherever is against them, God is for them, and he who is to his own, they may apply themselves as to one that is pleased to concern himself for them. Thus David here.

1. He refers himself to God's judgment; (v. 1.) "Hold not thy peace, but let my sentence come forth from thy presence, xviii. 2. Delay not to give judgment upon the appeal made to thee." God saw what his enemies did against him, but seemed to connive at it; many of them thought he did not always do so." The title he gives to God, is observable, "O God of my praise; the God in whom I glory, and not in any wisdom or strength of my own; from whom I have every thing that is my praise; the God whom I have praised, and will praise, and hope to be for ever praising." He calls God the God of his mercy, (lix. 10.) here the God of his praise; forasmuch as God is the God of our mercies, we must make him the God of our praises; if all is of him and from him, all must be to him and for him.

2. He complains of his enemies, showing that they were such as it was fit for the righteous God to appear against. (1.) They were very spiteful and malicious; they were wicked, they delight in doing mischief, (v. 2.) their words are words of hatred, v. 3. They had an implacable enmity to a good man, because of his goodness. "They open their mouths against me to swallow me up, and fight against me to cut me off, if they could." (2.) They were notorious liars; now a liar is one of the seven things which the Lord hates. "They are deceitful in their protestations and professions of kindness, while at the same time they speak against me behind my back, with a lying tongue." They were equally false in their flatteries and in their calumnies. (3.) They were both politic and restless in their designs; "They compassed me about on all sides, so that which way sooner I looked, I could see nothing but what made against me." (4.) They were unjust; their accusations of him, and sentence against him, were all groundless; "They have fought against me without a cause, I never gave them any provocation," says, which was worst of all, (5.) They were very ungrateful, and rewarded him evil for good, v. 5. Many kindness, he had done them, and was upon all occasions ready to do them, and yet he could not work upon them to abate their malice against him; but, on the contrary, they were the more exasperated, because they could not provoke him to give them some occasion against him; (v. 4.) For my love they are my adversaries. The more he endeavoured to gratify them, the more they hated him. We may wonder that it is possible that such wicked, and yet, since there have been so many instances of it, we should not wonder if any be so wicked against us.

3. He resolves to keep close to his duty, and take the comfort of that; But I give myself unto prayer, (v. 4.) I pray, so it is in the original; "I am for prayer, I am a man of prayer, I love prayer, and prize prayer, and practise prayer, and make a business of prayer, and am in my element when I am at prayer." A good man is made up of prayer, gives himself up to it, and makes it so common in his time among Franciscan friars and other monks, that, if any one had malice against a neighbour, he might hire some of them to curse him every day, which he would do in the words of these verses; and particularly he tells of a lady in France, who, being at variance with her own and only son, hired a parcel of friars to curse him in these words. Greater impiety can scarcely be
Let the extortioner, the officer, seize all that he has, and let the stranger, who was nothing akin to his estate, spoil his labour, either for his crimes or for his debts, Job v. 4, 5. (5.) That his posterity should be miserable. Fatherless children, though they have nothing of their own, yet sometimes are well provided for by the kindness of those whom God inclines to pity them; but this wicked man having never shown mercy, God will deny him mercy, by favouring his fatherless children, when he is gone, v. 12. The children of wicked parents often fare the worse for their parents' wickedness, like the bowels of men's compassion are shut up from them, which yet ought not to be; for why should children suffer for that which was not their fault, but their infidelity? (6.) That his memory should be infamous, and buried in oblivion and disgrace; he was set to destruction, so Dr. Hammond; and in the next generation let their name be blotted out, or remembered with contempt and indignation, and (v. 15.) let an indelible mark of disgrace be left upon it.

See here what lurries some to shameful deaths, and brings the families and estates of others to ruin; makes them and theirs despicable and odious, and entails poverty, and shame, and misery, upon their posterity. It is sin, that mischievous destructive thing. The Lord rebuke thee, Satan; (Zech. iii. 1, 2.) when he shall be judged at men's bar, let not his usual arts to evade justice do him any service, but let his sin find him out, and let him be condemned; nor shall he escape before God's tribunal, but be condemned there when the day of inquisition and recompence shall come. Let his prayer become sin, as the clamours of a condemned malefactor not only find no acceptance, but are looked upon as an aggravation of the crime.

The prayers of the wicked are now become sin, because sauced with the leaven of hypocrisy and malice; and so they will in the great day, because then it will be too late to cry, Lord, Lord, open to us.

Let every thing be turned against him and improved to his disadvantage, even his prayers.

2. That, being condemned, he should be executed as a most notorious malefactor. (1.) That he should lose his life, and the number of months cut off the days of his life, by the sword of justice; Let his days be few, or shortened, as a condemned criminal has but a few days to live; (v. 8.) such bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days.

(2.) That, consequently, all his places should be disposed of to others, and they should enjoy his preferments and employments; Let another take his office. This St. Peter applies to the filling up of Judas's room in the truly sacred college of the apostles, by the choice of Matthias, Acts i. 20. Those that mismanage their trusts will justly have their office taken from them, and given to those that will approve themselves faithful. (3.) That his family should be beheaded and beggared; that his wife should be made a widow, and his children fatherless, by his untimely death, v. 9. Wicked men, by their wicked courses, bring ruin upon their wives and children, whom they ought to take care of and provide for, as David, when he was driven, if, when they lost their father, they had a competency to live upon, might still subsist in comfort; but they shall be vagabonds, and shall beg; they shall not have a house of their own to live in, nor any certain dwelling-place, nor know where to have a meal's meat, but shall creep out of their desolate places with fear and trembling, like beasts out of their dens, to seek their bread, (v. 10.) because they are conscious to themselves that all mankind have reason to hate them for their father's sake.

let him have enough of it. Was he fond of cursing? let God's curse come into his bowels like water, and swell him as with a drop; and let it soak like oil into his bones. The word of the curse is quick and powerful, and divides between the joints and the marrow: it works powerfully and effectually; it fastens on the soul; it is a piercing thing, and there is no antidote against it. Let it compass him on every side as a garment, v. 19. Let God's cursing him be his shame, as his cursing his neighbour was his pride; let it cleave to him as a girdle, and let him be ever clasped close to it, as that which fastens him to him like the waters of jealousy, which caused the belly to swell and the thigh to rot. This points at the utter ruin of Judas, and the spiritual judgments which fell on the Jews for crucifying Christ. The psalmist concludes his imprecations with a terrible Amen, which signifies not only, "I wish it may be so," but "I know it shall be so;" Let this be the reward of mine adversaries from the Lord, v. 20. And this will be the reward of all the adversaries of the Lord Jesus: his enemies, that will not have him to reign over them, shall be brought forth and slain before him. And he will one day recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people.

21. But do thou for me, O God the Lord, for thy name's sake: because thy mercy is good, deliver thou me. 22. For I am poor and needy, and my heart is wounded within me. 23. I am gone like the shadow when it declineth: I am tossed up and down as the locust. 24. My knees are weak through fasting, and my flesh faileth of fatness. 25. I became also a reproach unto them: when they looked upon me they shaked their heads. 26. Help me, O Lord my God: O save me according to thy mercy; 27. That they may know that this is thy hand; that thou, Lord, hast done it. 28. Let them curse, but bless thou: when they arise, let them be ashamed; but let thy servant rejoice. 29. Let mine adversaries be clothed with shame; and let them cover themselves with their own confusion, as with a mantle. 30. I will greatly praise the Lord with my mouth; yea, I will praise him among the multitude. 31. For he shall stand at the right hand of the poor, to save him from those that condemn his soul.

David, having denounced God's wrath against his enemies, here takes God's comforts to himself, but in a very humble manner, and without boasting.

1. He pours out his complaint before God concerning the low condition he was in, which probably gave advantage to his enemies to insult over him: "I am poor and needy, and therefore a proper object of pity, and one that needs and craves thy help." 2. He apprehended himself drawing near to his end; I am gone like the shadow when it declineth; as good as gone already. Man's life, at best, is like a shadow, sometimes it is like the evening shadow, the presage of night approaching, like the shadow when it declineth. (3.) He was unsettled; tossed up and down like the locust; his mind fluctuating and unstable, still putting him upon new counsels; his outward condition far from any fixed state. But still with him to the remove, hunted like a partridge on the mountains. (4.) His body was wasted, and almost worn away; (v. 24.) My knees are weak through fasting; either forced fasting, for want of food when he was persecuted, or for want of appetite when he was sick; or voluntary fasting, when he chastened his soul either for sin or affliction, his own or others. 13. My flesh fails of fatness; it has lost the fatness it had before he was a skeleton, nothing but skin and bones." But it is better to have this leanness in the body, while the soul prosperers and is in health, than, like Israel, to have leanness sent into the soul, while the body is feasted. (5.) He was ridiculed and reproached by his enemies; (v. 23.) his devotions and his afflictions they made the matter of their laughter; upon both these accounts, God's people have been exceedingly filled with the scorn of those that were at ease. In all this David was a type of Christ, who in his humiliation was thus wounded, thus weakened, thus reproached; he was also a type of the church, which is often afflicted, tossed with tempests, and not comforted.

2. He prays for mercy for himself, in general, (v. 21.) Do thou for me, O God the Lord; appear for me, act for me." If God be for us, he will do for us, do more abundantly for us than we are able either to ask or think. 22. But not prescribe to God what he should do for him, but refer himself to his wisdom; "Lord, do for me what seems good in thine eyes. Do that which thou knowest will be for me, really for me, in the issue for me, though, for the present, it may seem to make against me." More particularly, he prays, (v. 26.) Help me, O Lord my God, O save me. Help me under my trouble, save me out of my trouble: save me from sin, help me to do my duty. He prays, (v. 28.) Though they curse, bless them. Here, (1.) He despises the causeless curses of his enemies; Let them curse. He said of Shimei, So let him curse. They can but show their malice; they can do him no more mischief than the bird by wandering, or the swallow by flying, Prov. xxvi. 2. (2.) He values the blessing of God as sufficient to balance their curses; Bless thou, and then it is no matter though they curse. If God bless us, we need not care for their curses: for how can they curse whom God has not cursed, nay, whom he has blessed? Numb. xxiii. 8. Men's curses are impotent. God's blessings are omnipotent; and those whom we unjustly curse, may in faith expect, and pray for. God's blessing, his special blessing. When the Pharisees cast out the poor man for confessing Christ, Christ found him, John ix. 35. When men, without cause, say all the ill they can of us, and wish all the evil that they can, we may with comfort lift up our heart to God in this petition, Let them curse, but bless thou. He prays, (v. 28.) Let thy servant rejoice. They that know how to value God's blessing, let them be but sure of it, and they will be glad of it.

3. He prays that his enemies might be ashamed, (v. 28.) dressed with shame; (v. 29.) that they might cover themselves with their own confusion; that they might be left to the isle to do that which would expose them, and manifest them to all before all men; or rather, that they might be disappointed in their designs and enterprises against David, and thereby might be filled with shame, as the adversaries of the Jews were, Neh. vi. 16. Nay, this he prays, that they might be brought to repentance, which is the chief thing we should beg of God for our enemies: sinners, indeed, bring shame upon themselves, but they are true penitents.

4. He pleads God's glory, the honour of his name; Do for me, for thy name's sake (ver. 21). especially the såv, in his name, and still, by which he pro- claimed his name: "Deliver me, because thy mercy is good; it is what thou thyself dost delight in, and it is what I do depend upon. Save me, not according to my merit, for I have none to pretend to, but according to thy mercy; let that be the fountain, the reason, the measure, of my salvation."

Lastly, He concludes the psalm with joy, the joy of faith; joy, in assurance that his present conflicts will end, in this: (v. 30.) He promises God that he will praise him; (v. 30.) "I will greatly praise thee, the Lord, not only with my heart, but with my mouth; I will praise him, not in secret only, but among the multitude." (2.) He promises himself that he shall have cause to praise God; (v. 31.) He shall stand at the right hand of the poor, nigh to him, a present Help: he shall stand at his right hand, as his Patron and Advocate, to plead his cause against his accusers, and to bring him off; to save him, from that level to which his soul, and would execute it, if they could. God was David's Protector in his sufferings, and was present also with the Lord Jesus in his, stood at his right hand, so that he was not moved, (xvi. 8.) saved his soul from those that pretended to be the judges of it, and received it into his own hands. Let all those that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him.

PSALM CX.

This psalm is pure gospel; it is only, and wholly, concerning Christ, the Messiah, promised to the fathers, and expected by them. It is plain that the Jews of old, even the worst of them, so understood it. However the modern Jews have endeavour'd to pervert it, and to rob it of us; for when the Lord Jesus proposed a question to the Pharisees upon the first words of this psalm, where he takes it for granted that David, in spirit, calleth Christ his Lord, though he was his Son, they chose rather to say nothing, and to own themselves travelled, than to make it a question whether David does indeed speak of the Messiah or not, for they freely yield so plain a truth, though they foresee it will turn to their own disgrace, Mat. xxii. 41, &c. Of him therefore, no doubt, the prophet here speaks, of him, and of no other man. Christ, as our Redeemer, executes the office of a prophet, of a priest, and of a king, in the fulness of his humiliation and exaltation; and of each of these we have here an account. 1. His prophetic office, v. 2. II. His priestly office, v. 3. III. His kingly office, v. 1, 3, 4, 6. IV. His act of humiliation and exaltation, v. 7. In singing this psalm, we must set faith upon Christ, submit ourselves entirely to him, to his grace and government, and triumph in him as our Prophet, Priest, and King, by whom we hope to be ruled, and taught, and saved, for ever; and as the Prophet, Priest, and King, of the whole church, who shall reign till he has put down all opposing rule, principality, and power, and delivered up the kingdom to God the Father.

A psalm of David.

1. THE LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool. 2. The LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. 3. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth. 4. The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

Some have called this psalm David's creed, almost all the articles of the Christian faith being found in it: the title calls it David's psalm: for, in believing the foresight of the Messiah, he both praised God and solaced himself; much more may we, in singing it, to whom that is fulfilled, and therefore more clearly revealed, which is here foreshadowed. Glorious things are here spoken of Christ, and such as oblige us to consider how great he is.

I. He is David's Lord; we must take special notice of this, because he himself does; (Matt. xxii. 43.) David, in spirit, calleth him Lord. And as the apostle proves the dignity of Melchizedek, and in him of Christ, by this, that so great a man as Abraham has paid him tithes, (Heb. vii. 4.) we so we must by this prove the dignity of the Lord Jesus, that he is a great and happy man: I will call him Lord, by him that king acknowledges himself to reign, and to him to be acceptable as a servant to his Lord. Some think he calls him his Lord, because he was the Lord that was to descend from him; his Son, and yet his Lord. Thus his immediate mother calls him her Saviour; (Luke i. 47.) even his parents were his subjects, his saved ones.

II. He is constituted a sovereign Lord by the council and decree of God himself. The Lord Jehovah, said he, Sit thou at my right hand. He receives of the Father this honour and glory; (2 Pet. i. 17.) from him who is the Fountain of honour and power, and takes it not to himself. He is therefore rightfully Lord, and his title is incontestable; for what God has said cannot be gainsaid. He is therefore everlasting Lord; for what God has said shall not be unsaid. He will certainly take and keep possession of that kingdom which the Father has committed to him, and no man can hinder.

III. He was to be advanced to the highest honour, and intrusted with an absolute sovereign power, both in heaven and in earth; Sit thou at my right hand. Sitting is a resting posture: after his services and sufferings, he entered into rest from all his labours. It is a ruling posture; he sits to give law, to give judgment: it is a remaining posture; he sits like a king for ever; sitting at the right hand of God denotes both his dignity and his dominion, the honour put upon him, and the trusts reposed in him, by the Father. All the favours that come from God to man, and all the service that comes from man to God, pass through his hand.

IV. All his enemies were in due time to be made his footstool, and not till then; but then also he must reign in the glory of the Mediator, though the work of the Mediator will be, in a manner, at an end. Note, 1. Even Christ himself had enemies that fought against his kingdom and subjects, his honour and interest, in the world: there are those that will not have him to reign over them, and thereby they join themselves to Satan, who will not have him to reign at all. 2. These enemies will be made his footstool; he will subdue them, and triumph over them; he will do it easily, as easily as we put a footstool in its proper place, and so a property there will be no limit to the dominion and empire of the Son of God. 3. God the Father has undertaken to do it; I will make them thy footstool, who can do it. 4. It will not be done immediately. All his enemies are now in a chain, but not yet made his footstool: this the apostle observes, (Heb. ii. 8.) We see the chains of all things put under him. Christ himself must wait for the completing of his victories and triumphs. 5. He shall reign till it is done; and all their might and malice shall not give the least disturbance to his government. His sitting at God's right hand is a pledge to him of his set-people in Corinth before they were converted, Acts xviii. 10.

2. That they should be a willing people, a people of willingness; alluding to servants that choose their service, and are not brought by captives to it; they love their masters, and would not go out free: or there may be an allusion to soldiers that are volunteers, and not pressed men; "Here am I, send me;" or to sacrifices that are free-will offerings, and not offered of necessity; we present ourselves to Christ's service to be a willing people. The conversion of a soul consists in its being willing to be Christ's, coming under his yoke, and into his interests, with an entire compliance and satisfaction.

3. That they should be so in the day of his power; In the day of thy muster, so some; When thou art enlistng soldiers, thou shalt find a multitude of volunteers forward to be listed; let but the standard be set up, and the Gentiles will seek to it, Isa. xlix. 14.-xxi. 3. Or, When thou art drawing them cut to battle, they shall be willing to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, Rev. xiv. 4. In the day of thine armies, so some; When the first preachers of the gospel were sent forth, as Christ's armies, to reduce apostate men, and to ruin the kingdom of apostate angels, then all that are thy people shall be willing; that will be thy time of setting up thy kingdom among the Gentiles, Rev. xv. 4. There is a general power which goes along with the gospel to all, proper to make them willing to be Christ's people, arising from the supreme authority of its great Author, and the intrinsic excellency of the things themselves contained in it, beside the undeniable miracles that were wrought for the confirmation of it. And there is also a particular power, the power of the Spirit, going along with the power of the word, to the people of Christ, which the former leaves sinners without matter of excuse, this leaves saints without matter of boasting. Whoever are willing to be Christ's people, it is the free and mighty grace of God that makes them so.

4. That they should be so in the beauty of holiness; that is, (1.) They shall be allured to him by the beauty of holiness; they shall be charmed into a subjection to Christ by the sight given them of his beauty, which we call the beauty of grace; he is the good Shepherd, whose feet, at last, on the necks of all his enemies. This is the beauty of holiness, which we call the beauty of grace. He sits in heaven in the midst of his friends; his throne of glory there is surrounded with none but faithful worshippers of him, Rev. v. 11. But he rules on earth in the midst of his enemies, and his throne of government here is surrounded with those that hate him, and fight against him. Christ's church is a city among thorns, and his disciples are sent forth as sheep in the midst of wolves; he knows where they dwell, even where Satan's seat is; (Rev. ii. 13.) and this redounds to his honour, that he not only keeps his ground, but gains his point, notwithstanding all the malignant policies and powers of hell and earth, which cannot shake the rock on which the church is built. Great is the truth, and will prevail.

5. That he should have a great number of subjects that should be to him for a name and a praise, v. 3.

1. That they should be his own people, and such as he should have an incontestable title to. They are given to him by the Father, who gave them their lives and beings, and to whom their lives and beings were forfeited; Thine they were, and thou gavest them me, John xvii. 6. They are redeemed by him; he has purchased them to be to himself a peculiar people, Tit. ii. 14. They are his by right, antecedent to their consent; he had much ground, to make it fruitful. Note, The dew of our youth, even in the morning of our days, ought to be consecrated to our Lord Jesus.

6. That he should be not only a King, but a Priest, v. 4. The same Lord that said, Sit thou at my right hand, sware, and will not repent, Thou art a priest, that is, Be thou a priest; for by the word of his oath he was consecrated. Note, (1.) Our Lord Jesus Christ is a Priest; he was appointed to that office, and faithfully executes it; he is ordained for many things hereafter concerning Christ sacrifices for sin, (Heb. v. 1.) to make atonement for our sins, and to recommend our services to God's acceptance. He is God's Minister to us, and our Advocate with God, and so is a Mediator between us and God. (2.) He is a Priest for ever; he was designed for a Priest, in God's eternal counsels; he was a Priest to the Old Testament saints, and will be a Priest for all believers to the end of time, Heb. xii. 8. He is said to be a Priest for ever; not only because we are never to expect any other dispensation of grace than this by the priesthood of Christ, but because the blessed fruits and consequences of it will remain to eternity. (3.) He is made a Priest with an oath, which the apostle argues, to prove the pre-eminence of his priesthood above that of Aaron, Heb. vii. 20, 21. The Lord has sworn, to show that in the commission there was no implicit reserve of a power of revocation; for he will not repent, as he did concerning Eli's priesthood, 1 Sam. ii. 30. This was intended for the honour of Christ, and the comfort of Christians: the priesthood of Christ is confirmed by the highest ratifications possible, that it might be an unshaken foundation for our faith and hope to build upon. (4.) He is a Priest, not of the order of Aaron, but of that of Melchizedek, which, as it was prior, so it was, upon many accounts, superior, to that of Aaron, and a more lively representative of Christ. Melchizedek was a priest upon his throne, so is Christ, (Zech. vi. 13.) King of righteousness, and King of peace: Melchizedek had no successor, nor has Christ, his is an unchangeable priesthood. The apostle comments largely upon these words, (Heb. vii.) and builds on them his discourse of Christ's priestly office; which he shows was no new notion, but built upon this most sure word of prophecy. For, as the New Testament was not written in the Old, so the Old Testament confirms the New, and Jesus Christ is the Alpha and Omega of both.

5. The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries.

6. He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries.

7. He shall drink of the brook in the way: therefore shall he lift up the head. Here we have our great Redeemer, 1. Conquering his enemies, (v. 5, 6.) in order to the making of them his footstool, v. 1. Our Lord Jesus will certainly bring to nought all the opposition made to his kingdom, and bring to ruin all those who make that opposition, and persist in it. He will be too hard for those, whoever they may be, that fight against him, against his subjects, and the interest of his kingdom, among men, either by persecutions or by perverse disputations. Observe here, 1. The Conqueror; The Lord, Adonai; the Lord Jesus, he to whom all judgment is committed; he shall make his own part good against his enemies; The Lord at thy right hand, O church, so some; that is, the Lord that is nigh unto his people, and very present Help to them, that is at their right hand, to strengthen and succour them; shall appear for them against his and their enemies. See cix. 3. He shall stand at the right hand of the poor, xvi. 8. Some observe, that, when Christ is said to do his work at the right hand of his church, it intimates, that if we would have Christ to appear for us, we must besist ourselves, 2 Sam. v. 24. Or rather, A thy right hand, O God, referring to v. 1. in the dignity and dominion to which he is advanced. Note, Christ's sitting at the right hand of God speaks as much terror to his enemies, as happiness to his friends.

2. The time fixed for this victory; in the day of his wrath; that is, the time appointed for it; when the measure of their iniquities is full, and they are ripe for ruin. When the day of his patience is expired, then the day of his wrath comes. Note, (1.) Christ has wrath of his own, as well as grace. It concerns us to kiss the Son, for he can be angry, John xii. 24. And we read of the wrath of the Lamb, Rev. vi. 16. (2.) There is a day of wrath set, a year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion, the year of the redeemed. The time is set for the destruction of particular enemies, and when that time is come, it shall be done, how unlikely soever it may seem; but the great day of his wrath will be at the end of time, Rev. vi. 17.

3. The extent of this victory. (1.) It shall return very high; He shall strike through kings. The greatest that ever opposed themselves against Christ, shall be made to fall before him; though they be kings of the earth, and rulers, accustomed to carry their point, they cannot carry it against Christ, they do but make themselves ridiculous by the attempt, ii. 2-5. Be their power among men so despotick, Christ will call them to an account; be their strength ever so great, their policies ever so deep, Christ will be too hard for them; and above them, when he shall cast down his enemies, and will trample upon the creature of this world, Death the king of terrors, and we read of kings that make war with the Lamb; but they shall all be brought down and broken. (2.) It shall reach very far. The trophies of Christ's victories will be set up among the heathen, and in many countries, wherever any of his enemies are, not his eye only, but his hand, shall find them out, xxxiii. 8.) and his wrath shall follow them. He will be just in the height of his passions, Jer. xxxii. 2.

4. The equity of this victory; He shall judge among them. It is not a military execution, which is done in fury, but a judicial one; before he condemns and slays, he will judge; he will make it appear that they have brought this ruin upon themselves, and have themselves rolled the stone which returns upon them, that he may be justified when he speaks, and the heavens may declare his righteousness. See Rev. xix. 1, 2.

5. The effect of this victory; it shall be the complete and utter ruin of all his enemies. He shall strike them through, for he strikes home, and gives an incurable wound; he shall wound the heads, which seems to refer to the first promise of the Messiah, (Gen. iii. 15.) that he should bruise the serpent's head. He shall wound the head of his enemies; (Ps. lxxviii. 21.) some read it, He shall wound him that is the head over many countries; other Sinners; or the Antichrist, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth. He shall make such destruction of his enemies, that he shall fill the places with the dead bodies. The slain of the Lord shall be many. See Isa. xxxiv. 3, &c. Ezek. xxxix. 12, 14. Rev. xiv. 20. — xix. 17, 18. The filling of the valley (for so some read it) with dead bodies, perhaps, denotes the filling of the valley of Hinom (which is sometimes compared to the valley of Hinom, Isa. xxx. 33. Jer. vii. 32.) with damned souls for that will be the portion of those that persist in their enmity to Christ.
II. We have here the Redeemer saving his friends and comforting them, (v. 7.) for their benefit. 1. He shall be humbled; He shall drink of the brook in the way, that he may be made more humble, and put into his hand. He shall be so abased and impoverished, and withal so intent upon his work, that he shall drink puddle-water out of the lakes in the highway; so some. The wrath of God, running in the channel of the curse of the law, was the brook in the way, in the way of his undertaking, which he must go through; or which ran in the way of our salvation and obstructed it, which lay between us and God. 2. Christ drank of this brook, when he was made a Curse for us, and therefore, when he entered upon his suffering, he went over the brook Kidron; (John xviii. 1.) he drank deep of this black brook, (so Kidron signifies,) this bloody brook, so drank of the brook in the way, as to take it out of the way of our redemption and salvation.

2. He shall be exalted; Therefore shall he lift up the head. When he died, he bowed the head; (John xix. 30.) but he soon lifted up the head by his own power in his resurrection. He lifted up the head as a Conqueror, yea, more than a Conqueror. This denotes not only his exaltation, but his exultation; not only his elevation, but his triumph in it; (Col. ii. 15.) Having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them. David spake as a type of him in this, (Ps. xxvii. 6.) Now shall my head be lifted up above mine enemies. His exaltation was the work of the day, his humiliation himself, therefore God also has highly exalted him. Phil. ii. 9. Because he drank of the brook in the way, therefore he lifted up his own head, and so, lifted up the heads of all his faithful followers, who, if they suffer with him, shall also reign with him.

PSALM CXI.

This, and divers of the psalms that follow it, seem to have been penned by David for the service of the church in their solemn feasts, as a direction to any particular persons. This is a psalm of praise, the title of it is Hallelujah, Praise ye the Lord; intimating that we must address ourselves to the use of this psalm, with hearts disposed to praise God. It is composed alphabetically, each sentence beginning with a word of the Hebrew alphabet, in order exactly; two sentences to each verse, and three a piece to the two last. The psalmist, exhorting to praise God, 1. Sets himself for an inquirer, one that inquires after God, to know him, (v. 1.) from the works of God. 1. The greatness of his works, and the glory of them. 2. The righteousness of them. 3. The goodness of them. 4. The power of them. 5. The conformity of them to his word of promise. 6. The perpetuity of them. These observations are intermixed, v. 2. 9. 111. He recommends the holy fear of God, and a conscientious obedience to his commands, as the most acceptable way of praising God, v. 10.

1. PRAISE ye the Lord. I will praise the Lord with my whole heart in the assembly of the upright, and in the congregation. 2. The works of the Lord are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein. 3. His works are honourable and glorious: and his righteousness endureth for ever. 4. He hath made his wonderful works to be remembered: the Lord is gracious, and full of compassion. 5. He hath given meat unto them that fear him: he will be ever mindful of his covenant.

The title of the psalm being Hallelujah, the psalmist (as every author ought to have) has an eye to his title, and keeps to his text.

1. He resolves to praise God himself, v. 1. What duty we call others to, we must oblige and excite ourselves to; nay, whatever others do, whether they will praise God or no, we and our houses must determine and order our hearts; for such is the psalmist’s resolution here, I will praise the Lord with my whole heart. My heart, my whole heart, being devoted to his honour, shall be employed in this work; and this in the assembly, or secret, of the upright, in the cabinet council, and in the congregation of Israelites. Note, We must praise God both in private and in public, in lesser and greater assemblies, in our own families and in the courts of the Lord’s house; but in both it is most comfortable to do it in concert with the upright, who will heartily join in it. Private meetings for devotion should be kept up as well as more public and promiscuous assemblies.

2. He recommends to us the works of the Lord, as the proper subject of our meditations when we are praising him—the dispensations of his providence toward the world, the church, and particular persons.

(1.) God’s works are very magnificent; great like himself, there is nothing in them that is mean or trifling: they are the products of infinite wisdom and power, and we must say this upon the first view of them, before we come to inquire more particularly into them, that the works of the Lord are great, v. 2. There is something in them surprising, and that strikes an awe upon us. All the works of the Lord are spoken of as one; (v. 3.) it is his work, such is the beauty and harmony of Providence, the so admirably do all its dispensations centre in one design; it was cried to the wheels, O wheel, Ezek. x. 13. Take all together, and it is honourable and glorious, and such as becomes him.

(2.) They are entertaining and exercising to the inquisitive; sought out of all them that have pleasure therein. Note, [1.] All that truly love God have pleasure in his works, and reckon all well that he does; nor do their thoughts dwell upon any subject with more delight than on the works of God, which the more they are looked into, the more they give us of a pleasing surprise. [2.] They that have pleasure in the works of God will not take up with a superficial transient view of them, but will diligently search into them and observe them. In studying both natural and political history, we should have this in our eye, to discover the greatness and glory of God’s works. [3.] These works of God, that are humbly and diligently sought into, shall be sought out; they that seek shall find; (so some read it;’ they are found of all them that have pleasure in them, or found in all their parts, designs, purposes, and several concerns; (so Dr. Hammond;) for the secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, xxv. 14.

3. They are all just and holy; His righteousness endures for ever. Whatever he does, he never did, nor ever will, do any wrong to any of his creatures; and therefore his works endure for ever, (Eccle. iii. 14.) because the righteousness of them does.

4. They are admirable and memorable, fit to be registered and kept on record. Much that we do is so trifling that it is not fit to be spoken of or told again; the greatest kindness is to forget it; but notice is to be taken of God’s works, and an account to be kept of them, (Ps. lxxvii. 18.) he has made his wonderful works to be remembered; accounts of them are given; but which is worthy to be remembered, which cannot but be remembered; and he has instituted ways and means for the keeping of some of them in remembrance, as the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt by the passover. He has made him a memorial by his wonderful works; so some read it; see Isa. lxix. 17. By that which God did with his glorious arm, he made himself an everlasting name.
5. They are kind; in them the Lord shows that he is gracious and full of compassion. As of the works of creation, so of the works of Providence, we must say, They are not only all very great, but all very good. Dr. Hammond takes this to be the name which God has made, to himself by his wonderful works, the same with that which he proclaimed to Moses, The Lord God is gracious and merciful, Exod. xxiv. 6. God’s pardoning sin is the most wonderful of all his works, and which ought to be remembered to his glory. It is a further instance of his grace and compassion, that he has given meat to them that fear him, v. 5. He gives them their daily bread, food convenient for them: so he does to others by common providence; but to them that fear him he gives it by covenant, and in pursuance of the promise; for it follows, He will be ever mindful of his covenant; so that they can taste covenant-love even in common mercies. Some refer this to the manna with which God fed his people Israel in the wilderness. Others to the spoil they got from the Egyptians when they came out with great substance, according to the promise, Gen. xv. 14. When God brake the kingdom of Egypt, he set a bound to his kingdom, Ps. lxv. 14. He has given prey to them that fear him; so the margin has it, not only fed them, but enriched them, and given their enemies to be a prey to them.

6. They are earnest of what he will do, according to his promise: He will ever be mindful of his covenant, for he has ever been so; and as he never did, so he never will, let one jot or title of it fall to the ground. Though God’s people have their infirmities, and are often unmindful of his commands, yet he will ever be mindful of his covenant.

6. He hath showed his people the power of his works, that he may give them the heritage of the heathen. 7. The works of his hands are verity and judgment; all his commandments are sure. 8. They stand fast for ever and ever, and are done in truth and uprightness. 9. He sent redemption unto his people; he hath commanded his covenant for ever; holy and reverend is his name. 10. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth for ever.

We are taught to give glory to God,

1. For the great things he has done for his people, for his people of Israel, of old and of late; He has showed his people the power of his works, (v. 6.) in what he has wrought for them; many a time he has given proofs of his omnipotence, and showed them what he can do, and that there is nothing too hard for him to do. Two things are specified, to show the power of his works.

(1.) The possession God gave to Israel in the land of Canaan, that he might give them, or in giving them, the heritage of the heathen. This he did in Joshua’s time, when the seven nations were subdued; and in David’s time, when the neighbouring nations were many of them brought under his dominion, and subject to him, and became tributaries to David. Herein God showed his sovereignty, in disposing of kingdoms as he pleases, and his might, in making good his dispositions. If God will make the heritage of the heathen to be the heritage of Israel, who can either arraign his counsel, or stay his hand?

(2.) The many deliverances which he wrought for his people, when by their iniquities they had sold themselves into the hand of their enemies; (v. 9.) He sent redemption unto his people; not only out of Egypt at first, but often afterward; and these redemptions were typical of the great redemption, which in the fulness of time was to be wrought out of the hands of sin and death in Jerusalem which so many waited for.

2. For the stability both of his word and of his works, which assure us of the great things he will do for them.

(1.) What God has done shall never be undone. He will not undo it himself, and men and devils cannot; (v. 7.) The works of his hand are verity and judgment; (v. 8.) they are done in truth and uprightness; they are consistent with his covenant. He commands both rules and reasons of equity, all according to the counsel of his wisdom, and the purpose of his will; all well done; and therefore there is nothing to be altered or amended, but it is firm and unchangeable. Upon the beginning of his works we may depend for the perfecting of them; work that is true will last, will neither go to decay, nor sink under the stress that is laid upon it.

(2.) What God has said shall never be unsaid; All his commandments are sure; all straight, and therefore all steady. His purposes, the rule of his actions, shall all have their accomplishment; Has he spoken, and shall he not make it good? No doubt, he shall; whether he commands light or darkness, it is done as he commands. His precepts, the rule of our actions, are unquestionably just and good, and therefore unchangeable, and not to be repealed.

His promises and threatenings are all sure, and will be made good; nor shall the unbelief of man make either the one or the other of no effect. They are established, and therefore they stand fast for ever and ever, and the scripture cannot be broken. The wise God is never put upon new counsels, nor obliged to take new measures, either in his laws or in his providences. All is said, as all is done, in truth and uprightness, and therefore it is immutable. Men’s folly and falsehood make them unstable in all their ways, but infinite wisdom and truth for ever exclude retraction and revocation; He has commanded his covenant for ever. God’s covenant is commanded, for he has made it as one that has an incontestable authority to prescribe both what we must do, and what we must expect, and an unques tionable ability to perform both what he has promised in the blessings of the covenant, and what he has threatened upon the breaking of it, ch. 8. 13.

3. For the setting up and establishing of religion among men. Because holy and reverend is his name, and the fear of him is the beginning of wisdom, therefore his praise endureth for ever; he is to be everlastingly praised.

(1.) Because the discoveries of religion tend so much to his honour; Review what he has made known of himself in his word and in his works, and you will find, first, that he is most terrible, most holy, and greatly to be feared; for his name is holy, his infinite purity and rectitude appear in all that whereby he has made himself known, and because it is holy, therefore it is reverend, and to be thought of, and mentioned, with a holy awe. Note, What is holy, is reverend; the angels have an eye to God’s holiness when they cover their faces before him, and nothing is more man’s honour than his sanctification. It is in his present place that God appears most terrible, lxviii. 35. Lev. x. 3.

(2.) Because the dictates of religion tend so much to man’s happiness. We have reason to praise God, that the matter is so well contrived, that our reverence of him, and obedience to him, are as much our interest as they are our duty.

[1.] Our reverence of him is so; The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. It is not only reasonably that we should fear God, because his name is reverend, and his nature holy, but it is advantageous to us. It is wisdom, it will direct us to speak and act as becomes us, in a consistency with ourselves, and for our own benefit. It is the head of wisdom, that is, as we read it, it is the beginning of wisdom; men never begin to be wise, till they begin to fear God, and attend on his commandments; and, in true religion, and has its foundation in it; or, as some understand it, it is the chief wisdom, and the most excellent: the first in dignity. It is the principal wisdom, and the principle of wisdom, to worship God, and give honour to him, as our Father and Master. They manage well who always act under the government of his holy fear.

[2.] Our obedience to him is so: A good understanding doth the commandments. Where the fear of the Lord rules in the heart, there will be a constant conscientious care to keep his commandments; not to talk of them, but to do them; and such have a good understanding; First, They are well understood, their obedience is graciously accepted as a plain indication of their mind, that they do indeed fear God. Compare Prov. iii. 4. So shalt thou find favour and good understanding. God and man will look upon those as meaning well, among those of their duty, though they have their mistakes; what is honestly intended shall be well taken. Secondly, They understand well. 1. It is a sign that they do understand well. The most obedient are accepted as the most intelligent; those understand themselves and their interests best, that make God’s law their rule, and are in every thing ruled by it. A great understanding they have, that know God’s commandments, and can discern learnedly of them; but a good understanding have they that do them, and walk according to them. 2. It is the way to understand better; A good understanding are they to all that do them; the fear of the Lord, and the laws of that give men a good understanding, and are able to make them wise unto salvation. If any man will do his will, he shall know more and more clearly of the doctrine of Christ. John i. 18. Good men have all these that do them, so the margin; according to what was promised Joshua, if he would observe to do according to the law, (Josh. i. 8.) Then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and shalt have good success. We have reason to praise God, to praise him for ever, for putting man into such a fair way to happiness. Some apply the last words rather to the good man who fears the Lord, than to the good God; His praise endureth for ever: it is not of men, perhaps, but it is of God; (Rom. ii. 29.) and that praise, which is of God endures for ever, when the praise of men is withered and gone.

PSALM CXII.

This psalm is composed alphabetically, as the former it, and is (like the former) entitled, Hallelujah; treats of the happiness of the saints, because it redounds to the glory of God, and whatever we have the pleasure of, he must have the praise of. It is a comment upon the last verses of the forty-ninth psalm, showing how much it is our wisdom to fear God, and do his commandments. We have here, I. The character of the righteous, v. 1. II. The blessedness of the righteous. 1. There is a blessedness entailed upon their posterity, v. 1. II. They are a blessing conferred upon themselves. (1.) Prosperity outward and inward, v. 3. (2.) Comfort, v. 4. (3.) Wisdom, v. 5. (4.) Stability, v. 6. (5.) Honour, v. 6. 9. III. The misery of the wicked, v. 10. So that good and evil are set before us, the blessing and the curse. In singing this psalm, we must not only teach and admonish ourselves and one another to answer to the characters here given of the happy, but comfort and encourage ourselves and another with the privileges and comforts here secured to the holy.

1. PRAISE ye the Lord. Blessed is the man that feareth the Lord, that delighteth greatly in his commandments. 2. His seed shall be mighty upon the earth: the generation of the upright shall be blessed. 3. Wealth and riches shall be in his house; and his righteousness endureth for ever. 4. Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness: he is gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous. 5. A good man showeth favour, and lendeth: he will guide his affairs with discretion.

The psalmist begins with a call to us to praise God, but immediately applies himself to praise the people of God; for whatever glory is acknowledged to be on them, it comes from God, and must return to him, as his Praise; so they are his. We have reason to praise the Lord, that there are people in the world who fear him and serve him, and that they are a happy people; both which are owing entirely to the grace of God.

Now here we have,

1. A description of these who are here pronounced blessed, and to whom these promises are made. (1.) They are well-principled with pious and devout affections. Those have the privileges of God's subjects, not who cry, Lord, Lord, but who are indeed well-affecting to his government. [1.] They are such as stand in awe of God, and have a constant reverence for his majesty, and deference to his will. The happy man is he that fears the Lord, v. 1. [2.] They are such as take a pleasure in their duty. He that fears the Lord, as a Father, with the disposition of a child, not of a slave, delights greatly in his commandments, is well-pleased with them, and with the equity and goodness of them, they are written in his heart, it is his choice to be under them, and he calls them an easy, a pleasant, yoke; it is his delight to be searching into, and conversing with, God's commandments, by reading, hearing, and meditating, Ps. i. 2. He delights not only in God's promises, but in his precepts, and thinks himself happy, under God's government, as well as in his favour. It is a pleasure to him to be found in the centre of his duty, and he is in his element when he is in the service of God. Herein he delights greatly, more than in any of the employments and enjoyments of this world. And what he does in religion is done from principle, because he sees amiableness in religion, and advantage by it.

(2.) They are honest and sincere in their professions and intentions. They are called the upright, (v. 2, 4.) who are really as good as they seem to be, and deal faithfully both with God and man. There is no true religion without sincerity; that is gospel-perfection.

(3.) They are both just and kind in all their dealings; He is gracious, full of compassion, and righteous, (v. 4.) dares not do any wrong to any man, but does to every man all the good he can, and that from a principle of compassion and kindness. It is said of God in the former psalm, (v. 4.) He is gracious, and full of compassion; and here it is said of the good man, that he is so; for herein we must be followers of God, as dear children; be merciful as he is. He is full of compassion, and yet righteous; what he does good with, is what he came honestly by; God hates robbery for burnt-offerings, and so does he. One instance is given of his beneficence; (v. 5.) He shows favour, and lends. Sometimes there is as much charity in lending as in giving, as it obliges the borrower both to
They have dealt falsely, and with oppression; and have taken up money in their heart, and have rewarded diligently for the violence of their hands.

2. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, because ye have forgotten me and trusted in your own counsel, therefore, behold, I will smite you with the sword of man, with the sword of beasts, and with the sword of the famine, which shall devour the soul from without, and the heart within you.

3. And ye shall eat every man the flesh of his own house, and the flesh of your servants "shall be your meat, in the place which ye would not have set on foot, and "shall be as the desolation of your eyes, and all that ye have done, shall "be as the mourning of your heart. And ye shall eat in desolation, and shall perish, because of the sword of the Egyptians, and because of the sword of the Assyrians, and because of the sword of the sword of the whole earth, which I will plant against you.

4. And "you shall know that I am the Lord, when "I stretch out mine hand upon these that are fallen, and deliver them in my faithfulness, and "make the high crooked paths straight," and "the sharp points into paths of level ground, and "the glory of the house of Israel shall "be "given to the house of Israel, saith the Lord God; and "they shall "be "known by the name of the Lord."
liberality and bounty to the poor; He has dispersed, he has given to the poor; he has not suffered his charity to run all in one channel, or directed it to some few objects that he liked, but a kind of plan for, in all look behind him, given a portion to seven, and to eight, has sown beside all waters, and by thus scattering he has increased; and this is his righteousness, which endures for ever. Aims are called righteous, not because they will justify us by making atonement for our evil deeds, but because they are good deeds, which we are bound to perform; so that, if we are not charitable, we are not just; we withhold good from those that it is due to like the prodigal son; for, even, here are others for ever, for it shall be taken notice of in the great day: I was an hungry, and ye gave me meat. This is quoted as an inducement and encouragement to charity, 2 Cor. ix. 9.

(2.) A good man shall have a settled spirit, and that is a much more satisfaction than the former; for so shall a man have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another. Surely he shall not be moved, whatever happens, not moved either from his duty, or from his comfort; he shall not be afraid, his heart is established, v. 7, 8. This is a part both of the character, and of the comfort, of good people. It is their endeavour to keep their minds stayed upon God, and so to keep them calm, and easy, and undisturbed; and God has promised them both cause to do so, and grace to do so. Observe, [1.] It is the duty and interest of the people of God, not to be afraid of evil tidings; not to be afraid of hearing bad news; and when they do hear them, to be put in a confusion by it, and into an amazing expectation of worse and worse; but, whatever happens, whatever threatens, to be able to say, with blessed Paul, None of these things move me, neither will I fear, though the earth be moved, xlvi. 2. [2.] The fixedness of the heart is a sovereign remedy against the disquieting fear of evil tidings. If we keep our thoughts composed, and ourselves masters of them, our wills resigned to the holy will of God, our temper sedate, and our spirits even, under all the unceasing of Providence, we are well-fortified against the agitations of the timorous. [3.] Trusting in the Lord is the best and surest way of fixing and establishing the heart. By faith we must cast anchor in the promise, in the word of God, and so return to him, and repose in him as our Rest. The heart of man cannot fix any where, to its satisfaction, but in the truth of God, and there it finds firm footing. [4.] They whose hearts are established by faith, shall not be caught till they have gained their point; He shall not be afraid, till he see his desire upon his enemies, till he come to heaven, where he shall see Satan, and all his spiritual enemies, trodden under his feet, and, as Israel saw the Egyptians, dead on the sea-shore; Till he look upon his oppressors, so Dr. Hammond; till he behold them securely, and look boldly in their faces, as being now no longer under their power. It will complete the satisfaction of the saints, when they shall have overcome the wicked, and all their purposes, and be able to say with St. Paul, when he had recounted the persecutions he endured, (2 Tim. iii. 11.) But out of them all the Lord delivered me. 2. The vexation of sinners, v. 10. Two things shall fret them. 1. The felicity of the righteous; The wicked shall see the righteous in prosperity and honour, and shall be grieved. It will vex them to see their innocence cleared, and their low estate regarded, and those whom they have despised, and on whom they have thought to oppress and wear down, and hoped to see their favourites of Heaven, and advanced to have dominion over them; (xlvi. 14.) this will make them gnash with their teeth, and pine away. This is often fulfilled in this world. The happiness of the saints is the envy of the wicked, and that envy is the rottenness of their bones. But it will most fully be accomplished in the other world, when it shall make damned sinners gnash with their teeth, to see Abraham afar off; and Lazarus in his bosom; to see all the oppressors in the kingdom of God, and themselves thrust out. (2.) Their own disappointment; The desire of the wicked shall perish; their desire was wholly to the world and the flesh, and they ruled over them; and therefore, when these perish, their joy is gone, and their expectations from them are cut off, to their everlasting confusion; their hope is as a spider's web.

PSALM CXIII.

This psalm begins and ends with Hallelujah; for, as many others, it is designed to promote the great and good work of praising God. 1. We are here called, and urged, to praise God, v. 1, 2. We are here furnished with many apt and choice words and verses to urge our praises, in singing which, we must, with holy fear and love, give to God the glory of, 1. The elevations of his glory and greatness, v. 4, 5. 2. The condescensions of his grace and goodness, (v. 6, 7.) which very much illustrate another one, that we may be duly affected with both.

PRAISE ye the Lord. Praise, O ye servants of the Lord, praise the name of the Lord. 2. Blessed be the name of the Lord from this time forth and for evermore. 3. From the rising of the sun, unto the going down of the same, the Lord's name is to be praised. 4. The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens. 5. Who is like unto the Lord our God, who dwelleth on high, 6. Who humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven, and in the earth! 7. He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill; 8. That he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people. 9. He maketh the barren woman to keep house, to be a joyful mother of children. Praise ye the Lord.

In this psalm,

1. We are exhorted to give glory to God, to give him the glory due to his name. The invitation is very pressing; Praise ye the Lord, and again, and again, Praise him, praise him; blessed be his name, for it is to be praised, v. 1...3. This intimates, 1. That it is a necessary and most excellent duty, greatly pleasing to God, and has a large room in religion. 2. That it is a duty we should much abound in, in which we should be frequently employed and enlarged. 3. That it is work which we are very backward to, and which we need to be engaged and excited to by precept upon precept, and line upon line. (Deut. iv. 2.) That it is work much in praising God themselves, will court others to it, both because they find the weight of the work, and that there is need of all the help they can fetch in, (there is employment for all hearts, all hands, and all little enough,) and because they find the pleasure of it, which they wish all their friends may share in.

Observe, (1.) From whom God has praise; from his own people; they are here called upon to praise God, as those that follow the call, Praise, O ye servants of the Lord. They have best reason to praise him; for they that attend him as his servants know him best, and receive most of his favours, and it is their business to praise him; that is the work required of them as his servants; it is easy pleasant work to speak well of their Master, and do them what honour they can; if they do not who should?
Some understand it of the Levites; but if so, all Christians are a royal priesthood, to show forth the praises of him that has called them, 1 Pet. ii. 9. The angels are the servants of the Lord; they need not be called upon by us to praise God, yet it is a comfort to us that they do it better than we can.

(2.) From whom has his right to do it? From whom has he received this grace? From whom are we to be raised to the standing of the sun, to the going down of the same, throughout the habitable world; let all that enjoy the benefit of the sun, (those that do so must count upon it that the sun will set,) give thanks for that light to the Father of lights. God's name is to be praised; it ought to be praised by all nations; for in every place, from East to West, there appear the manifest proofs and products of his wisdom, power, and goodness; and it is to be lamented that so great a part of mankind and his works, and good, and give them praise to others which is due to him alone. But perhaps there is more in it; as the former verse gave us a glimpse of the kingdom of glory, intimating that God's name shall be blessed for ever, (when time shall be no more, that praise shall be the work of heaven;) so this verse gives us a glimpse of the kingdom of grace in the gospel-dispensation of it, when the church shall no longer be confined to the Jewish nation, but shall spread itself all the world over; and everlasting spiritual income shall be offered to our God; (Mal. i. 11,) then, from the rising to the setting of the sun, the Lord's name shall be praised, by some in all countries.

11. We are here directed what to give him the glory of.

1. Let us look up with an eye of faith, and see how high his glory is in the upper world, and mention that, to his praise, v. 4. Then let us compare, in his praise, how high he is, his glory is high. (1.) High above all nations; their kings, though ever so pompous; their people, though ever so numerous. Whether it be true of an earthly king or no, that though he is major singularis—greater than individuals, he is minor universis—less than the whole, we will not dispute; but we are sure it is not true of the King of kings. Put all the nations together, and he is above them all; they are before him as the drop of the bucket, and the small dust of the balance, Isa. xl. 15, 17. Let all the nations think and speak highly of God, for he is high above them all.

(2.) High above the heavens; the throne of his glory is in the highest heavens; which should raise our hearts in praising him, Lam. iii. 41. His glory is above the heavens, above the angels; he is above what they are, their brightness is nothing to his; above what they do, for they are under his command, and do service for him; and above all heaven even they can speak him to be. He is exalted above all blessing and praise, not only all ours, but all theirs. We must therefore say, with holy adoration, Who is like unto the Lord our God? Who of all the princes and potentates of the earth? Who of all the bright and blessed spirits above? None can equal him, none dare compare with him. God is to be praised, as transcendently, incomparably, and incomprehensible; for he dwelleth exalted, and from on high sees all, and rules all; and justly attracts all praise to himself. 2. Let us look round with an eye of observation, and see how extensive his goodness is in the lower world, and mention that to his praise. He is a God who exalts himself to dwell, who humbles himself in heaven, and in earth. Some think there is a transposition, He exalts himself to dwell in heaven; he humbles himself to behold on earth; but the sense is plain enough, as we take it; for the thoughts of his self to transcend himself, and to humble himself, both are his own act and deed; as he is self-existent, so he is both the Fountain of his own honour, and the Spring of his own grace; God's condescending goodness appears,

(1.) In the cognizance he takes of the world below him; his glory is above the nations, and above the heavens, and yet neither is neglected by him; God is great, yet he does not despise any nation. Job xli. 13. He foundeth his throne above the stars of heaven, to behold the things in heaven, to support the beings, direct the motions, and accept the praises and services, of the angels themselves; for he needs them not, nor is benefited by them. [2.] Much more is it condescending in him to behold the things that are in the earth, to visit the sons of men, and regard them, to order and overrule their affairs, and to take notice of what they say and do, that he may fill the earth with his goodness, and so set us an example of stooping to do good, of taking notice of, and concerning ourselves about, our inferiors. If it be such condescension for God to behold things in heaven and earth, what an amazing condescension was it for the Son of God to come from heaven to earth, and take our nature upon him, that he might seek and save them that were lost! Here indeed he humbled himself.

(2.) In the particular favour he sometimes shows to the least and lowest of the inhabitants of this lower world. He not only beholds the great things in the earth, but the meanest, and those things which great men commonly overlook. Nor does he only behold them, but does wonders for them, and things that are very surprising, cut of the common road of Providence, and chain of causes; which shows that the world is governed, not by a course of nature, for that would always run in the same channel, but by a God of nature, who delights in doing things we looked not for.

[1.] Those that have been long despicable, are sometimes, on a sudden, made honourable; (v. 7, 8.) He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, that he may set him with princes. First, Thus God does sometimes magnify himself, and his own wisdom, power, and sovereignty; when he has some great work to do, he chooseth to employ those in it that were least likely, and least thought to be able by themselves, or by others, to the highest post of honour: Gideon is fetched from threshing, Saul from seeking the asses, and David from keeping the sheep; the apostles are sent from fishing to be fishers of men. The treasure of the gospel is put into earthen vessels, and the weak and foolish ones of the world pitched upon to be preachers of it, to confound the wise and mighty, (1 Cor. i. 27, 28,) that the excellency of the power may be of God, and all may be the wonder that is risen from him. Secondly, Thus does God sometimes reward the eminent piety and patience of his people who have long groaned under the burden of poverty and disgrace. When Joseph's virtue was tried and manifested, he was raised from the prison-dust, and set with princes. They that are wise will observe such returns of PSALMS, CXIV.

Providence, and will understand by them the loving-kindness of the Lord. Some have applied this to the work of redemption by Jesus Christ, and not unfi- tly; for through him poor fallen men are raised out of the dust, (one of the Jewish rabbins applies it, to the resurrection of the dead,) may, out of the dunghill of sin, and set among princes, among angels, those that spurned them. Hannah had sung to this purport, 1 Sam. i. 6-8.

[2.] Those that have been long barren, are sometimes, on a sudden, made fruitful, v. 9. This may look back to Sarah and Rebecca, Rachel, Hannah, and Samson’s mother, or forward to Elizabeth; and many such instances there have been, in which God has looked on the affliction of his handmaids, and taken away their approach. He makes to barren woman to keep house, not only builds up the family, but thereby finds the heads of the family something to do. Note, They that have the comfort of a family, must take the care of it; bearing children and guiding the house are put together, 1 Tim. v. 14. When God sets the barren in a family, he expects that she look well to the ways of her household, Prov. xxxi. 27. She is said to be a joy- ful mother, not only of her own children, but, even in common cases, the pain is forgotten, for joy that a man-child is born into the world, but there is particular joy when a child is born to those that have been long childless, (as Luke i. 14.) and therefore there ought to be particular thanking; Praise ye the Lord. Yet, in this case rejoice with trem- bings; for, though the sorrowful mother be made joyful, the joyful mother may be made sorrowful again, if the children be either removed from her, or imibted to her. This therefore it is to be applied to the gospel-church among the Gentiles, the building of which is illustrated by this similitude, (Isa. liv. 1.) Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear; (G. I. iv. 27.) for which we (who, being sin- ners of the Gentiles, are children of the desolate) have reason to say, Praise ye the Lord.

PSALM CXIV.

The deliverance of Israel out of Egypt gave birth to their church and nation, which were then founded, then formed; that people who went forth from Egypt, and therefore are fitly called a people, and well known, have a peculiar memorableness. God gloried in it, in the presence of the ten commandments, and Hos. xi. 1. Out of Egypt have I called my son. In this psalm, it is celebrated in lively and musickly tuneful strains, not as a part of the great Hallelujah, or song of praise, which the Jews were wont to sing at the close of the passover-supper. It must never be forgotten, I. That they were brought out of slavery, v. 1. II. That God set up his tabernacle among them, v. 2. III. That the sea and Jordan were divided before them, v. 3, 5. IV. That the earth shook at the giving of the law, when God came down on mount Sinai, v. 4, 6, 7. V. That God gave them water out of the rock, v. 8. In singing this psalm, we must acknowledge God’s power and goodness in what he did for Israel, applying it to the much greater work of won- der, our redemption by Christ, and encouraging ourselves and others to trust in God in the greatest straits.

1. WHEN Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language, 2. Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion. 3. The sea saw it, and fled; Jordan was driven back. 4. The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs. 5. What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back? 6. Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs? 7. Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob; 8. Which turned the rock into a standing water, the flint into a fountain of waters.

The psalmist is here remembering the days of old, the years of the right hand of the Most High, and the wonders which their fathers told them of; (Judg. vi. 13.) for time, as it does not wear out the grime of sin, so it should not wear out the sense of mercy.

Let it never be forgotten, 1. That God brought Israel out of the house of bondage with a high hand and a stretched out arm. Israel went out of Egypt, v. 1. They did not steal out clandestinely, nor were they driven out, but fairly went out, marched out with all the marks of honour: they went out from a barbarous people, that had used them barbarously, from a people of a strange language, xxxi. 14. They had purposed, and it seemed, preserved their own language pure among them, and cared not for learning the language of their oppressors. By this distinction from them, they kept up an earnest of their deliverance.

2. That he himself framed their civil and sacred constitution; (v. 2.) Judah and Israel were his sanctuary, his dominion. When he delivered them out of the hand of their oppressors, it was that they might serve him, both in holiness, in -the purity of his presence, and the purity of his word, so that, like Judah here, are his sanctuaries, his living temples, en whom Holiness to the Lord is written! (2.) He set up his dominion among them, was himself their Lawgiver, and their Judge; and their govern- ment was a theocracy; The Lord was their King. All the world is God’s dominion, but Israel was so in a peculiar manner. What is God’s sanctuary must be his law, both of the laws of it, and of the laws of the land. There were many laws of the house that submit to the laws of God, and for this end Christ has redeemed us, that he might bring us into God’s service, and engage us ever for it.

3. That the Red sea was divided before them at their coming out of Egypt, both for their rescue, and the ruin of their enemies; and the river Jordan, when they entered into Canaan, for their honour, and to illustrate this, the psalmist asks, Is it only to amuse men? No, it is to illustrate this, by a poetical strain, (v. 5.) What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? and furnishes the sea with an answer; (v. 7.) it was at the presence of the Lord. This is designed to express, (1.) The reality of the miracle, that it was not by any power of nature, or from any natural cause, but it was at the presence of the Lord, who gave the word. (2.) The mercy of the miracle; What ailed thee? Was it in vain that God spoke the word? (3.) That it was in the presence of the God of Jacob; it was in kindness to the Israel of God, for the salvation of that chosen people, that God was thus displeased against the rivers, and his wrath was against the sea, as the prophet speaks, Hab. iii. 8-13. Isa. li. 10.—Isi.
Many ancient translations join this psalm to that which goes next before it, the Septuagint particularly, and the vulgar Latin; but it is, in the Hebrew, a distinct psalm. In it, we are taught to give glory, I. To God, and not to ourselves, v. 1. II. To God, and not to idols, v. 2. 8. We must give glory to God, 1. By trusting in him, and his promise and blessing, v. 9. 12. By avoiding the idolatrous v. 16. 18. Some think this psalm was penned upon occasion of some great distress and trouble that the church of God was in; when the enemies were insolent and threatening. In such case the church doth not so much pour out her complaint to God, as place her confidence in God, and triumph in doing so; and with such a holy triumph we ought to sing this psalm.

PSALM CXV.

Many ancient translations join this psalm to that which goes next before it, the Septuagint particularly, and the vulgar Latin; but it is, in the Hebrew, a distinct psalm. In it, we are taught to give glory, I. To God, and not to providence, and always nigh to us by his promise and grace. (2.) Why does God permit them to say so? Nay, why should he not? Is it not possible that they have some colour for saying so? Lord, appear for our relief, that thou mayest vindicate thyself, and glorify thine own name."

2. He gives a direct answer to their question; (v. 3.) "Do they ask where is our God? We can tell where he is." (1.) In the upper world is the presence of his glory; Our God is in the heavens, where the gods of the heathen never were; in the heavens, and therefore out of sight; but, though his majesty be unapproachable, it does not therefore follow that his being is questionable. (2.) "In the lower world are the products of his power; He has done whatsoever he pleased, according to the counsel of his will; he has a sovereign dominion, and a universal uncontrollable influence. Do you ask where he is? He is at the beginning and end of every thing, and not far from any of us." He returns their question upon themselves. They asked, Where is the God of Israel? because he is not seen. He does in effect ask, What are the gods of the heathen? because they are seen.

(1.) He shows that their gods, though they are not shapeless things, are senseless things. Idolaters, at first, worshipped the sun and moon, (Job xxxi. 26.) which was bad enough, but not so bad as that which they were now come to, (for evil men grow worse, and worse,) which was bad enough. Now, the matter of the heavens, which was made of images, v. 4. The matter of them was silver and gold, dug out of the earth; (Man found them poor and dirty in a mine, Herbert) proper things to make money of, but not to make gods of. The make of them was from the artificer; they are creatures of men's vain imaginations, and the works of men's hands, and therefore can have no divinity in them. If man is the work of God's hands, (as certainly he is,) and it was his honour that he was made in the image of God,) it is absurd to think that that can be God which is the work of men's hands; or that it can be any other than a dishonour to God to make him in the image of man. The argument is irrefragable; The workman made it, and therefore it is not God, Hos. vii. 6. These idols are represented here as the most ridiculous things, a mere jest, that would seem to be something, but were really nothing. As a toy-shop than a temple; for children to play with than for men to pray to. The painter, the carver, the statuary, did their part well enough; they made them with mouths and eyes, ears and noses, hands and feet, but they could put no life into them, and therefore no sense. They had better have worshipped a dead carcasse (for that had life in it once) than a dead image, which neither has life, nor can have. They speak not, in answer to those that consult them; the crafty priest must do it for them. In Baal's image there was no voice, neither any that answered. They see not the prostrations of their worshippers before them, much less their burthenst and wants. They hear not their prayers, though ever so loud; they smell not their incense, though ever so strong, ever so sweet; they handle not the gifts presented to them, much less have they any gifts to bestow on them; they know not the tokens of God's favours, nor hands to the needy. They walk not, they cannot stir a step for the relief of those that apply to them. Nay, they do not so much as breathe through their throats; they have not the least sign or symptom of life, but are as dead, after the priest has pretended to consecrate them, and call a deity into them, as they were before.

(2.) He then infers the sottishness of their worshippers; (v. 8.) "They that make them images show their ingenuity, and doubtless are sensible men; but they that make them gods, show their stupidity and folly, and are like unto them, as senseless blockish things; they see not the invisible things of the world, which are eternal, and live to God in the works of creation; they hear not the voice of the day and the night, which in every speech and language declare his glory, xix. 2, 3. By worshipping these foolish puppets, they make themselves more and more foolish like them, and set themselves at a greater distance from every thing that is spiritual, sinking themselves deeper into the mire of sense; and within they provoke God to give them up to a refractory mind, a mind void of knowledge, and a mind void of judgement, Rom. i. 28. They the trust in them act very absurdly and very unreasonably; are senseless, helpless, useless, like them; and they will find it so themselves, to their own confusion. We shall know where our God is, and so shall they, to their cost, when their gods are gone, Jer. x. 3-11. Isa. xlv. 9, &c."

9. O Israel, trust thou in the Lord; he is their help and their shield. 10. O house of Aaron, trust in the Lord; he is their help and their shield. 11. Ye that fear the Lord, trust in the Lord; he is their help and their shield. 12. The Lord hath been mindful of us; he will bless us: he will bless the house of Israel, he will bless the house of Aaron. 13. He will bless them, that fear the Lord, both small and great. 14. The Lord shall increase you more and more, you and your children. 15. You are blessed of the Lord, which made heaven and earth. 16. The heaven, even the heavens, are the Lord's: but the earth hath he given to the children of men. 17. The dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence. 18. But we will bless the Lord from this time forth and for evermore. Praise the Lord.

In these verses,

I. We are earnestly exhorted, all of us, to repute our confidence in God, and not suffer our confidence in him to be shaken by the heathen's insulting of us, upon the account of our present distresses. It is folly to trust in dead images, but it is wisdom to trust in the living God, for he is a Help and a Shield to those that do trust in him; a Help to furnish them with, and forward them in, that which is good, and a Shield to fortify them against, and protect them from, every thing that is evil. Therefore, 1. Let Israel trust in the Lord; the body of the people, as to their public interests, and every particular Israelite, as to his own private concern, let them leave it to God to dispose of all for them, and believe he will dispose of all for the best, and will be their Help and Shield. 2. Let the priests, the Lord's ministers, and all the families of the house of Aaron, trust in the Lord; (v. 10.) they are most maligned and struck at by the enemies, and therefore of them God takes particular care. They ought to be examples to others of a cheerful confidence in God, and a faithful adherence to him, in the worst of times. 3. Let the proselytes, who are not of the seed of Israel, but fear the Lord, who worship him, and make conscience of their duty to him, let them trust in him, for he will not fail nor forsake them, v. 11. Note, Wherever there is an awful fear of God, there may be a cheerful faith in him: they that reverence his word, may rely upon it.

II. We are greatly encouraged to trust in God. and a good reason is given us why we should stay ourselves upon him with an entire satisfaction. Consider then, (1.) What we have experienced; (v. 12.) The Lord has been mindful of us, and never unmindful; has been so constantly, has been so remarkably, upon special occasions. He has been mindful of our case, our wants and burthens; mindful of our prayers to him, his promises to us, and the covenant-relationship between him and us. All our comforts are derived from God’s thoughts to usward; he has been mindful of us, though we have forgotten him. Let us engage us to trust in him, that we may have found him faithful.

2. What we may expect. From what he has done for us, we may infer, He will bless us; he that has been our Help and our Shield, will be so; he that has remembered us in our low estate, will not forget us; but he is still the same, his power and goodness the same, and his promise inviolable; so that we have reason to hope that he who has delivered, and does, will yet deliver. Yet this is not all; he will bless us; he has promised that he will; he has pronounced a blessing upon all his people. God’s blessing us is not only speaking good to us, but doing well for us; those whom he blesses, are blessed indeed. It is particularly promised that he will bless the house of Israel; he will bless the community, will bless his people in their civil interests; he will bless the house of Aaron, the church, the ministry; will bless his people in their religious concerns. The priests were to bless the people, it was their office; (Numb. vi. 23.) but God blesses them, and so blessed their blessings. Nay, (v. 13.) he will bless them that fear the Lord, though they be not of the house of Israel, or the house of Aaron; for it was a truth, before Peter perceived it, That, in every nation, he that fears God is accepted of him, and blessed, Acts x. 34, 35. He will bless them, both small and great, both young and old; God is blessings in store for them that are good betimes, and for them that are old disciples: both those that are poor in the world, and those that make a figure. The greatest need his blessing, and it shall not be denied to the meanest that fear him. Both the weak in grace and the strong shall be blessed of God, the lambs and the sheep of his flock.

It is promised, (v. 14.) The Lord shall increase you. What does God blesses he increases; that was one of the earliest and most merciful of God’s blessings, fruitful, and multiply. God’s blessing gives an increase; increase in number, building up the family; increase in wealth, adding to the estate and honour; especially an increase in spiritual blessings, with the increaseings of God. He will bless you with the increase of knowledge and wisdom, of grace, holiness, and joy; those are blessed indeed, whom God thus increases, who are made wiser and better. God has promised that this shall be, (1.) A constant continual increase; “He shall increase you more and more; so that, as long as you live, you shall be still increasing, till you come to perfection, as the shining light,” Prov. iv. 18. (2.) An hereditary increase; “You and your children; you in your children.” It is a comfort to parents to see their children increasing in wisdom and strength. There is a blessing in the increase of those that fear God, even in their infancy. For, (v. 15.) You are blessed of the Lord, you and your children are so; all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the Lord has blessed, Isa. lxix. 9. They that are the blessed of the Lord have encouragement enough to trust in the Lord, as their Help and Shield, for it is he that made heaven and earth; therefore his blessings are free, for he needs not any thing himself; and therefore they are rich, for he has all things at command for us, if we fear him and trust in him. He that made heaven and earth, he does not make these happy that trust in him, and will do it.

III. We are stirred up to praise God by the psalmist’s example, who concludes this psalm with a resolution to persevere in his praises.

1. God is to be praised; (v. 16.) He is greatly to be praised; for, (1.) His glory is high. See how stately his palace is, and the throne he has prepared in the heavens; The heaven, even the heavens are the Lord’s, he is the rightful owner of all the treasures of light and life, in the upper and the better world, and is in the full possession of them, for he is himself infinitely bright and happy. (2.) His goodness is large, for the earth he has given to the children of men, having designed it, when he made it, for their use, to find them with meat, drink, and lodging. Not but that still he is Preceptor in chief; the earth is the Lord’s, and the fulness thereof; but he has let cut that vineyard to these unhumble husbandmen, and from them he expects the rents and services: for though he has given them the earth, his eye is upon them, and he will call them to render an account how they use it. Calvin complains that profane wicked people, in his days, perverted this scripture, and made a jest of it, which some in our days do, arguing, in bauser, that God, having given the earth to the children of men, will no more look after it, nor after them upon it, but they may do what they will with it, and make the use of it as their portion; it is as it were thrown like a prey among them, Let him seize it that can. It is pity that such an instance as this gives of God’s bounty to man, and such a proof as arises from it of man’s obligation to God, should be thus abused. From the highest heavens, it is certain God holds all the children of men; to them he has given the earth; but to the children of God heaven is given.

2. The dead are not capable of praising him, (v. 17.) nor any that go into silence. The soul indeed lives in a state of separation from the body, and is capable of praising God; and the souls of the faithful, after they are delivered from the burthens of the flesh, do praise God, are still praising him; for they go up to the land of perfect light and constant business; but the dead body cannot praise God; death puts an end to our glorifying God in this world. They leave the greatest services in the field; the grave is a land of darkness and silence, where there is no work or device. This they leave God, with deliverance out of the hand of their enemies, “Lord, if they prevail to cut us off, the idols will carry the day, and there will be none to praise thee, to bear thy name, and to bear a testimony against the worshippers of idols.” The dead praise not the Lord, so as we do in the business and fruits of this life. See Ps. xxx. 9.—lxxvi. 10.

3. Therefore it concerns us to praise him; (v. 18.) But we, that we are alive, will bless the Lord; we and those that shall come after us will do it, from this time forth and for evermore, to the end of time; we and those we shall remove to, from this time forth, and to eternity. The dead praise not the Lord, therefore we will do it the more diligently. (1.) Others are dead, and an end is thereby put to their service, and therefore we lay upon ourselves to do so much the more for God, that we may fill up the gap. Moses my servant is dead, now therefore, Joshua, arise. (2.) We ourselves must shortly go to the land of silence: but while we do live, we will bless the Lord, will improve our time, and work that work of him that sent us into the world to praise him, before the night comes. and because the night comes wherein no man can work. The Lord will bless us; (v. 12.) he will do well for us, and therefore we will bless him, we will speak well of him. Poor returns for such receivings! Nay, we will not only do it ourselves, but will engage others to do it; Praise be the Lord; praise him, O my soul, and all the instruments of our praise, as we in ours; praise him when we are gone, that he may be praised for evermore. Hallelujah.

PSALMS CXVI.

This is a thanksgiving psalm; it is not certain whether David penned it upon any particular occasion, or upon a general and sweet reflection on God's gracious dealings with him, or the external and internal graces God had wrought for him, out of six troubles and seven, which deliverances draw from him many very lively expressions of devotion, love, and gratitude; with the pious affections our souls should be lifted up to God, in singing it. Observe, I. The great distress and danger that the psalmist was in, which almost drove him to despair, v. 3, 10, 11. II. The application he made to God, in that distress, v. 4. III. The experience he had of God's goodness to him, in answer to prayer; God heard him, (v. 1, 2.) pitied him, (v. 5, 6.) delivered him, v. 8. IV. His care respecting the acknowledgments he should make of the goodness of God to him, v. 12. 1. He will love God, v. 1. 2. He will thank God for his mercies, v. 2, 13, 17. 3. He will rest in him, v. 7. 4. He will walk before him, v. 9. 5. He will pay his vows of thanksgiving, in which he will own the tender regard God has had to him, and the gracious dealings with him, v. 17. Lastly, He will continue God's faithful servant to his life's end, v. 16. These are such breathings of a holy soul as bespeak it very happy.

1. I LOVE the Lord, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications. 2. Because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live. 3. The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me: I found trouble and sorrow. 4. Then called I upon the name of the Lord: O Lord, I beseech thee, deliver my soul. 5. Gracious is the Lord, and righteous; yea, our God is merciful. 6. The Lord preserveth the simple: I was brought low, and he helped me. 7. Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee. 8. For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. 9. I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living.

In this part of the psalm, we have, 1. A general account of David's experience, and his pious resolutions, (v. 1, 2.) which are as the contents of the whole psalm, and give an idea of it. 1. He had expected from God a good and great answer to prayer; he has heard my voice and my supplications. David, in straits, had humbly and earnestly begged mercy of God, and God had heard him; had graciously accepted his prayer, taken cognizance of his cause, and granted him an answer of peace. He has inclined his ear to me; this intimates his readiness and willingness to hear prayer; he lays his ear, as it were, to the mouth of prayer, to hear it, though it be but whispered in grace, and that cannot be overheard. He has inclined his ear and hearts, Jer. vii. 6. Yet it implies, also, that it is wonderful condescension in God to hear prayer; it is bowing his ear. Lord, what is man, that God should thus stoop to him? 2. He resolved, in consideration thereof, to devote himself entirely to God, and to his honour. (1.) He will love God the better. He begins the

The experience we have had of God's goodness to us, in answer to prayer, are great encouragements to us to continue praying; we have sped well, notwithstanding our unworthiness and our praying infirmities, and therefore why may we not? God answers prayer, to make us love it, to make us expect more from us, in return for his favour. Why should we glean in any other field, when we have been so well treated in this? Nay, I will call upon him as long as I live; Hebrew, In my days; every day, to the last day. Note, As long as we continue living, we must continue praying: this breath we must breathe till we breathe our last, because then we shall take our leave of it, and till then we have continual occasion for it.

A more particular account of God's gracious dealings with him, and the good impressions thereby made upon him.

1. God, in his dealings with him, showed himself a good God, and therefore he bears this testimony to him, and leaves it upon record; (v. 5.) "Gracious is the Lord, and righteous. He is righteous, and did me no wrong in afflicting me; he is gracious, and was very kind in supporting and delivering me."

Let us all speak of God as we have found; and have we ever found him otherwise than just and good? No, our God is merciful, merciful to us; and it is of his mercies that we are not consumed. Review David's experiences.

(1.) He was in great distress and trouble; (v. 3.) the sorrows of death compassed me; that is, such sorrows as were likely to be his death, such as were thought to be the very pangs of death; perhaps the extremity of bodily pain, or trouble of mind, is called here: the pains of hell; terror of conscience arising from sense of guilt. Note, The sorrows of death are great sorrows, and the pains of hell great pains. Let us therefore give diligence to prepare for the former, that we may escape the latter. These compassed him on every side, they arrested him, got hold upon him, so that he could not escape; without were fightings, within were fears. I found trouble and sorrow; not only they found me, but I found them. Those that are melancholy have a great deal of sorrow of their own finding, trouble which they create to themselves, by indulging fancy and condition, this has sometimes been the infirmity of good men. When God's providence makes us, let us not by our own imprudence make it worse.

(2.) In his trouble he had recourse to God by faithful and fervent prayer, v. 4. He tells us that he prayed; Then called I upon the name of the Lord: then, when he was brought to the last extremity, then he made use of this, not as the last remedy, but as the old and only remedy, which he had found a salve for every sore. He tells us what his prayer was; it was short, but to the purpose; "O Lord, I beseech thee deliver my soul; save me from death, and save me from sin, for that is it that is killing to the soul." Both the fervency of his prayer are intimated in these words, O Lord, I beseech thee; when we come to the throne of grace, we must come as beggars for an alms, for necessary food. The following words, (v. 5.) Gracious is the Lord, may be taken as part of his prayer, as a plea to enforce his request and encourage his faith and hope; "Lord, deliver my soul, for thou art gracious and merciful, and that only I depend upon for relief.

(3) God, in answer to this prayer, came in with seasonable and effectual relief. He found by experience that God is gracious and merciful, and in his compassion preserves the simple, v. 6. Because they are simple, sincere, and upright, and without guile, therefore God preserves them, as he preserved Paul, who had his conversation in the world, not with fleshly wisdom, but in simplicity and godly sincerity. Though they are simple, weak, and helpless, who cannot shift for themselves, men who depend upon God, yet God preserves them because they commit themselves to him, and have no confidence in their own sufficiency. Those who by faith put themselves under God’s protection shall be safe.

Let David speak his own experience.

[1.] God supported him under his troubles; “I was brought low, was plunged into the depth of misery, and then he helped me; helped me both to bear the worst, and to hope the best; helped me to pray, else desire had failed; helped me to wait, else faith had failed. I was one of the simple ones whom God preserved; the poor man who cried, and the Lord heard him,” xxxiv. 6. Note, God’s people are never brought so low, but that everlasting arms are under them, and they cannot sink who are sustained. Nay, it is in the time of need, at the dead lift, that God chooses to help, Deut. xxxiii. 36.

[2.] God saved him out of his troubles; (v. 8.) Those that had delivered; which means either the preservation of the distress he was ready to fall into, or the recovering of him from the distress he was already in. God graciously delivered, First, His soul from death. Note, It is God’s great mercy to us that we are alive; and the mercy is the more sensible, if we have been at death’s door, and yet have been spared and raised up, just turned to destruction and yet ordered to return; that a life so often forfeited, and so often exposed, should yet be lengthened out, is a miracle of mercy. The deliverance of the soul from spiritual and eternal death is especially to be acknowledged by all those who are now sanctified, and shall be shortly glorified. Secondly, His eyes from tears; that is, his heart from inordinate grief. It is a great mercy to be kept either from the occasions of sorrow, the evil that causes grief, or, however, from being swallowed up with overmuch sorrow. When God comforts those that are cast down, looses the mourner’s sackcloth, and giveth the elect a heart, he delivers their eyes from tears, which yet will not be perfectly done till we come to that world where God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes. Thirdly, His feet from falling, from falling into sin, and so into misery. It is a great mercy, when our feet are almost gone, to have God hold us by the right hand, (Lxxi. 23.) so that, though we enter into temptation, we are not overcome and overthrown by the temptation. Oh, with gladness then he delivers their eyes from tears, which yet will not be perfectly done till we come to that world where God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes.

2. David, in his returns of gratitude to God, showed himself a good man. God had done all this for him; and therefore,

(1.) He will live a life of delight in God; (v. 7.) Return unto thy rest, O my soul; [1.] "Repose thyself and be easy, and do not agitate thyself so with distrustful disquieting fears, as thou hast some reason to do in this world; for God has dealt kindly with thee, and therefore thou needest not fear that ever he will deal harshly with thee." [2.] "Repose thyself in God. Return to him as thy Rest, and seek not for that rest in the creature, which is to be had in him only." God is the soul’s Rest; in him only it can dwell at ease; to him therefore it must retire, and rejoice in him. He has dwelt bountifully with us; he has provided sufficiently for our comfort and refreshment, and encouraged us to come to him for the benefit of it, at all times, upon all occasions; let us therefore be satisfied with that. Return to that rest which Christ gives to the weary and heavy-laden, Matth. xxi. 28. Return to thy Noah; his name signifies rest, as the dove, when she found no rest, returned to the ark. I know no word more proper to close our eyes with at night, when going to sleep, nor to close them with at death, that long sleep, than this, Return to thy Rest, O my soul.

(2.) He will live a life of devotedness to God; (v. 9.) I will walk before the Lord in the land of the living, that is, in this world, as long as I continue to live in it. Note, [1.] It is our great duty to walk before the Lord, to do all we do as becomes us in his presence, and under his eye; to approve ourselves to him, as a holy God, by conformity to him as our sovereign Lord, by subjection to his will, and, as a God all-sufficient, by a cheerful confidence in him. [2.] I will walk before him, in the land of the living, Gen. xxi. 1. We must walk worthy of the Lord unto all well-pleasing. [2.] The consideration of this, that we are in the land of the living, should engage and quicken us to do so. We are spared and continued in the land of the living, by the power, and patience, and tender mercy, of our God, and therefore must make conscience of our duty to him. The land of the living is a land of mercy, which we ought to be thankful for; it is a land of opportunity, which we should improve. Canaan is called the land of the living, (Ezek. xxvi. 20.) and they whose lot is cast in such a valley of vision, are in a special manner concerned to set the Lord always before them. If God has delivered our soul from death, we must walk before him. A new life must be a new life indeed.

10. I believed, therefore have I spoken: I was greatly afflicted. 11. I said in my haste, All men are liars. 12. What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me? 13. I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. 14. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people. 15. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints. 16. O Lord, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thy handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds. 17. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the Lord. 18. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people. 19. In the courts of the Lord’s house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. Praise ye the Lord.

The Septuagint and some other ancient versions make these verses a distinct psalm separate from the former; and some have called it the Martyr’s psalm, I suppose for the pleasures. Therefore David makes confession of:

1. His faith; (v. 10.) I believed, therefore have I spoken. Which is quoted by the apostle, (2 Cor. iv. 13.) with application to himself and his fellow-ministers, who, though they suffered for Christ, were not ashamed to own him. David believed the being, providence, and promise, of God, particularly the assurance God had given him by Samuel, that he should exchange his crook for a sceptre: a great deal of hardship he went through, in the be
I. His fear; (v. 11.) I was greatly afflicted, and then I said in my haste, (somewhat rashly and inconsiderately, in my amazement, so some; when I was in consternation, in my flight, so others; when Saul was in pursuit of me.) All men are liable, all with whom he had to do, Saul and all his courtiers; his friends, who, he thought, would have stood by him, deserted him and disowned him, when he fell into disgrace at court. And some think it is especially a reflection on Samuel, who had promised him the kingdom, but deceived him; for, says he, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul, 2 Sam. xxvii. 1. Observe, 1. The faith of the best of saints is not perfect. They do believe, and speak well, (v. 10.) but now, through unbelief, he speaks amiss. 2. When we are under great and sore afflictions, especially if they continue long, we are apt to grow weak, to despond, and almost to despair of a good issue. Let us not therefore be harsh in censoring others, but carefully watch over ourselves when we are in trouble, xxxix. 1.-3. 3. If good men speak amiss, it is in their haste, in their ignorance, in their weakness, not to excuse, but to deplore; to admit, rather with premeditation, as the wicked man, who sits in the seat of the scornful; (Ps. i. 1.) sits, and speaks against his brother, I. 19, 20, 4. What we speak amiss in haste, we must by repentance unsay again, (as David, xxxii. 22.) and then it shall not be laid to our charge. Some make this to be no rash word of David's. He was greatly afflicted, and forced to fly, but he did not trust in man, nor make flesh his arm. "No," he said, "all men are liars; and there is no one that is just among men, and no one that can save his soul;" (Ps. lxxiii. 1.) and therefore my confidence was in God only, and in him I cannot be disappointed." In this sense the apostle seems to make it; (Rom. iii. 4.) Let God be true, and every man a liar, in comparison with God. All men are fickle and inconstant, and subject to change; and therefore let us cease from men, and cleave to God.

II. His gratitude, v. 12, &c. God had been better to him than his fears, and had graciously delivered him out of his distresses; and, in consideration hereof, 1. He inquires what returns he shall make; (v. 12.) What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me? Here he speaks, (1.) As one sensible of many mercies received from God; all his benefits. This psalm seems to have been penned upon occasion of some one particular benefit, (v. 6.) which God had vouchsafed to him; or, any thing, and that one brought many to mind; and therefore now he thinks of all God's benefits toward him. Note, When we speak of God's mercies, we should magnify them, and speak highly of them. (2.) As one solicitous and studious how to express his gratitude, What shall I render unto the Lord? Not as if he thought he could render any thing proportionable, or as a valuable consideration, for what he had received; we can no more pretend to give a recompence to God, than we can to merit any favour from him; but he desired to render something acceptable, something that God would be pleased with as the acknowledgment of a grateful mind. He asks God, What shall I render? Asks the priests, asks his friends, or rather, asks himself, and communes with his own heart about it. Note, Having received many benefits from God, we are concerned to inquire, What we shall render? 2. He resolves what returns he will make. (1.) He will in the most devout and solemn manner offer up his praises and prayers to God, v. 13, 17. [1.] I will offer the drink-offerings appointed by the law, in token of my thankfulness to God, and rejoice with my friends in God's goodness to me; this is called the cup of deliverance, because drunk in memory of the deliverance. The pious Jews had sometimes a cup of blessing, at their private meals, which the master of the family drank first of, with thanksgiving to God, and all at his table drank with him. But some understand it not of the cup, that has been present to God, but of the cup that God would put into his hand. I will receive, First, The cup of affliction. Many good interpreters understand it of that cup, that bitter cup, which is yet sanctified to the saints, so that to them it is a cup of salvation, Phil. i. 19. This shall turn to my salvation; it is a means of spiritual health. David's sufferings were typical of Christ's, and we, in ours, have communion with his, and partake of the cup of salvation. "God, having bestowed so many benefits upon me, whatever cup he shall put into my hands, I will readily take it, and not dispute it; welcome his holy will." Herein David speak the language of the Sion of David; (John xviii. 11.) The cup that my Father has given me, shall I not take it, and drink it? Secondly, The cup of consolation; (v. 3.) I will receive the benefits God bestows upon me as from his hand, and taste and see there in them, as that which is the portion not only of mine inheritance in the other world, but of my cup in this." [2.] I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving; the thank-offerings which God required, Lev. vii. 11, 12, &c. Note, These whose hearts are truly thankful, will express it in thank-offerings. We must first give our own selves to God, as living sacrifices, (Rom. xii. 1.) Cor. viii. 5.) and then lay out of what we have, for his honour, in works of thanksgiving and charity; for the sacrifices are sacrifices with which God is well-pleased, (Heb. xiii. 15, 16.) and this must accompany our giving thanks to his name. If God has been bountiful to us, the least we can do, in return, is, to be bountiful to the poor, Ps. xvi. 2, 3. Why should we offer that, to God which cost us nothing? [3.] I will call upon the name of the Lord. This he had promised, (v. 2.) and here he repeats it, (v. 13.) and again, v. 17. If we have received kindness from a man like ourselves, we tell him that we hope we shall never trouble him again; but God is pleased to reckon the prayers of his people an honour to him, and a delight, and no trouble; and therefore, in gratitude for former mercies, we must seek to him for further mercies, and continue to call upon him. (2.) He will always entertain good thoughts of God, as very tender of the lives and comforts of his people; (v. 15.) Precious is the sight of the Lord in the death of his saints; so precious, that he will not gratify Saul, or Absalom, or any of David's enemies, with his death, how earnestly soever they desire it. This truth David had comforted himself with, in the depth of his distress and danger; the event having confirmed it, he comforts others with it, who might be in like manner exposed. God has a people, even in this world, that are his saints, his merciful ones, or men of mercy; that have received mercy from him, and show mercy for his sake.
The saints of God are mortal and dying; nay, there are those that desire their death, and labour all they can to hasten it, and sometimes prevail to be the death of them; but it is precious in the sight of the Lord; their life is so, (2 Kings i. 13.) their blood is so, Ps. lxxii. 14. God often wonderfully prevents the death of his saints, where there is but a step between life and death. He will not only care for the preservation of their life, but order it for the best, in all the circumstances of it; and whoever kills them, how light soever they may make of it, they shall be made to pay dear for it, when inquisition is made for the blood of the saints, Matth. xxviii. 35. Though no man lays it to heart, when the righteous perish, God will make it to appear that he lays it to heart. This should make us willing to die, to die for Christ, if we are called to it, that our death shall be registered in heaven; and let that be precious to us which is so to God.

(3.) He will oblige himself to be God's servant all his days. Having asked, What shall I render? Here he surrenders himself, which was more than all burnt-offerings and sacrifice; (v. 16.) O Lord, truly I am thy servant. Here is, [1.] The relation in which David professes to stand to God; I am thy servant; I choose to be so, I will be so, I will do it, and I will tear my heart to say, I am thy servant. Sir: No Lord, I am truly thy servant, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I am so. And he repeats it, as that which he took pleasure in the thoughts of, and which he was resolved to abide by; I am thy servant, I am thy servant. Let others serve what master they will, truly I am thy servant. [2.] The ground of that relation: two ways men came to be servants of God, and as it is most usual to pray for the servants of God, so it is most common to pray that men may be made servants of God. Oh, Lord, I was born in thy house, I am the son of thy handmaid, and therefore thine. It is a great mercy to be the children of godly parents, as it obliges us to duty, and is pleasurable with God for mercy. Secondly, by redemption. He that procured the release of a captive took him for his servant. (Lord, thou hast loosed my bonds, these sorrows of death that compassed me, thou hast discharged me from them, and therefore I am thy servant, and entitled to thy protection, as well as obliged to thy work.) The very bonds which thou hast loosed shall tie me faster unto thee. Patrick.

(4.) He will make conscience of paying his vows, and making good what he had promised; not only that he would offer the sacrifices of praise, which he had vowed to bring, but perform all his other engagements to God, which he had laid himself under in the day of his affliction; (v. 14.) I will pay my vows; and again, (v. 18.) now in the presence of all his people. Note, Vows are debts that must be paid, for it is better not vow, than vow and not pay. He will pay his vows, [1.] Presently; he will not, like sorry debtors, delay the payment of them, or beg a day, but, I will pay them now, Ecc. v. 4. [2.] Publicly; he will not hide up his praises in a corner, but what service he has to do for God, he will do it in the presence of all his people, as a very great act of respect, and to show that he was not ashamed of the service of God, and that others might be invited to join with him. He will pay his vows, in the courts of the tabernacle, where there was a cloud of Israelites attending, in the midst of Jerusalem, that he might bring devotion into more reputation.

This psalm is short and sweet; I doubt the reason why we sing it so often as we do, is, for the shortness of it; but, if we neither understand and consider it, we shall much miss the sweetness of it, especially to us sinners of the Gentiles, on whom it casts a very favourable eye. Here is, 1. A solemn call to all nations to praise God, v. 1. For the beauty, and greatness, and splendor of his glory, and it is often for the sweetness of it, especially to us sinners. There is, 2. A repetition of that prayer suggested, that the prayers are so rare already; we have no need of repeating, and we have not. We know not what we say. In singing this psalm, we keep not up those pious and devout affections with which the spiritual sacrifice of praise ought to be kindled and kept burning.

1. O PRAISE the Lord, all ye nations: praise him, all ye people. 2. For his merciful kindness is great toward us, and the truth of the Lord endureth for ever. Praise ye the Lord. There is a great deal of gospel in this psalm. The apostle has furnished us with a key to it, (Rom. xv. 11.) where he quotes it as a proof that the gospel was to be preached to, and would be entertained by, the Gentile nations, which were called so great a stumbling-block, and which would offend them, when it is said, and they themselves had often sung it, Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles, and laud him, all ye people. Some of the Jewish writers confess that this psalm refers to the kingdom of the Messiah; nay, one of them has a fancy that it consists of two verses, to signify that in the days of the Messiah God should be glorified by two sorts of people; by the Jews, according to the law of Moses, and by the Gentiles, according to the seven precepts of the sons of Noah, which yet should make one church, as these two verses make one psalm. We have here, 1. The vast extent of the gospel-church, v. 1. For many ages, in Judah only was God known, and his name praised. The sons of Levi and the seed of Israel praised him, but the rest of the nations praised gods of wood and stone, (Dan. v. 4.) while there was no God in the land at all. Yet, at least, none openly that we know of, to the living and true God. But here all nations are called upon to praise the Lord, which could not be applied to the Old Testament times, both because this call was not then given to any of the Gentile nations, much less to all, in a language they understood; and because, unless the people of the land became Jews, and were circumcised, they were not admitted to praise God with them. But the gospel of Christ is ordered to be preached to all nations, and by him the partition-wall is taken down, and those that were afar off are made nigh. This was the mystery which was hid in prophecy for many ages, but was at length revealed in the accomplishment, That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, Eph. iii. 3, 6. Observe here, (1.) Who should be admitted into the church; all nations, and all people. The original words are the same that are used for the heathen' that rogue, and the people that imagine against Christ; (ii. 1.) they that had been enemies to his kingdom should become his willing subjects. The gospel of the kingdom was to be preached to all the world, for a witness to all nations, Matth. xxvii. 14. Mark xvi. 15. All nations shall be called, and to some of all nations the call shall be effectual, and they shall be disciplined. (2.) How their admission into the church is foretold; by a repeated call to faith; the gospel, being sent to all nations, should give them cause to praise God; the institution of gospel-ordinances would give them leave and opportunity to praise God; and the power of gospel-grace would give them hearts to praise him. These are highly favored whom God invites by his word, and inclines by his Spirit, to praise him, and so makes to be to him for a name and a praise. See Jer. xii. 11.

2. The cross of gospel-lovers, which are to be the matter of our praise, v. 2. In the gospel, those celebrated attributes of God, his mercy and his truth, shine most bright in themselves, and most comfortably to us: and the apostle, where he quotes this psalm, takes notice of these as the two great things for which the Gentiles should glorify God, (Rom. xv. 8, 9.) for the truth of God, and for his mercy. We, that enjoy the gospel, have reason to magnify the Lord, v. 1. For the power of his mighty gospel, His mercifull kindness is great toward us: it is strong, so the word signifies; it is mighty for the pardon of mighty sins, (Amos v. 12.) and for the working out of a mighty salvation. (2.) For the perpetuity of his truth; The truth of the Lord endures for ever. It was mercy, mere mercy to the Gentiles, that the gospel was sent among them; it was mercifull kindness prevailing toward them above their deserts; and in it the truth of the Lord, of his promise made unto the fathers, endures for ever; for though the Jews were hardened and expelled, yet the promise took its effect in the believing Gentiles, the spiritual seed of Abraham. God's mercy is the fountain of all our comforts, and his truth the foundation of all our hopes, and therefore for both we must praise the Lord.

PSALM CXVIII.

It is probable that David penned this psalm when he had, after the victory over the Philistines, or his passage through the Philistines, and gained a full possession of the kingdom to which he had been anointed. He then invites and stirs up his friends to join with him, not only in a cheerful acknowledgment of God's goodness, and a cheerful dependence upon that goodness for the future, but in having expectation of the promised Messiah, of whose kingdom and his exaltation to his was typical: to him, it is certain, the prophet here bears witness, in the latter part of the psalm: Christ himself applies it to himself, (Matt. xxv. 8, 9.) and the former part of the psalm may, fairly, and without forcing, be accommodated to him and his undertaking. Some think it was first calculated for the solemnity of the bringing of the ark to the city of David, and was afterward sung at the Israel of Tabernacles. In it, v. 1. David calls upon all about him to give to God the glory of his goodness, v. 1.-4. II. He encourages himself and others to trust in God, from the experience he had had of God's power and pity in this great and kind things he had done for him, v. 5. 18. III. He gives thanks for his advancement to the throne, as it was a figure of the exaltation of Christ, v. 19.-23. IV. The people, the priests, and the psalmist himself, triumph in the prospect of the Redeemer's kingdom, v. 24.-29. In singing this psalm, we must glorify God for his goodness, his goodness to us, and especially his goodness to us in Jesus Christ.

1. O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good; because his mercy endureth for ever. 2. Let Israel now say, that his mercy endureth for ever. 3. Let the house of Aaron now say, that his mercy endureth for ever. 4. Let them now that fear the Lord say, that his mercy endureth for ever. 5. I called upon the Lord in distress; the Lord answered me, and set me in a large place. 6. The Lord is on my side; I will not fear: what can man do unto me? 7. The Lord taketh my part with them that help me; therefore shall I see my desire upon them that hate me. 8. It is better to trust in the Lord, than to put confidence in man: 9. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes.

10. All nations compassed me about: but in the name of the Lord will I destroy them. 11. They compassed me about: yea, they compassed me about: but in the name of the Lord I will destroy them. 12. They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched as the fire of thorns: for in the name of the Lord I will destroy them. 13. Thou hast thrust sore at me, that I might fall: but the Lord helped me. 14. The Lord is my strength and song, and is become my salvation. 15. The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous: the right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly. 16. The right hand of the Lord is exalted; the right hand of the Lord doeth valiantly. 17. I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the Lord. 18. The Lord hath chastened me sore: but he hath not given me unto death.

It appears here, as often elsewhere, that David had his heart full of the goodness of God; he loved to think of it, loved to speak of it, and was very solicitous that God might have the praise of it, and others the comfort of it. The more our hearts are impressed with a sense of God's goodness, the more they will be enlarged in all manner of obedience. In these verses,

I. He celebrates God's mercy in general, and calls upon others to acknowledge it, from their own experience of it; (v. 1.) O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is not only good in himself, but good to you, and his mercy endureth for ever, not only in the everlasting Fountain, God himself, but in the never-failing streams of that mercy which shall run parallel with the longest line of eternity, and in the chosen vessels of mercy, who will be everlasting monuments of it. Israel, and the house of Aaron, and all that fear God, were called upon to trust in God; (cxv. 9.-11.) here they are called upon to confess that his mercy endureth for ever, and so to encourage themselves to trust in him: (v. 2.-4.) priests and people, Jews and proselytes, must all own God's goodness, and all join in the same thankful song; if they can say no more, let them say this for him, that his mercy endureth for ever, that they have had experience of it all their days, and consider in it for good things that shall last for ever. The praises and thanksgivings of all that truly fear the Lord, shall be as pleasing to him as those of the house of Israel, or the house of Aaron.

II. He preserves an account of God's gracious dealings with him in particular, which he communicates to others, that they might thence fetch both songs of praise, and supports of faith, and both that God would have glory. David had, in his time, waded through a great deal of difficulty, which gave him great experience of God's goodness.

Let us therefore observe here,

1. The great distress and danger that he had been in, which he reflects upon, for the magnifying of God's goodness to him in his present advancement. There are many who, when they are lifted up, care not for hearing or speaking of their former depressions. But David knew all the comforts of his own low estate. He was in distress, (v. 5.) greatly straitened and at a loss: there were many that hated him; (v. 7.) and that could not but be a grief to one of an ingenuous spirit, that strove to gain the good affections of all. All nations compassed me about, v. 10. All the nations adjacent to Israel set themselves to give disturbance to David, when he was newly come to the throne of Philistines, Meabites, Syrians, Ammonites, &c. We read of his enemies round about; they were confederate against him, and thought to cut off all succours from him. This endeavour of his enemies to surround him is repeated; (v. 11.) They compassed me about, yea, they compassed me about, which intimates that they were virulent and violent, and, for a time, prevalent, in their attempts against him, and that, when put into disorder, they rallied again, and pursued each other in the face of David, as bees do that have lost their hive. Moreover, as there were many populous and great cities, so numerous were they, so noisy, so vexatious; they came flying upon him, came upon him in swarms, set upon him with their malignant stings; but it was to their own destruction, as the bee, they say, loses her life with her sting. Animagique in vulnere parent—She lays down her life in the wound. Lord, how are they increased that trouble me!

Two ways David was brought into trouble; (1.) By the injuries that men did him; (v. 13.) Thou (O enemy) hast thrust sore at me, with many a despicable push, that I might fall into sin and into ruin. Thrusting, thou hast thrust at me, (so the word is,) so that I was ready to fall. Satan is the great enemy that thrusts sore at us by his temptations, to cast us down from our excellency, that we may fall from our God, and from our comfort in him; and, if God had not upheld us by his grace, his thrusts had been fatal to us. The psalm of David was written when he had been put to these throes; (v. 18.) The Lord has chastened me sore. Men thrust at him for his destruction, God chastened him for his instruction; they thrust at him with the malice of enemies, God chastened him with the love and tenderness of a Father. Perhaps he refers to the same trouble which God, the Author of it, designed for his profit, that by it he might partake of hisholiness; (Heb. xii. 10, 11.) nevertheless, men, who were the instruments of it, meant not so, neither did their heart desire it, with a view to their own destruction, and not to his. God has thus chastened him; (v. 18.) The Lord has chastened me sore.

3. The improvement he made of this favour.

(1.) It encouraged him to trust in God: from his own experience he can say, It is better, more wise, more comfortable, and more safe; there is more reason for it, and it will speed better, to trust in the Lord, than to put confidence in man, yea, though it be the son of man. (Psa. 13, 6, 9.) He that devotes himself to God's guidance and government, with God's dependence upon God's wisdom, power, and goodness, has a better security to make him easy, than if all the kings and potentates of the earth should undertake to protect him.

(2.) It enabled him to triumph in that trust. (1.) He triumphs in God, and in his relation to him, and interest in him; (v. 6.) The Lord is on my side. He is a righteous God, and therefore excites my righteous courage, and will plead it. If we are on God's side, he is on ours; if we be for him and with him, he will be for us and with us; (v. 7.) The Lord takes my part, and stands up for me, with them that help me. He is to me among my helpers, and so one of them; he is all in all, both to them and me, and without him I could not help myself, nor could any friend have I in the world help me.

Thus, (v. 14.) The Lord is my Strength, he will make me strong against him without him I am weak and sad, but on him I stay myself as my Strength, both for doing and suffering; and in him I solace myself as my Song, by which I both express my joy, and ease my grief; and, making him so, I find him so: he strengthens my heart with his graces, and rejoices my heart with his comforts. If God be our Strength, he must be our Song; if he work all our works in us, he must have all praise and glory from us. God is sometimes the Strength of his people, when he is not their Song; they have spiritual supports, when they want spiritual delights; but if he be both to us, we have abundant reason to triumph in him; for if he be our Strength and our Song, he is become not only our Saviour, but our Salvation; for his being our Strength is our protection to the salvation, and his being our Song is an earnest and foretaste of the salvation.

First, he is sure they cannot hurt him; God is for me, and then I will not fear what man can do against me; v. 6. He can set them all at defiance, and is not disturbed at any of their attempts. They do nothing to me, but what God permits them to do; they can do me no real damage, for they cannot separate me from God, they cannot do any thing but what God can make to work for my good. The enemy is a man, a depending creature, whose power is limited, and subordinate to a higher power, and therefore I will not fear him." Who art thou, that thou shouldest be afraid of a man that shall die? Isa. lii. 12. The apostle quotes this, with application to all mankind (Heb. xiii. 6). What a sadly false, as boldly as David himself, The Lord is my Helper, I will not fear what man shall do unto me; let him do his worst. Secondly, He is sure that he shall be too hard for them at last; "I shall see my desire upon them that hate me;" (v. 7.) I shall see them defeated in their designs against me; now, In the name of the Lord I will destroy them; (v. 10-12.) I trust in the name of the Lord that I shall destroy them; and in my name. I will cause them to cease their strength, by warrant from him; and with an eye to his glory, not confiding in myself, or taking vengeance for myself. Thus he went forth against Goliath, in the name of the God of Israel, 1 Sam. xvii. 45. David says this as a type of Christ, who triumphed over the powers of darkness, destroyed them, and made a show of them openly. [5.] He triumphs in an assurance of the continuance of his funerary, and his life. First, Of his comfort; (v. 15.) The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous, and in mine particularly, in my family. The dwellings of the righteous in this world are but tabernacles, mean and moveable; here we have no city, no continuing city. But these tabernacles are more comfortable to them than the palaces of the wicked are to them; for in the house where religion rules, 1. There is salvation, safety from the perils of eternal salvation, which is come to this house, Luke xix. 9. 2. Where there is salvation, there is cause for rejoicing, for continual joy in God. Holy joy is called the joy of salvation, for in that there is abundant matter for joy. 3. Where there is rejoicing, there ought to be the voice of rejoicing, praise, and thanksgiving. Let God be served with joyfulness and gladness of heart, and let the voice of that rejoicing be heard daily in our families, to the glory of God, and the encouragement of others. Secondly, Of his victory; The right hand of the Lord doth valiantly, (v. 15.) and is exalted; for (as some read it) it has exalted me. The right hand of God's power is engaged for his people, and it acts vigorously for them, and therefore victorious. For what difficulty can stand before the divine valour? We are weak, and act cowardly for ourselves; but God is mighty, and acts valiantly for us, with jealously and resolution, Isa. lxi. 5, 6. There is spirit, as well as strength, in all God's operations for his people. And when God's right hand doth valiantly for our salvation, it ought to be exalted in our praises. Thirdly, Of his life; (v. 17.) I shall not die by the hands of my enemies that seek my life, but live, and declare the works of the Lord; I shall live a monument of God's mercy and power; his works shall be declared in me, and I will make the business of my life to praise and magnify God, looking upon that as the end of my preservation. Note, It is not worth while to live for any other purpose than to declare the works of God, for his honour, and the encouragement of others to serve him and trust in him. Such as these were the triumphs of the Son of David, in the assurance he had of the success of his undertaking, and that the good pleasure of the Lord should prosper in his hand. 19. Open to me the gates of righteousness: I will go in to them, and I will praise the Lord; 20. This gate of the Lord, into which the righteous shall enter. 21. I will praise thee; for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation. 22. The stone when the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner. 23. This is the Lord's doing; it is marvellous in our eyes. 24. This is the day which the Lord hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it. 25. Save now, I beseech thee, O Lord: O Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity. 26. Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord: we have blessed you out of the house of the Lord. 27. God is the Lord, which hath showed us light: bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar. 28. Thou art my God, and I will praise thee; thou art my God, I will exalt thee. 29. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever. We have here an illustrious prophecy of the humiliation and exaltation of our Lord Jesus, his sufferings, and the glory that should follow. Peter thus applies it directly to the chief priests and scribes; and none of the chief priests or elders heard this, as misapplying it, Acts iv. 11. Now observe here. 1. The preface with which this precious prophecy is introduced, v. 10.-21. 1. The psalmist desires admission into the sanctuary of God, there to celebrate the glory of him that cometh in the name of the Lord; Open to me the gates of righteousness. So the temple-gates are called, because they were shut against the uncircumcised, and forbade the stranger to enter; and hence, to come night or day, there was called sacrifices of righteousness. Those that would enter into communion with God in holy ordinances, must become humble suitors to God for admission. And when the gates of righteousness are opened to us, we must go into them, must enter into the holiest, as far as we have leave, and praise the Lord. Our business within God's gates, is, to praise God; therefore we should long till the gates of heaven be opened to us, that we may go in and dwell in God's house above, where we shall be at peace with him. 2. He sees admission granted him; (v. 20.) This is the gate of the Lord, the gate of his appointment, into which the righteous shall enter; as if he had said, "The gate you knocked at is opened, and you are welcome, Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Some by this gate understand Christ, by whom we are taken into fellowship with God, in whose name our praises are accepted; he is the Way; there is no coming to the Father but by him; (John xiv. 6.) he is the Door of the sheep; (John x. 9.) he is the Gate of the temple, by whom, and by whom only, the righteous, and they only, shall enter, and come into God's righteousness, as the expression is, lxxix. 27. The psalmist triumphs in the discovery, that the gate of righteousness, which had been so long shut, and so long knocked at, was now at length opened. 3. He prays to have thanks given to God for this favour; (v. 21.) I will praise thee. They that saw Christ's day at so great a distance, saw cause to praise God for the prospect; for in him they saw that God had heard them, had heard the prayers of the Old Testament saints, for the coming of the Messiah, and would be their Salvation. II. The prophecy itself, v. 22, 23. This may have some reference to David's preferment; he was the stone whom Saul and his courtiers rejected, but was by the wonderful providence of God advanced to be the head-stone of the building; but its principal reference is to Christ: and here we have. 1. His humiliation; he is the Stone which the builders refused; he is the Stone cut out of the moun.
taint without hands, Dan. ii. 34. He is a stone, not only for strength, and firmness, and duration, but for life, in the building of the spiritual temple; and yet a precious stone; (1 Pet. ii. 6.) for the foundation of the gospel-church must be saphires, Isa. lvi. 2. This Stone was rejected by the builders, by the rulers and people of the Jews; (Acts iv. 8, 10, 11.) they refused to own him as the Stone, the Messiah promised; they would not build their faith upon him, nor join themselves to him; they would make no use of him, but go on in their building without him; they denied him in the presence of Pilate, (Acts iii. 13.) when they said, We have found no basis to set down Christ. Thus the builders Stone, threw it among the rubbish out of the city; nay, they stumbled at it. This was a disgrace to Christ, but it proved the ruin of those that thus made light of him. Rejecters of Christ are rejected of God.

2. His exaltation; he is become the Head-stone of the corner; he is advanced to the highest degree both of honour and usefulness, to be above all, and all in him. He is the chief Corner-stone in the foundation, in the building and Gentile are united, that there may be built up one holy house. He is the chief Top-stone in the corner, in whom the building is completed, and who must in all things have the pre-eminence, as the Author and Finisher of our faith. Thus highly has God exalted him, because he humbled himself; and we, in compliance with God's design, must make him the Foundation of our hope, the Centre of our unity, and the End of our living.

The Hand of God in all this; This is the Lord's doing, it is from the Lord, it is with the Lord; it is the product of his counsel, it is his contrivance; both the humiliation and the exaltation of the Lord Jesus were his work, Acts ii. 23.—iv. 27. 28. He sent him, sealed him, his hand went with him through all his whole undertaking, and from first to last he did all his Father's will; and this ought to be marvelous in our eyes. Christ's name is Wonderful; and the redemption he wrought out is the most amazing of all God's works of wonder; it is what the angels desire to look into, and will be admiring to eternity; much more ought we to admire it, who owe all to it. Without controversy, great is this mystery of godliness.

III. The joy wherewith it is entertained, and the acclamations which attend this prediction: 1. Let the day be solemnized to the honour of God with great joy; (v. 24.) Make his joy our joy. The whole time of the gospel-dispensation, that accepted time, that day of salvation, is what the Lord has made so; it is a continual feast, which ought to be kept with joy. Or it may very fitly be understood of the Christian sabbath, which we sanctify in remembrance of Christ's resurrection, when the rejected Stone began to be exalted; and so, (1.) Here is the doctrine of the Christian sabbath; It is the day which the Lord has made; it is a day of rest, made remarkable, made holy, has distinguished it from other days; he has made it for man; it is therefore called the Lord's day, for it bears his image and superscription. (2.) The duty of the sabbath; the work of the day, that it is to be done in his day; We will rejoice and be glad in it; not only in the institution of the day, that there is such a day appointed, but in the occasion of it, Christ's becoming the Head of the corner. This was the only day he was anointed, that was anointed for his service, appointed to pronounce a blessing, in his name, upon all his loyal subjects that love him and his government in sincerity, Eph. vi. 24. We assure you that, in and through Jesus Christ, you are blessed; for he came to bless you; You are blessed out of the house of the Lord, with spiritual blessings in heavenly places, (Eph. i. 3.) and therefore have reason to bless him who hath thus blessed you.

Let the sacrifices of thanksgiving he offered to his honour, who offered for us the great atoning sacrifice, v. 27. Here is, (1.) The privilege we enjoy by Jesus Christ: God is the Lord which has shown us light; God is Jehovah, is known by that name, a God performing what he has promised, and perfecting what he has begun, Exod. vii. 6. He has shown us light, he has given us the knowledge of

(1.) Let him have the acclamations of the people, as is usual at the inauguration of a prince; let every one of his loyal subjects shout for joy; Save now, I beseech thee, O Lord. This Long live the King, and speaks a hearty joy for his accession to the crown, an entire satisfaction in his government, and a zealous affection to the interests and honour of it. Hosanna signifies, Save now, I beseech thee. [1.] "Lord, save me, I beseech thee, let this Saviour be my Saviour, and, in order to that, my Ruler; let me be taken under his protection, and owned as one of his willing subjects. His enemies and my enemies, and cast out all their reproaches upon me from them. Send me an interest in that prosperity which his kingdom brings with it to all those that entertain it. Let my soul prosper and be in health, in that peace and righteousness which his government brings, lxxii. 3. Let me have victory over those lusts that war against my soul, and let divine grace go on in my heart, conquering, and to conquer." [2.] "Lord, preserve him, I beseech thee, even the Saviour himself, and send him prosperity in all his undertakings; give success to his gospel, and let it be mighty through God, to the pulling down of strong-holds, and reducing souls to their allegiance to him. Let his name be sanctified, his kingdom come, his will be done," thus let prayer be made for him continually, lxxii. 15. On the Lord's day, when we rejoice and are glad in his kingdom, we must pray for the advancement of it more and more, and its establishment upon the ruins of the Devil's kingdom. When Christ made his public entry into Jerusalem, he was thus met by his well-wishers, (Matth. xxi. 9.) Hosanna to the Son of David; long live King Jesus; let him reign for ever.

(2.) Let the priests, the Lord's ministers, do their part in this great solemnity, v. 26. [1.] Let them bless the prince with their praises; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Jesus Christ is he that cometh; i.e., he that was to come, and is, yet to come again, Rev. i. 8. He comes in the name of the Lord, with a commission from him, to act for him, to do his will, and to seek his glory; and therefore we must say, Blessed be he that cometh; we must rejoice that he is come, we must speak well of him, admire him, and esteem him highly, as one we are eternally obliged to; call him blessed Jesus, blessed for ever, xiv. 2. We must bid him welcom into our hearts, saying, Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; come in to thy grace, and take possession of me for thine own. We must bless his faithful ministers that come in his name, and receive them for his sake, Isa. lli. 7. John xiii. 20. We must pray for the enlargement and edification of his church; for the ripening of things for his second coming; and then, that he who has said, Surely I come quickly, would even so come. [2.] Let them bless the people with their prayers; We have blessed you out of the house of the Lord; the Lord's people are thus blessed; we are appointed, to pronounce a blessing, in his name, upon all his loyal subjects that love him and his government in sincerity, Eph. vi. 24. We assure you that, in and through Jesus Christ, you are blessed; for he came to bless you; You are blessed out of the house of the Lord with spiritual blessings in heavenly places, (Eph. i. 3.) and therefore have reason to bless him who hath thus blessed you.

Let the sacrifices of thanksgiving he offered to his honour, who offered for us the great atoning sacrifice, v. 27.
himself and his will; he has shined upon us, so some; has favoured us, and lifted up us upon the light of his countenance; he has given us occasion for joy and rejoicing, which is light to the soul, by giving us a prospect of everlasting light in heaven. The day which the Lord has made, is it not good? The duty which this privilege calls for: Bind the sacrifice with cords, that, being killed, the blood of it may be sprinkled upon the horns of the altar, according to the law; or perhaps it was the custom (though we read not of it elsewhere) to bind the sacrifice to the horns of the altar, while things were getting ready for the slaying of it. Or this may have a peculiar significance here; the sacrifice we are to make is a spiritual one, redeeming ourselves, not to be slain upon the altar, but living sacrifices. (Rom. xii. 1.) to be bound to the altar; spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise, in which our hearts must be fixed and engaged, as the sacrifice was bound with cords to the horns of the altar, not to start back. Lastly, The psalmist concludes with his own thankful acknowledgments of divine grace, in which he calls upon others to join with him, v. 28, 29. (1.) He will call upon the name of God, and speak of the God of the covenant in his own heart, and in the hearts of others, and this because of his covenant-relationship to him, and interest in him; 'Thou art my God, on whom I depend, and to whom I am devoted, who ownest me, and art owned by me; and therefore I will praise thee.* (2.) He will have all about him to give thanks to God for these glad tidings of great joy to all people, that there is a Redeemer, even Christ the Lord; in him it is that God is good to man, and that his mercy endures for ever, in him the covenant of grace is made, and in him it is made sure, made good, and made an everlasting covenant. He concludes this psalm as he began it; (v. 1.) for God's glory must be the alpha and omega, the beginning and the end, of all our addresses to him. Hallowed be thy name, and thine is the glory. And this fitsly closes a prophecy of Christ. The angels give thanks for man's redemption. Glory to God in the highest. (Luke i. 14.) for there is on earth peace, to which we must echo with our hosannas, as they did. Luke xix. 38. Peace in heaven to us through Christ, and therefore Glory in the highest.

PSALM CXIX.

This is a psalm by itself, like none of the rest, it excels them all, and shines brightest in this constellation. It is much longer than any of them; more than twice as long as any of them. It is not making long prayers that Christ censures, but making them for a pretence; which intimates that they are in themselves good and commendable. It seems to me to be a collection of David's psalms divided in him, his first short in sudden breathings and elevations of his soul to God, which he wrote down as they occurred, and, toward the latter end of his time, gathered out of his day-book, where they lay scattered; added to them many like words, and dispersed in which he thought there was selectness in any coherence between the verses, but, like Solomon's proverbs, it is a chest of gold rings, not a chain of gold links. And we may not only learn, by the psalmist's example, how to divide the contents of a collection of verses into two parts, according to the manner in which it is selected, but also how to do it, that is to say, by the law of proportion, and the connexion of sentiment, which none have said of this psalm is true. He that shall read it considerately, it will either warm him or shame him.

1. The composition of it is singular, and very exact. It is divided into two parts, according to the number of the letters of the Hebrew alphabet, and each part consists of eight verses: all the verses of the first part beginning with Aleph, all the verses of the second with Beth, and so on, without any flaw, through all the whole psalm. Archbishop Tillotson says, it seems to have more of poetical skill and number in it, than we at this distance can easily understand. Some have called it the saints' alphabet; and it were to be wished we had it as ready in our memories, as the very letters of our alphabet, as reckoning by words. A B C D E F G H I J K L M N O P Q R S T U V W X Y Z, and a ready access to it, of use to himself to observe this method, as it obliged him to seek for thoughts, and search for them, that he might fill up the quota of every part; and the letter he was to begin with, he thought he must try and mind to upon occasion; by which the letter the first word would be got, and that would bring in the whole verse; thus young people would the more easily learn it by heart, and retain it the better even in old age. If any censure there be on this method (and there is none now quite out of fashion, let them know that the royal psalmist despises their censure; he is a teacher of babes, and if this method may be beneficial to them, he can easily stoop to it, if it can be to the advantage of others.

2. The general scope and design of it is to magnify the law, and make it honourable; to set forth the excellency and usefulness of divine revelation, and to recommend it to us, not only for the entertainment, but for the government, of our souls, by the psalmist's own example; who speaks by experience of the benefit of it, and of the good impressions made upon him by it; for he praises God, and earnestly prays, to the first, for the continuance of that grace which he had obtained; and to ordain him in the way of his duty. There are ten several words by which divine revelation is called in this psalm; and they are synonymous, each of them expressive of the whole case considered; God, the law, the covenant, the holy, the word, the promises (both that which God expects from us, and that which tells what we may expect from him,) and of the system of religion which is founded upon it, and guided by it. The things contained in the scripture, and drawn from it, are here called, 1. God's law, as the standard, the rule, the way, in which he has conducted himself; and, 2. His providence, because they are the rule both of his providence and of our obedience. 3. His testimonies, because they are solemnly declared to the world, and attended with the sanction of heaven, as a pledge of his truth, because given with authority, and (as the word signifies) lodged with us as a trust. 4. His precepts, because prescribed to us, and not left indifferently. 5. His word, or saying, because it is the device of his mind, and, 6. Christ, the essential Eternal Word, is all in all. 7. His judgments, because framed in infinite wisdom, and because by them we must both judge and be judged. 8. His righteousness, because it is all holy, just, and good, and the standard of all righteousness; 9. His statutes, because they are fixed and determined, and of perpetual obligation. 10. His truths, or truthfulness, because the principles upon which the divine law is built are eternal truths. And I think there are only these two words (it is v. 122.) in all this long psalm, in which there is not; one or other of these ten words; only in three or four they are used concerning God's providence, or David's practice, as v. 75, 84, 151; and, v. 132, they are used concerning God's name. The great affection and affection David had for the word of God, is the more admirable, considering how little he had of it, in comparison with what we have; no more perhaps, in writing, than the first books of Moses, which were but the duodenary of this day; and we may shame us who enjoy the full discoveries of divine revelation, and yet are so cold towards it. In singing this psalm, there is work for all the devout affections of a sanctified soul, and we may be sure that we shall, one another, and as we proceed in the Psalms, we shall find that here which is proper for them. And it is so far from being a tedious repetition of the same thing, as may seem to those who look over it cursorily, that, if we duly meditate on it, we shall see that it has a new thought, and something in it very lively. And this, as many other of David's psalms, teaches us to be sentiments in our devotions, both alone, and when others join in them. For, ordinarily, the effect of weaker Christians, is more likely to be raised, and kept by short expressions, the sense of which lies in a little room, than by long and laboured periods.
1. ALEPH.

BLESSED are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the Lord. 2. Blessed are they that keep his testimonies, and that seek him with the whole heart. 3. They also do no iniquity: they walk in his ways.

The psalmist here shows that godly people are happy people: they are, and shall be, blessed indeed. Felicity is the thing we all pretend to aim at and pursue; he does not say whereon it consists; it is enough for us to know what we must do, and he that will train to it, and that we are here told. All men would be happy, but few take the right way; God has here laid before us the right way, which we may be sure will end in happiness, though it be strait and narrow. Blissednesses are to the righteous; in all manner of blessednesses.

Now observe the characters of the happy people. They are happy,

1. The make the will of God the rule of all their actions, and govern themselves, in their whole conversation, by that rule; they walk in the law of the Lord, v. 1. God's word is a law to them, not only in this or that particular instance, but in the whole course of their conversation; they walk within the hedges of that law, which they dare not break through, by doing any thing it forbids; and they walk in the paths of that law, which they will not trifle in, but press forward in them toward the mark, taking every step by rule, and never walking at all adventures. This is walking in God's ways, (v. 3,) the ways which he has marked out to us, and has appointed us to walk in. It will not serve us to make religion the subject of our discourse, but we must make it the rule of our walk; we must walk in his ways, not in the way of the world, or of our own hearts, Job xxviii. 10. 11. —xxxi. 7.

2. Who are upright and honest in their religion; Undeened in the way; not only who keep themselves pure from the pollutions of actual sin, unspotted from the world, but who are habitually sincere in their intentions; in whose spirit there is no guile; who are really as good as they seem to be, and row the same way as they look.

3. Who are true to the trust reposed in them, as God's professing people. It was the honour of the Jews, that to them were committed the oracles of God; and blessed are they who preserve pure and entire that sacred deposit; who keep his testimonies as a treasure of inestimable value, keep them as the apple of their eye, so keep them as to carry the comfort of them themselves to another world, and leave the knowledge and profession of them to those who shall come after them in this world. They who would walk in the law of the Lord must keep his testimonies, his truths; those will not long make conscience of good practices, who do not adhere to good principles. Or, his testimonies may denote his covenant; the ark of the covenant is called the ark of the testimony; those do not keep covenant with God who do not keep the commandments of God.

4. Who have a single eye to God as their chief good: and highest End in all they do in religion; (v. 2.) They seek him with their whole heart. They do not seek themselves and their own things, but God. They do not look for that to be their end, which God may be glorified in their obedience, and that they may be happy in God's acceptance. He is, and will be, the Rewarder, the Reward, of all those who thus seek him diligently, seek him with the heart; for that is it that God looks at and requires; and with the whole heart; if the heart be divided between him and the world, it is faulty.

5. Who carefully avoid all sin; (v. 3.) They do no iniquity; they do not allow themselves in any sin, they do not commit it as those do who are the servants of sin; they do not make a practice of it, do not make of ruin of it. They are cautious to themselves of much iniquity that clogs them in the ways of God, but not of that iniquity which draws them out of those ways. Blessed and holy are they who thus exercise themselves to have always conscientious void of offence.

4. Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts diligently. 5. O that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes! 6. Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect unto all thy commandments.

We are here taught, 1. To own ourselves under the highest obligations to walk in God's law. The tempter would possess men with an opinion that they are at their liberty whether they will make the word of God their rule or no, that though it may be good, yet it is not so necessary as if we were taught our first parents to question the command; Hath God said, ye shall not eat? And therefore we are concerned to be well established in this; (v. 4.) Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts, to make religion our rule; and to keep them diligently, to make religion our business, and to mind it carefully and constantly. We are bound, and must obey to our peril.

To look up to God for wisdom and grace to do so; (v. 5.) Oh that my ways were directed accordingly; not only that all events concerning us may be so ordered and disposed by the providence of God, as not in any thing to be a hinderance to us, but a furtherance rather, in the service of God, but that our hearts may be so guided and influenced by the Spirit of God, that we may not in any thing transgress God's commandments: not only that our eyes may be directed to behold God's statutes, but our hearts directed to keep them. See how the desire and prayer of a good man exactly agree with the will and command of a good God; "Then wouldst have me keep thy precepts, and, Lord, I fain would keep them." This is the will of God, even our sanctification; and it should be our will.

3. To encourage ourselves in the way of our duty, with a prospect of the comfort we shall find in it. v. 6. Note, (1.) It is the unchanging character of every good man, that he has a respect to all God's commandments. He has a respect to the command, eyes it as his copy, aims to conform to it, is sorry wherein he comes short; and what he does in religion, he does with a conscientious regard to the command, because it is his duty. He has respect to all the commandments, one as well as another, because they are all backed with the same authority, (Jam. ii. 10, 11.) and all levelled at the same end, the glorifying of God's name; and are true to the end, to have a sincere respect to any command will have a general respect to every command; to the commands of both testaments and both tables; to the prohibitions and the precepts; to those that concern both the inward and the outward man, both the head and the heart; to those that forbid the most pleasant and gainful sins, and to those that require the most difficult and hazardous duties. (2.) Those who have a sincere respect to all God's commandments will not be ashamed; not only they will thereby be kept from doing that which will turn to their shame, but they shall have confidence toward God, and boldness of access to the throne of his grace, 1 John iii. 21. They shall have credit before men, their honesty will be their honour; and they shall have clearness and courage in their own souls, they shall.
7. I will praise thee with uprightness of heart, when I shall have learned thy righteous judgments. 8. I will keep thy statutes: O forsake me not utterly.

Here is, 1. David's endeavour to perfect himself in his religion, and to make himself (as we say) master of his business. He hopes to learn God's righteous judgments; he knew much, but he was still pressing forward, and desired to know more, as knowing this, that he had not yet attained; but, as far as perfection is attainable in this life, he reached towards it, and will not take up short of it. As long as we live, we must be scholars in Christ's school, and sit at his feet; but we should aim to be head-scholars, and not pupils. God's judgments are all righteouness, and therefore it is desirable not only to learn them, but to be learned in them, mighty in the scriptures.

2. The use he would make of his divine learning. He coveted to be learned in the laws of God, not that he might make himself a name and interest among men, or fill his own head with entertaining speculations, but, (1.) That he might give God the glory of his learning; I will praise thee, when I have learned thy judgments; intimating, that he could not learn, unless God taught him; and that divine instructions are special blessings, which we have reason to be thankful for. Though Christ keeps a free school, and teaches without money and without price, yet he expects his scholars should give him thanks both for his word and for his Spirit; surely it is a mercy worth thanks, to be taught so gainfully a calling as religion is. Those have learned a good lesson who have learned to praise God, for that is the work of angels, the work of heaven. It is an easy thing to praise God in word and tongue; but those only are well learned in this mystery who have learned to praise him with uprightness of heart, are inward with him in praising him, and sincerely aim at his glory in the course of their conversation, as well as in the exercises of devotion. God accepts only the prayers of the upright: (2.) That he might himself come under the government of that learning; When I shall have learned thy righteous judgments, I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learn them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them.

3. His prayer to God, not to leave him; O forsake me not. He might himself say, I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments; but he might also say, I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments, I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learned them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them. When we are under the government of that learning, when we have been instructed by that learning, we cannot act contrary to it.

4. His prayer to God, that he might not depart from him, that he might not forsake him. I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments; I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learn them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them. When we are under the government of that learning, when we have been instructed by that learning, we cannot act contrary to it.

5. His prayer to God, that he might not depart from him, that he might not forsake him. I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments; I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learn them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them. When we are under the government of that learning, when we have been instructed by that learning, we cannot act contrary to it.

6. His prayer to God, that he might not depart from him, that he might not forsake him. I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments; I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learn them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them. When we are under the government of that learning, when we have been instructed by that learning, we cannot act contrary to it.

7. His prayer to God, that he might not depart from him, that he might not forsake him. I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments; I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learn them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them. When we are under the government of that learning, when we have been instructed by that learning, we cannot act contrary to it.

8. His prayer to God, that he might not depart from him, that he might not forsake him. I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments; I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learn them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them. When we are under the government of that learning, when we have been instructed by that learning, we cannot act contrary to it.

9. His prayer to God, that he might not depart from him, that he might not forsake him. I will praise thee when I have learned thy judgments; I will keep thy statutes. We cannot keep them, unless we learn them; but we learn them in vain, if we do not keep them. Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution, in the strength of his grace, to keep them. When we are under the government of that learning, when we have been instructed by that learning, we cannot act contrary to it.

10. With my whole heart have I sought thee: O let me not wander from thy commandments.

Here is, 1. David's experience of a good work God had wrought in him, which he takes the comfort of, and pleads with God; I have sought thee, sought to thee, as to the Oracle, as to the right of my Happiness, sought thee as my God; for should not a people seek into their God? If I have not yet found thee, I have sought thee, and thou never saidst, Seek, in vain, nor wilt say so to me, for I have sought thee with my heart, with my whole heart; sought thee only, sought thee diligently. 2. His prayer for the preservation of that work; Thou hast not inclined me to seek thy precepts, never suffered me to wander from them. The best are sensible of their aptness to wander; and the more we have found of the pleasure there is in keeping God's commandments, the more afraid we shall be of wandering from them, and the more earnest we shall be in prayer to God for his grace to prevent our wanderings.

11. Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee.

Here is, 1. The close application which David makes of the word of God to himself; he hid it in his heart, laid it up there, that it might be ready to him whenever he had occasion to use it: he laid it up as that which he valued highly, and had a warm regard for, and which he was afraid of losing and being robbed of. God's word is a treasure worth laying up, and there is no laying it up safe but in our hearts; if we have it only in our houses and hands, enemies may take it from us; if only in our heads, our memories may fail; even if our hearts be delivered into the mould of it, and the impressions of it remain on our souls, it is safe.

2. The good uses he designed to make of it; that I might not sin against thee. Good men are afraid of sin, and are in care to prevent it; and the most effectual way to prevent it, is, to hide God’s word in our hearts, that we may answer every temptation, as our Master did, with, It is written; may oppose God’s precepts to the dominion of sin, his promises to its allurements, and his threatenings to its menace.

12. Blessed art thou, O Lord: teach me thy statutes. Here, 1. David gives glory to God; “Blessed art thou, O Lord. Thou art infinitely happy in the enjoyment of thyself, and hast no need of me or my services; yet thou art pleased to reckon thyself honoured by them; assist me, therefore, and then accept me.” In all our prayers we should intermix praise.

2. He asks grace from God; “Teach me thy statutes; give me to know and do my duty in every thing. Thou art the Fountain of all blessedness; let me have this drop from that Fountain, this blessing from that Blessedness; Teach me thy statutes, that I may know how to bless thee, who art a blessed God, and that I may be blessed in thee.”

13. With my lips have I declared all the judgments of my mouth. 14. I have rejoiced in the way of thy testimonies, as much as in all riches. 15. I will meditate in thy precepts, and have respect unto thy ways. 16. I will delight myself in thy statutes: I will not forget thy word.

Here, 1. David looks back with comfort upon the respect he had paid to the word of God. He had the testimony of his conscience for him;

(1.) That he had edified others with what he had been taught out of the word of God; (v. 13.) With my lips have I declared all the judgments of my mouth. This he did, not only as a king in making orders, and giving judgment, according to the word of God, nor only as a prophet by his psalms, but his heart also from the bottom of his heart. Thus he showed how full he was of the word of God, and what a holy pride* he took in his acquaintance with it; for it is out of the abundance of the heart that the mouth speaketh. Thus did he good with his knowledge; he did not hide God’s word from others, but hid it for them; and, out of that good treasure in his heart, brought forth good things, as the householder out of his store, things new and old. They whose hearts are fed with the bread of life, should with their lips feed many. He had prayed, (v. 12.) that God would teach him; and here he pleads, “Lord, I have endeavoured to make a good use of the knowledge thou hast given me, therefore increase it;” for to him that hath shall be given.

(2.) That he had entertained himself with it; “Lord, teach me thy statutes; for I desire no greater pleasure than to know and do them.”

14. I have rejoiced in the way of thy commandments, in a constant even course of obedience to thee; not only in the speculations and histories of thy word, but in the precepts of it, and in that path of serious godliness which they chalck out to me. I have rejoice in this, as much as in all riches; as much as ever any worldling rejoiced in the increase of his wealth. In the way of God’s commandments I can truly say,

Soul, take thou ease.” In true religion there is all riches, the unsearchable riches of Christ.

2. He looks forward with a holy resolution never to cool in his affection to the word of God; what he does, that he will do, 2 Cor. xi. 12. They that have found pleasure in the ways of God, are likely to proceed and persevere in them.

(1.) He will dwell much upon his thoughts; (v. 13.) I will meditate in thy precepts. He not only discoursed of them to others, (many do that only to show their knowledge and authority,) but he communed with his own heart about them, and took pains to digest in his own thoughts what he had declared, or had to declare, to others. Note, God’s words ought to be very much the subject of our thoughts.

(2.) He will have them always in his eye; I will have respect unto thy ways, as the traveller has to his road, which he is in care not to miss, and always that only to show their knowledge and authority,) but he communed with his own heart about them, and took pains to digest in his own thoughts what he had declared, or had to declare, to others. Note, God’s words ought to be very much the subject of our thoughts.

(3.) He will take a constant pleasure in communion with God, and obedience to him. It is not for all a season that he rejoices in this light, but I will still, I will for ever, delight myself in thy statutes; not only think of them, but do them with delight, v. 16. David has no more delight in God’s statutes than is the pleasures of his court, or the honours of his camp; more than in his sword or in his harp: when the law is written in the heart, duty becomes a delight.

(4.) He will never forget what he has learned of the things of God; “I will not forget thy word; not only I will not quite forget it, but I will be mindful of it, when I have occasion to use it.” They that meditate in God’s word, and delight in it, are in no great danger of forgetting it.

3. GIMEL.

17. Deal bountifully with thy servant, that I may live, and keep thy word. We are here taught,

1. That we owe our lives to God’s mercy. David prays, Deal bountifully with me, that I may live. It was God’s bounty that gave us life, that gave us this life; and the same bounty that gave it continues it, and gives all the supports and comforts of it; if withheld, we die; or, which is equivalent, our lives are embittered, and we become weary of them. If God deals in strict justice with us, we die, we perish, we all perish; if these forfetit lives be preserved and prolonged, it is because God is bountifully dealing according to his mercy, not according to our deserts.

The continuance of the most useful life is owing to God’s bounty, and on that we must have a continual dependence.

2. That therefore we ought to spend our lives in God’s service. Life is therefore a choice mercy, because it is an opportunity of obeying God in this world, where there are so few that do glorify him, and the David had in his eye, “Not that I may live and grow rich, live and be merry; but that I may live and keep thy word, may observe it myself, and transmit it to those that shall come after, which, the longer I live, the better I shall do.”

18. Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law. Observe here,

1. That there are wondrous things in God’s law, which we are all concerned, and should covet, to behold; not only strange things, which are very surprising and unexpected, but excellent things, which are to be highly esteemed and valued, and things which were long hid from the wise and prudent, but are now revealed unto babes. If there were wonders in the law, much more in the gospel, where Christ is all in all, whose name is Wonderful.

Well may we, who are so nearly interested, desire to behold these wondrous things, when the angels themselves reach to look into them, 1 Pet. i. 12.

2. Those that would see the wondrous things of God's law and gospel, must beg of him to open their eyes, and to give them an understanding. We are by nature blind to the things of God, till his grace cause the scales to fall from our eyes; and even those in whose hearts God has said, Let there be light, have yet need to be further enlightened, and must still pray to God to open their eyes yet more and more, that they who at first saw men as trees walking, may come to see all things clearly: and the more God opens our eyes, the more wonders we see in the word of God which we saw not before.

19. I am a stranger in the earth; hide not thy commandments from me.

Here we have;

1. The acknowledgment which David makes of his own condition; I am a stranger in the earth. We all are so, and all good people confess themselves to be so; for heaven is their home, and the world is but their inn, the land of their pilgrimage. David was a man that knew as much of the world, and was as well known in it, as most men. God built him a house, established his throne; strangers submitted to him, and people that he had not known served him; he had a name like the names of the gods, and yet he calls himself a stranger. We are all strangers on earth, and must so account ourselves.

2. The request he makes to God thereupon; Hide not thy commandments from me; he means more; Lord, show thy commandments to me; let me never know the want of the word of God, but, as long as I live, give me to be growing in my acquaintance with it. I am a stranger, and therefore stand in need of a guide, a guard, a companion, a comforter; let me have the commandments of God always in view, for they will be all this to me, all that a poor stranger can desire. I am a stranger here, and must be gone shortly; by thy commandments let me be prepared for my removal hence.

20. My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times.

David had prayed that God would open his eyes, (v. 18.) and open the law; (v. 19.) now here he pleads the earnestness of his desire for knowledge and grace, for it is the fervent prayer that avails much.

1. His desire was importunate; My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments; or, as some read it, "It is taken up, and wholly employed, in longing for thy judgments; the whole stream of its desires runs in this channel. I shall think myself quite broken and undone, if I want the word of God, the direction, converse, and comfort, of it." 2. It was constant; at all times; it was not now and then, in a good humour, that he was so fond of the word of God: but, it is the habitual temper of every sanctified soul to hunger after the word of God, as its necessary food, which there is no living without.

21. Thou hast rebuked the ungodly which are cursed, which do err from thy commandments.

Here is, 1. The wretched character of wicked people. The temper of their minds is bad; they are proud, they magnify themselves above others; and yet that is not all; they magnify themselves against God, and set up their wills in competition with, and opposition to, the will of God, as if their hearts, and tongues, and all, were their own. There is something of pride at the bottom of every wilful sin, and the tenor of their laws is no better; They do err from thy commandments, as Israel, that did always err in their hearts they err in judgment, and embrace principles contrary to thy commandments, and then no wonder that they err in practice, and willfully turn aside out of the good way. This is the effect of their pride; for they say, What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? As Pharaoh, Who is the Lord?

2. The wretched case of such. They are certainly cursed, for God resists the proud; and they that throw off the commandments, the law lay themselves under its curse; (Gal. iii. 10.) and as that now beholds them afar off, will shortly say to them, Go, ye cursed. The proud sinners bless themselves, God curses them; and though the most direful effects of this curse are reserved for the other world, yet they are often severely rebuked in this world: Providence crosses them, vexes them, and, wherein they dealt proudly, God shows himself above them: and all these rebukes are earnestst of worse. David took notice of the rebukes people pass under, and it made him cleave the more closely to the word of God, and pray the more earnestly that he might not err from God's commandments. Thus saints get good by God's judgments on sinners.

22. Remove from me reproach and contempt; for I have kept thy testimonies.

Here, 1. David prays against the reproach and contempt of men; that they might be removed, or, as the word is, rolled, from off him. This intimates that they lay upon him, and that neither his greatest nor his goodness could secure him from being libelled and lampooned: some despised him, and endeavoured to make him mean, others reproached him, and endeavoured to make him odious. It has often been the lot of those that do well, to be ill-spoken of. It intimates that they lay heavy upon him. Hard and foul words do not indeed break bones, and yet they are very grievous to a tender and ingenuous spirit; therefore David prays, Lord, remove them from me, that I may not be thereby either driven from thee, or despised of men. God has all men's hearts and tongues in his hand, and can silence lying lips, and raise up a good name that is trodden in the dust; to him we may appeal as the Asserter of right and Avenger of wrong, and may depend on his promise, that he will clear up our righteousness as the light, xxxvii. 6. Reproach and contempt may humble us and do us good, and then it shall be removed.

2. He pleads his constant adherence to the word and way of God; For I have kept thy testimonies. He not only pleaseth his innocency, that he was unjustly censured, but, (1.) That he was jeered for well-doing; he was despised and abused for his strictness and zeal in religion; so that it was for God's name's sake that he suffered reproach, and therefore he could with the more assurance beg of God to appear for him. The reproach of God's people, if it be not removed now, will be turned into the greater honour shortly. (2.) That he was not jeered out of well-doing; Lord, remove it from me, for I have kept thy testimonies notwithstanding. If in a day of trial we still retain our integrity, we may be sure it will end well.

23. Princes also did sit and speak against me; but thy servant did meditate in thy statutes.

See here, 1. How David was abused even by great men, who should have known better his cha character and his case, and have been more generous; his petition; (a) and they are life to those that receive them,) and as an encouragement to hope that God would quicken him, having promised grace and comfort to all the saints, and to David in particular. God's word must be our guide and plea in every prayer.

26. I have declared my ways, and thou hearest me: teach me thy statutes. 27. Make me to understand the way of thy precepts: so shall I talk of thy wondrous works.

We have here,

1. The great intimacy and freedom that had been between David and his God. David had opened his case, opened his very heart to God; "I have declared my ways, and acknowledged thee in them all, have taken thee along with me in all my designs and enterprises." Thus Jephthah uttered all his words, and Hezekiah spread his letters before the Lord. "I have declared my ways, my wants, and bourns, and troubles, that I meet with in my way; or my sins, my by-ways, I have made an ingenuous confession of them, and thou hearest me, nearest patiently all I had to say, and tookest cognizance of my case." It is an unspeakable comfort to a gracious soul to think with what tenderness all its complaints are received by a gracious God, 1 John v. 14, 15.

2. My earnest desire of the continuance of that intimacy; not by visions and voices from heaven, but by the word and Spirit in an ordinary way; Teach me thy statutes, that is, Make me to understand the way of thy precepts. When he knew God had heard his declaration of his ways, he does not say, "Now, Lord, tell me my lot, and let me know what the event will be;" but, "Now, Lord, tell me my duty, let me know what thou wilt have me to do, as the case stands." Note, Those who in all their ways think on the Lord, may pray in faith that he will direct their steps in the right way. And the surest way of keeping up our communion with God, is, by learning his statutes, and walking intelligently in the way of his precepts. See 1 John i. 6, 7.

3. The good use he would make of this, for the honour of God and the edification of others; "Let me have a good understanding of the way of thy precepts, give me a clear, distinct, and methodical, knowledge of divine things, so shall I talk, with the more assurance, and more to the purpose, of thy wondrous works." We can talk with a better grace of God's wondrous works, the wonders of providence, and especially the wonders of redeeming love, when we understand the way of God's precepts, and walk in that way.

23. My soul melteth for heaviness; strengthen thou me according unto thy word. 29. Remove from me the way of lying; and grant me thy law graciously.

Here is, 1. David's representation of his own griefs; My soul melteth for heaviness, which is to the same purport with v. 25. My soul cleaveth to the dust. Heaviness in the heart of man makes it to incline to lie to lie down, to drop away like a candle that wastes. The penitent soul melts in sorrow for sin, and even the patient soul may melt in the sense of affliction, and it is then its interest to pour out its soul before God.

2. His request for God's grace. (1.) That God would enable him to bear his affliction well, and graciously support him under it; "Strengthen thou me with strength in my soul, according to thy word, which, as the bread of life, strengthens man's heart to undergo whatever God is pleased to inflict. Strengthen me to do the duties, resist the temptations, and bear up under the burthen, of an afflicted state, that the spirit may not fail. Strengthen me according to that word. (Deut. xxxiii. 25.) As thy day, so shall thy strength be."

(2.) That God would keep him from using any unlawful, indirect, means for the extricating of himself out of his troubles; (v. 29.) Remove from me the way of lying. David was conscious to himself of a proneness to this sin; he had, in a strait, cheated Ahimelech, (1 Sam. xxi. 2.) and Achish, v. 13. and ch. xxvii. 1. Great difficulties are great temptations to sin, and a lie with colour of a justifiable, and a necessary self-defence; therefore David prays, that God would prevent him from falling into this sin any more, lest he should settle in the way of it. A course of lying, of deceit, and dissimulation, is that which every good man dreads, and which we are all concerned to beg of God by his grace to keep us from.

(3.) That he might always be under the conduct and protection of God’s government; Grant me thy law graciously; grant me that to keep me from the way of lying. David had the law written with his own hand; for the king was obliged to transcribe a copy of it for his own use; (Deut. xvi. 18.) but he prays that he might have it written in his heart; for then, and then only, we have it indeed, and to good purpose. "Grant it me more and more." They that know and love the law of God, cannot but desire to know it more, and to use it more, and to apply it more. "Grant it me graciously; he begs it as a special token of God’s favour." Note, We ought to reckon God’s law a grant, a gift, an unspeakable gift, to value it, and pray for it, and to give thanks for it accordingly. The divine code of institutes and precepts is indeed a charter of privileges; and God is truly gracious to those whom he makes truly gracious by giving them his law.

30. I have chosen the way of truth: thy judgments have I laid before me. 31. I have stuck unto thy testimonies: O Lord, put me not to shame. 32. I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart.

1. That those who will make any thing to purpose of their religion must first make it their serious and deliberate choice; so David did; I have chosen the way of truth. Note, (1.) The way of serious godliness is the way of truth; the principles it is founded on are of eternal truth, and it is the only true way to happiness. (2.) We must therefore choose to walk in this way, not because we know no other way, but because we know no better; nay, we know no other safe and good way. Let us choose that way for our way, which we will walk in, though it be narrow.

2. That those who have chosen the way of truth must have a constant regard to the word of God as the rule of their walking; Thy judgments have I laid before me; as he who learns to write lays his copy before him, that he may write according to it, as the workman lays his model and platform before him. "Let me have the word in my heart, as a rule and pattern to apply it according to. As we have the word in our heart, by an habitual conformity to it, so we must have it in our eye, by an actual regard to it upon all occasions, that we may walk accurately and by rule.

3. That those who make religion their choice and rule are like to adhere to it faithfully; "I have stuck to thy testimonies with an unchanged affection, and an unshaken resolution; stuck to them at all times, through all trials. I have chosen them, and therefore I have stuck to them." Note, The choosing Christian is likely to be the steady Christian; those that are Christians by chance, lack about, if they find turn.

4. That those who stick to the word of God may in faith expect and pray for acceptance with God; for David means that, when he begs, "Lord, put me not to shame; never leave me to do that by which I shall shame myself, and do thou not reject my services, which will put me to the greatest confusion."

5. That the mere comfort God gives us, the more duty we expect from us. v. 32. Here we have, (1.) His resolution to go on vigorously; I will run the way of thy commandments. Those that are going to heaven should make haste thither, and be still pressing forward. It concerns us to redeem time and take pains, and to go on in our business with cheerfulness; we then run the way of our duty when we are ready to it, and pleasant in it, and lay aside every weight, Heb. xii. 1. (2.) His dependence upon God for grace to do so, I shall then abound in thy works, when thou shalt enlarge my heart. God, by his Spirit, enlarges the hearts of his people, when he gives them wisdom; for that is called largeness of heart, 1 Kings iv. 29. When he sheds abroad the love of God in the heart, and puts gladness there. The joy of our Lord should be wheels to our obedience.

5. HE.

33. Teach me, O Lord, the way of thy statutes, and I shall keep it unto the end. 34. Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law; yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart.

Here, 1. David prays earnestly that God himself would be his Teacher; he had preachers, and wise men, and priests, about him, and was himself well-instructed in the law of God, yet he begs to be taught of God, as knowing that none teaches like him, Job xxxvi. 22. Observe here, (1.) What he desires to be taught; not the notions or language of God’s statutes, but the way of them; "The way of applying them to myself, and governing myself by them; teach me the way of my duty which thy statutes prescribes, and in every doubtful case let me know what thou wouldst have me to do, let me hear the word behind me, saying, This is the way, walk in it," Isa. xxx. 21. (2.) How he desires to be taught; in such a way as no man could teach him; Lord, give me understanding. As the God of nature, he has given us intellectual powers and faculties; but here we are taught to pray, that, as the God of grace, he would give us understanding to use those powers and faculties about the great things which belong to our peace, which, through the corruption of nature, we are averse to; Give me understanding, an enlightened understanding; for it is as good to have no understanding at all as not to have it sanctified. Nor will the spirit of revelation in the word answer the end, unless we have the spirit of wisdom in the heart. This is that which we are indebted to Christ for; for the Son of God is come, and has given us understanding, 1 John v. 20. "I am come thus" says faithfully that he would be a good scholar; if God would teach him, he was sure he should learn to good purpose; "I shall keep thy law, which I shall never do unless I be taught of God, and therefore I earnestly desire that I may be taught." If God, by his Spirit, gives us a right and good understanding, we shall be, (1.) Constant in our obedience; "I shall keep it to the end, to the end of my life, which will be the surest proof of sincerity." It will not avail the traveller to keep the way for a while, if he do not keep it to the end of his journey. (2.) Cordial in our obedience.
I shall observe it with my whole heart, with pleasure and delight, and with vigour and resolution. That way which the whole heart goes, the whole man goes; and that should be the way of God's commandments, for the keeping of them is the whole of man.

35. Make me to go in the path of thy commandments; for therein do I delight.

36. Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness.

He had before prayed to God to enlighten his understanding, that he might know his duty, and not mistake concerning it; here he prays to God to bow his will, and quicken the active powers of his soul, that he might do his duty; for it is God that works in us both to will and to do, as well as to understand, what is good, Phil. ii. 13. Both the good head and the good heart are from the good grace of God, and both are necessary to every good work. Observe here,

1. The grace he prays for; (1) That God would make him able to do his duty; “Make me to go, strengthen me for every good work.” Since we are not sufficient of ourselves, our dependence must be upon the grace of God, for from him all our sufficiency is. God puts his Spirit within us, and so causes us to walk in his statutes; (Ezek. xxxvi. 27.) and this is that which David here begs. (2) That God would make him willing to do it, and would, by his grace, subdue the aversion he naturally had to it; “Incline my heart to thy testimonies, to those things which thy testimonies prescribe; not only make me willing to do my duty, as that which I must do, and therefore am concerned to make the best of, but make me desirous to do my duty, as that which is agreeable to the new nature, and really advantageous to me.” Duty is then done with delight, when the heart is inclined to it: it is God's grace that inclines us, and the more backward we find ourselves to it, the more earnest we must be for that grace.

2. The sin he prays against, and that is, covetousness; “Incline my heart to keep thy testimonies, and restrain and mortify the inclination there is in me to covetousness.” That is a sin which stands opposed to all God's testimonies; for the love of money is such a sin as is the root of much sin, of all sin: those therefore that would have the love of God rooted in them, must get the love of the world rooted out of them; for the friendship of the world is enmity with God. See in what way God deals with men; not by compulsion, but he draws with the cords of a man, working in them an inclination to that which is good, and an aversion to that which is evil.

3. His plea to enforce this prayer; “Lord, bring me to, and keep me in, the way of thy commandments, for therein do I delight; and therefore I pray thee, for grace to walk in that way. Thou hast wrought in me this delight in the way of thy commandments; wilt thou not work in me an ability to walk in them, and so crown thine own work?”

37. Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity; and quicken thou me in thy way.

Here, 1. David prays for restraining grace, that he might be prevented and kept back from that which would hinder him in the way of his duty; Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity. The honours, pleasures, and profits, of the world, are the vanity, the aspect and prospect of which draw multitudes away from the paths of religion and godliness; the eye, when fastened on these, infects the heart with the love of them, and so it is alienated from God and divine things; and therefore, as we ought to make a covenant with our eyes, and lay a charge upon them, that they shall not wander after, much less fix upon, that which is dangerous, (Job xxxi. 1.) so we ought to pray that God by his providence would keep vanity out of our sight, and that by his grace he would keep us from being enamoured with the sight of it.

2. He prays for constraining grace, that he might not only be kept from every thing that would obstruct his progress heaven-ward, but might have that grace which was necessary to forward him in that progress; “Quicken thou me in thy way; quicken me to redeem time, to improve opportunity, to press forward, and to do every duty with liveliness and fervency of spirit.” Beholding vanity deadens us, and slackens our pace; a traveller that stands gazing upon every object that presents itself to his view, will not rid ground; but if our eyes be kept from that which would divert us, our hearts will be kept to that which will excite us.

38. Establish thy word unto thy servant, who is devoted to thy fear.

Here is, 1. The character of a good man, which is the work of God's grace in him; he is God's servant. Here, 2. His employment in his work, that is, devoted to his fear, given up to his direction and disposal, and taken up with high thoughts of him, and all those acts of devotion which have a tendency to his glory. Those are truly God's servants, who, though they have their infirmities and defects, are sincerely devoted to the fear of God, and have all their affections and motions governed by that fear; they are engaged and addicted to religion.

2. The confidence that a good man has toward God, in dependence upon the word of his grace to him. They that are God's servants may, in faith and with humble boldness, pray that God would establish his word to them, that he would fulfil his promises to them in due time, and in the mean time give them an assurance that they shall be fulfilled. What God has promised we must pray for; we need not be so aspiring as to ask more; we need not be so modest as to ask less.

39. Turn away my reproach which I fear: for thy judgments are good.

Here, 1. David prays against reproach, as before, v. 22. David was conscious to himself that he had done that which might give occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, which would blemish his reputation, and turn it to the dishonour of his family; now he prays that God, who has all men's hearts and tongues in his hands, would be pleased to prevent this, to deliver him from all his transgressions, that he might not be the reproach of the foolish, which he feared; (xxxix. 8.) or he means that reproach which his enemies unjustly loaded him with. Let their lying lips be put to silence.

2. He pleads the goodness of God's judgments; “Lord, turn them away; let not religious be wounded through my side.”

40. Behold, I have longed after thy precepts: quicken me in thy righteousness.

Here, 1. David professes the ardent affection he had to the word of God; “I have longed after thy precepts; not only loved them, and delighted in what I have already attained, but I have earnestly desired to know them more, and do them better; and am still pressing forward toward perfection. Tastes of the sweetness of God's precepts will but set us a longing after a more intimate acquaintance with them. He appeals to God concerning this passionate desire after his precepts: "Behold, I have thus loved, thus longed; thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I am thus affected."

2. He prays for grace to enable him to answer this profession. "Thou hast wrought in me this languishing desire, put life into me, that I may prosecute it; cast me right on the right ways, according to thy righteous promise." Where God has wrought to will, he will work to do, and where he has wrought to desire, he will satisfy the desire.

41. Let thy mercies come also unto me, O Lord, even thy salvation, according to thy word. 42. So shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me: for I trust in thy word.

Here is, 1. David's prayer for the salvation of the Lord. "Lord, thou art my Saviour, I am miserable in myself, and thou only canst make me happy; let thy salvation come to me; hasten temporal salvation to me from my present distresses, and hasten me to the eternal salvation, by giving me the necessary qualifications for it, and the comfortable pledges and forecasts of it." 2. David's dependence upon the grace and promise of God for that salvation. These are the two pillars on which our hope is built, and they will not fail us. (1.) The grace of God; Let thy mercies come, even thy salvation: our salvation must be attributed purely to God's mercy, and not to any merit of our own. External life must be expected, as the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, Jude 21. "Lord, I have by faith thy mercies in view; let me by prayer prevail to have them come to me." (2.) The promise of God; Let it come according to thy word, thy word of promise: I trust in thy word, and therefore may expect the performance of the promise. We are not only allowed to trust in God's word, but our trusting in it is the condition of our benefit by it.

3. David's expectation of the good assurance which that grace and promise of God would give him; So shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me for my confidence in God, as if it would deceive me." When God saves those out of their troubles who trusted in him, he effectually silences those who would have shamed that counsel of the floor, (xiv. 6.) and their reproaches will be for ever silenced, when the salvation of the saints is completed; then it will appear, beyond dispute, that it was not in vain to trust in God.

43. And take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth; for I have hoped in thy judgments. 44. So shall I keep thy law continually for ever and ever.

Here is, 1. David's humble petition for the tongue of the learned, that he might know how to speak a word in season for the glory of God; Take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth. He means, "Lord, let the word of truth be always in my mouth, let me have the wisdom and courage which are necessary to enable me both to use my knowledge for the instruction of others, and, like the good householder, to bring out of my treasury things new and old, and to make profession of my faith whenever I am called to it." We have need to pray to God, that we may never be afraid or ashamed to own his truths and ways, nor deny him before men. David found that he was sometimes at a loss, the enemy was too ready to him as it should have been, but he prays, "Lord, let it not be taken utterly from me; let me always have so much of it at hand as will be necessary to the due discharge of my duty."

2. His humble profession of the heart of the upright, without which, the tongue of the learned, however it may be serviceable to others, will stand us in no sight. (1.) David professes his confidence in God; "Love make me ready and might in the scriptures, for I have hoped in those judgments of thy mouth, and if they be not at hand, my support and defence are departed from me." (2.) He professes his resolution to adhere to his duty in the strength of God's grace; So shall I keep my law continually. If I have thy word not only in my heart, but in my mouth, I shall do all I should, stand complete in thy whole will." Thus shall the man of God be perfect, thoroughly furnished for every good word and work, 2 Tim. iii. 17. Col. iii. 16. Observe how he resolves to keep God's law, [1.] Continually, without trifling; God must be served in a constant course of obedience every day, and all the day long. [2.] For ever and ever, without backsliding; we must never be weary of well-doing. If we serve him to the end of our time on earth, we shall be serving him in heaven to the endless ages of eternity; so shall we keep his law for ever and ever. Or thus, "Lord, let me have the word of truth in my mouth, that I may commit that sacred deposit to the rising generation, (2 Tim. ii. 2.) and by them it may be transmitted to succeeding ages; so shall thy law be kept for ever and ever, from one generation to another," according to that promise, (Isa. lxi. 21.) My word in thy mouth shall not depart out of the mouth of thy seed, nor thy seed's seed.

45. And I will walk at liberty; for I seek thy precepts. 46. I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings, and will not be ashamed. 47. And I will delight myself in thy commandments, which I have loved. 48. My hands also will I lift up unto thy commandments, which I have loved; and I will meditate in thy statutes.

We may observe in these verses, 1. What David experienced of an affection to the law of God; I seek thy precepts, v. 45. I desire to know and do my duty, and consult thy word accordingly; I do all I can to understand what the will of the Lord is, and to discover the intimations of it in my own mind, and do thy precepts, for I have loved them, v. 47. I will only give them from the heart as good, but take complacency in them as good for me." All that love God, love his government, and therefore love all his commandments.

2. What he expected from this. Five things he promises himself here in the strength of God's grace.

O) That he should be free and easy in his duty; "I will walk at liberty, freed from that which is evil, not hampered with the fetters of my own corruptions, and free to that which is good, doing it not by constraint, but willingly." The service of sin is perfect slavery, the service of God is perfect liberty. Licentiousness is bondage to the greatest of tyrants, conscientiousness is freedom to the meanest of prisoners, John vii. 32, 36. Luke i. 74, 75.

(2.) That he should be bold and courageous in his duty; I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings. Before David came to the crown, kings were sometimes his judges, as Saul, and Achish; but, if he were called before them to give a reason of the hope that was in him, he would speak of God's testimonies, and profess to build his hope upon them, and make them his counsel, his guards, his crown, his all. We must never be afraid to own our religion, though it should expose us to the wrath of kings; but speak of it as that which we will live and die by, like the three children before Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iii. 16. Acts iv. 20. After David came to the crown, kings were sometimes his companions, they visited him, and he returned their visits; but he did not, in compliance to them, talk of every thing but religion, for fear of affronting them, and making his conversation uneasy to them: no, God's testimonies shall be the principal subject of his discourse with the kings, not only to show that he was not ashamed of his religion, but to instruct them in it, and bring them over to it. It is good for kings to hear of God's testimonies, and it will adorn the conversation of princes themselves to speak of them.

(3.) That he should be cheerful and pleasant in his duty; (v. 47.) "I will delight myself in thy commandments, in communicating with them, in conforming to them: I will never be so well pleased with myself, as when I do that which is pleasing to God." The more delight we take in the service of God, the nearer we come to the perfection we should aim at.

(4.) That he should be diligent and vigorous in his duty; (v. 48.) "I will lift up my hands to thy commandments; which denotes not only a vehement desire toward them, (exil. 6.) "I will lay hold of them as one afraid of missing them, or letting them go;" but a close application of mind to the observance of them; "I will lay my hands to the command, not only praise it, but practise it; nay, I will lift up my hands to it, I will put forth all the strength I have to do it." The hands that hang down, through sloth and discouragement, shall be lifted up, Heb. xii. 12.

(5.) That he should be thoughtful and considerate in his duty; (v. 48.) "I will meditate in thy statutes; not only entertain myself with thinking of them, as matters of speculation, but contrary how I may observe them in the best manner." By this it will appear that we truly love God's commandments, if we apply both our minds and our hands to them.

7. ZAIN.

49. Remember the word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope.

Two things David here pleads with God, in prayer for that mercy and grace which he hoped for, according to the word, by which his requests were guided.

1. That God had given him the promise on which he hoped; "Lord, I desire no more than that thou wouldst remember thy word unto thy servant, and do as thou hast said;" (see 1 Chron. xvii. 23.) "Thou art wise, and therefore wilt perfectly what thou hast purposed, and not change thy counsel. Thou art faithful, and therefore wilt perform what thou hast promised, and not break thou word." Those that make God's promises their portion may with humble boldness make them their plea.

2. "Lord, is not that the word which thou hast spoken; and wilt not thou make it good?" Gen. xxxii. 9. Exod. xxxiii. 12.

9. That God, who had given him the promise in the word, had by his grace wrought in him a hope in that promise, and enabled him to depend upon it, and had raised his expectations of great things from it. Has God kindled in us desires towards spiritual blessings more than toward any temporal good things; and will he not be so kind as to satisfy those desires? Has he filled us with hopes of those blessings; and will he not be so just as to accomplish these hopes? He that did by his Spirit work faith in us, will, according to our faith, work for us, and will not disappoint us.

50. This is my comfort in my affliction: for thy word hath quickened me.

Here is David's experience of benefit by the word:

1. As a means of his sanctification; "Thy word hath quickened me." It made me alive when I was dead in sin; it has many a time made me lively when I was dead in duty; it has quickened me to that which is good, when I was backward and averse to it; and it has quickened me in that which is good, when I was cold and indifferent.

2. Therefore as a means of his consolation, then when he was in affliction, and needed something to support him; "Because thy word has quickened me at other times, it has comforted me then." The word of God has much in it that speaks comfort in affliction; but those only may apply it to themselves who have experienced in some measure the quickening power of the word. If through grace it makes us holy, there is enough in it to make us easy, in all conditions, under all events.

51. The proud have had me greatly in des- rision; yet have I not declined from thy law.

David here tells us, and it will be of use to us to know it, that he was a man of integrity.

1. That he had been jeered for his religion. Though he was a man of honour, a man of great prudence, and had done eminent services to his country, yet, because he was a devout conscientious man, the proud had him greatly in derision; they ridiculed him, bantered him, and did all they could to expose him to contempt; they laughed at him for his praying, and called it cant; for his seriousness, and called it megrousiness; for his strictness, and called it needless preciseness. They were the proud that had sat in the corner's seat, and valued themselves on it.

2. That yet he had not been jeered out of his religion; "They have done all they could to make me quit it for shame, but none of these things move me; I have not declined from thy law for this; but, if this be to be vile," (as he said when Michal had him greatly in derision,) "I will be yet more vile." He not only has not quite forsaken the law, but had not so much as declined from it. We must never shrink from any duty, nor let slip an oppor- tunity of doing good, for fear of the reproach of men, or their revilings. The traveller goes on his way, though the dogs bark at him. Those can bear but little for Christ, that cannot bear a hard word for him.

52. I remembered thy judgments of old, O Lord; and have comforted myself.

When David was derided for his godliness, he not only held fast his integrity, but,

1. He comforted himself: he not only bore reproach, but bore it cheerfully; it did not disturb his peace, nor break in upon the repose of his spirit in God. It was a comfort to him to think that it was for God's sake that he bore reproach, and that his worst enemies could find no occasion against him, save only in the matters of his God, Dan. vi. 5. They that are derided for their adherence to God's law, may comfort themselves with this, that the reproach of Christ will prove, in the end, greater riches to them than the treasures of Egypt.

2. That which he comforted himself with, was, the remembrance of God's judgments of old, the providences of God concerning his people formerly, both in mercy to them, and in justice against their persecutors. God's judgments of old, in our own early days, and in the days of our fathers, are to be remembered by us for our comfort and encouragement in the way of God, for he is still the same.

53. Horror hath taken hold upon me, because of the wicked that forsake thy law.

Here is, 1. The character of wicked people; he means those that are openly and grossly wicked; they forsake thy law. Every sin is a transgression of the law, but a course and way of wilful and avowed sin is downright forsaking it and throwing it off:

2. The impression which the wickedness of the wicked made upon David; it frightened him, it put him into an amazement: he trembled to think of the dishonour thereby done to God, the gratification thereby given to Satan, and the mischiefs thereby done to the souls of men. He dreaded the consequences of it, both to the sinners themselves, (and cried out, O gather not my soul with sinners, let mine enemies be as the wicked,) and to the interests of God's kingdom among men, which he was afraid would be thereby sunk and murdered. He does not say, "Horror has taken hold on me, because of their cruel designs against me," but "because of the contempt they put on God and his law." Sin is a monstrous horrible thing in the eyes of all that are sanctified, Jer. v. 30.—xxiii. 14. Hos. vi. 10. Jer. ii. 12.

54. Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage.

Here is, 1. David's state and condition; he was in the house of his pilgrimage, which may be understood either as his peculiar trouble; he was often tossed and hurried, and forced to fly; or as his lot, in common with all; this world is the house of our pilgrimage, the house in which we are pilgrims; it is our tabernacle, it is our inn; we must confess ourselves strangers and pilgrims upon earth, who are not at home here, nor must be here long. Even David's palace is but the house of his pilgrimage.

2. His comfort in this state; "Thy statutes have been my songs;" most of the psalms were written by David himself; as travellers are wont to divert the thoughts of their weariness, and take off something of the tediousness of their journey, by singing a pleasant song now and then. David was the sweet singer of Israel, and here we are told whence he fetched his songs; they were all borrowed from the word of God; God's statutes were as familiar to him as the songs which a man is accustomed to sing; and he conversed with them in his pilgrimage solitudes. They were as pleasant to him as songs, and put gladness into his heart, more than they have that chant to the sound of the viols, Amos vi. 5. Is any afflicted then? Let him sing over God's statutes, and try if he cannot so sing away sorrow, Ps. cxxxviii. 5.

55. I have remembered thy name, O Lord, in the night, and have kept thy law. 56. This I had, because I kept thy precepts.

Here is, 1. The converse David had with the word of God; he kept it in mind, and upon every occasion he called it to mind. God's name is the discovery he has made of himself to us in and by his word. This is his memorial unto all generations, and therefore we should always keep it in memory; remember it in the night, upon a waking bed, when we are communing with our own hearts. When others were sleeping, David was remembering God's name, and, by repeating that lesson, increasing his acquaintance with it; in the night of affliction, this he called to mind.

2. The conscience he made of conforming to it. The due remembrance of God's name, which is prefixed to his law, will have a great influence upon our observance of the law; I remembered thy name in the night, and therefore was careful to keep thy law all days. How comfortable will it be in the reflection, if our own hearts can witness for us, that we have thus remembered God's name, and kept his law!

3. The advantage he get by it; (v. 56.) This I had, because I kept thy precepts. Some understand this indifferently; This I had; I had that which satisfied me, I had every thing that is comfortable, because I kept thy precepts. Note, All that have made a business of religion will own that it has turned to a good account, and that they have been unspeakable gainers by it. Others refer it to what goes immediately before; "I had the comfort of keeping thy law, because I kept it." Note, God's work is its own wages: a heart to obey the will of God is a most valuable reward of obedience; and the more we do, the more we may do, and shall do, in the service of God; the branch that bears fruit is made more fruitful, John xv. 2.

8. CHETH.

57. Thou art my portion, O Lord: I have said that I would keep thy words.

We may hence gather the character of a godly man.

1. He makes the favour of God his felicity; Thou art my Portion, O Lord. Others place their happiness in the wealth and honours of this world; their portion is in this life, they look no further, they desire no more, these are their good things; (Luke xvi. 25.) but all that are sanctified take the Lord for the Portion of their inheritance and their Cup, and nothing less will satisfy them. David can appeal to God in this matter; "Lord, thou knowest that I have chosen thee for my Portion, and depend upon thee to make me happy."

2. He makes the law of God his rule; "I have said, that I would keep thy words; and what I have said, by thy grace I will do, and will abide by it to the end." Note, Those that take God for their Portion, must take him for their Prince, and swear allegiance to him; and, having promised to keep his word, we must often put ourselves in mind of our promise, xxxix. 1.

58. I entreated thy favour with my whole heart: be merciful unto me according to thy word.

David, having in the foregoing verse reflected upon his covenants with God, here reflects upon his prayers to God, and reneweth his petition. Observe, 1. What he prayed for; having taken God for his Portion, he entreated his favour, as one that knew he had forfeited it, was unworthy of it, and yet undone without it, but for ever happy if he could obtain it. We cannot demand God's favour as a debt, but must be humble suppliants for it, that God will not only be reconciled to us, but accept us, and smile upon us. He prays, Be merciful to me, in the forgiveness of what I have done amiss, and in giving me grace to do better for the future.

2. How he prayed; with his whole heart; as one that knew how to value the blessing he prayed for; the gracious soul is entirely set upon the favour of God, and is therefore importunate for it; I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.

3. What he pleaded; the promise of God; "Be merciful to me, according to thy word. I desire thy mercy promised, and depend upon the promise for it." They that are governed by the precepts of the word, and are resolved to keep them, (v. 57.) may plead the promises of the word, and take the comfort of them.

59. I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies. 60. I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments.

David had said he would keep God's word, (v. 57.) and it was well said; now here he tells us how and in what method he pursued that resolution.

1. He thought on his ways; he thought beforehand what he should do, pondering the path of his feet, (Prov. iv. 26.) that he might walk surely, and not at all adventures; he thought after what he had done, reflected upon his life past, and recollected the paths he had walked in, and the steps he had taken. The word signifies a fixed, abiding, thought. Some make it an allusion to those who work embroidery, who are very exact and careful to cover the least flaw; or, to those who cast up their accounts, who reckon with themselves, What do I owe? What am I worth? I thought not on my wealth, (as the covetous man, xlix. 11.) but on my ways; not what I have, but what I do: what we do will follow us into another world, when what we have must be left behind. Many are critical enough in their remarks upon other people's ways, who never think of their own; but let every man prove his own work.

2. He turned his feet to God's testimonies; he determined to make the word of God his rule, and to walk by that rule. He turned from the by-paths to which he had turned aside, and returned to God's testimonies; he turned not only his eye to them, but his feet; his affections to the love of God's word, and his conversation to the practice of it. The thoughts and inclinations of his soul were toward God's testimonies, and his conversation was governed by them. Penitent reflections must produce pious resolutions.

3. He did this immediately, and without demur; (v. 60.) I made haste, and delayed not. When we are under convictions of sin, we must strike while the iron is hot, and not think to defer the preservation of them, as if our day were distant, and our life long. When we are called to duty, we must lose no time, but set about it to-day, while it is called to-day.

Now, this account, which David here gives of himself, may refer to his constant practice every day; he reflected on his ways at night, directed his feet to God's testimonies in the morning, and what his hand found to do that was good, he did it without delay; or it may refer to his first acquaintance with God and religion, when he began to throw off the vanity of youth, and turn to serious reflection upon his Creator: that blessed change was, by the grace of God, thus wrought. Note, (1.) Conversion begins in serious consideration, Ezek. xviii. 28. Luke xv. 17. (2.) Consideration must end in a sound conversion. To what purpose have we thought on our ways, if we do not turn our feet with all speed to God's testimonies?

61. The bands of the wicked have robbed me: but I have not forgotten thy law.

Here is, 1. The malice of David's enemies against him; they were wicked men, who hated him for his godliness: there were bands or troops of them confederate against him; they did him all the mischief they could, they robbed him; having endeavoured to take away his good name, (v. 51.) they set upon his goods, and spoiled him of them, either by plunder in time of war, or by fines and confiscations under colour of law. Saul (it is likely) seized his effects; Absalom his palace; the Amalekites rifled Ziklag. Worldly wealth is what we may be robbed of; David, though a man of war, could not keep his own. "Thieves break through and steal."

2. The testimony of David's conscience for him, that he had held fast his religion when he was stripped of every thing else, as Job did, when the bands of the Chaldeans and Sabeans had robbed him; But I have not forgotten thy law. No care or grief should drive God's word out of our minds, or hinder our comfortable relish of it, and converse with it. Nor must we ever think the worse of the ways of God for the troubles we meet with in these ways, nor fear being losers by our religion at last, however we may be losers for it now.

62. At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee, because of thy righteous judgments.

Though David is, in this psalm, much in prayer, yet he did not neglect the duty of thanksgiving; for those that pray much will have much to give thanks for.

See, 1. How much God's hand was eyed in his thanksgivings; he does not say, "I will give thanks, because of thy favours to me, which I have the comfort of," but, "Because of thy righteous judgments: all the dispensations of thy providence in wisdom and equity, which thou hast the glory of." We must give thanks for the asserting of God's honour, and the accomplishing of his word in all he does in the government of the world.

2. How much David's heart was set upon his thanksgivings; he would rise at midnight, to give thanks to God. Great and good thoughts kept him awake, and refreshed him, instead of sleep; and so zealous was he for the honour of God, that when others were in their beds, he was upon his knees at his devotions. He did not affect to be seen of men in it, but gave thanks in secret, where our heavenly Father sees. He had praised God in the courts of the Lord's house, and yet he will do it in his bed-chamber. Public worship will not excuse us from secret worship. When David found his heart affected with God's judgments, he immediately offered up those break through and steal in actual adorations, not defecting, lest they should cool. Yet observe his reverence; he did not lie still and give thanks, but rose out of his bed, perhaps, in the cold and in the dark, to do it the more solemnly. And see what a good husband he was of time; when he could not lie and sleep, he would rise and pray.

63. I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts.

David had often expressed the great love he had to God, here he expresses the great love he had to the people of God; and observe,

1. Why he loved them; not so much because they were his best friends, most firm to his interest, and most forward to serve him, but because they were such as feared God, and kept his precepts, and so did him honour, and helped him to support his kingdom among men. Our love to the saints is then sincere, when we love them for the sake of what we see of God in them, and the service they do to him.

2. How he showed his love to them; he was a companion of them. He had not only a spiritual communion with them in the same faith and hope, but he joined with them in holy ordinances in the courts of the Lord, where rich and poor, prince and peasant, meet together; he sympathized with them in their joys and sorrows, (Heb. x. 33.) he conversed familiarly with them, communicated his expe-
64. The earth, O LORD, is full of thy mercy: teach me thy statutes.

Here, 1. David pleads that God is good to all the creatures, according to their necessities and capacities; as the heaven is full of God's glory, so the earth is full of his mercy, full of the instances of his pity and bounty. Nor only the land of Canaan, where God did keep Abraham, was well husbanded, but the whole earth, in many parts of which he has no homage paid him, is full of his mercy: not only the children of men upon the earth, but even the inferior creatures, taste of God's goodness; his tender mercies are over all his works.

2. He therefore prays that God would be good to him according to his necessity and capacity; "Teach me thy statutes." Thou feedest the young ravens that are ready to leave the nest; and therefore for thee, O God, not feed me with spiritual food, the bread of life, which my soul needs and craves, and cannot subsist without? The earth is full of thy mercy; and is not heaven too? Wilt thou not then give me spiritual blessings in heavenly places? A gracious heart will fetch an argument from any thing, to enforce a petition for divine teaching. Surely he that will not let his birds be unfed, will not let his children be untaught.

9. TETH.

65. Thou hast dealt well with thy servant, O LORD, according unto thy word.

Here, 1. David makes a thankful acknowledgment of God's gracious dealings with him all along; Thou hast dealt well with thy servant. However God has dealt with us, we must own he has dealt well with us, better than we deserve; and all in love, and with design to work for our good. In many instances, God has done well for us, beyond our expectations; he has done well for all his servants; never any of them complained that he had used them hardly. Thou hast dealt well with me, not only according to thy mercy, but according to thy word. God's favours look best when they are compared with the promise, and are seen flowing from that fountain.

2. Upon these experiences he grounds a petition for divine instruction; "Teach me good judgment and knowledge, that, by thy grace, I may render again, in some measure, according to the benefit done unto me." Teach me a good taste, (so the word signifies,) a good relish, to discern things that differ, to distinguish between truth and falsehood, good and evil; for the ear tries words, as the mouth tastes meat. We should pray to God for a sound mind, that we may discern the current moral stories exercised, Heb. v. 14. Many have knowledge, who have little judgment; they who have both, are well fortified against the snares of Satan, and well furnished for the service of God, and their generation.

3. This petition is backed with a plea; "For I have believed thy commandments; received them, and consented to them that they are good, and submitted to their government; therefore, Lord, teach me." Where God has given a good heart, a good head too may in faith be prayed for.

67. Before I was afflicted I went astray; but now have I kept thy word.

David here tells us what he has experienced,

1. Of the temptations of a prosperous condition; "Before I was afflicted, while I lived in peace and plenty, and knew no sorrow, I went astray from God and my duty." Sin is going astray; and then we are most apt to wander from God, when we are easy and think ourselves at home in the world. Prosperity is the unhappy occasion of much iniquity; it makes men more easy; they please themselves, indulgent of the flesh, forgetful of God, in love with the world, and deaf to the reproofs of the word. See xxx. 6. It is good for us, when we are afflicted, to remember how, and wherein, we went astray, before we were afflicted, that we may answer the end of the affliction.

2. Of the benefit of an afflicted state; "Now have I kept thy word, and so have been recovered from my wanderings. God often makes use of afflictions as a means to reduce those to himself who have wandered from him. Sanctified afflictions humble us for sin, and show us the vanity of the world; they soften the heart, and open the eye to discipline. The prodigal's distress brought him to himself first, and then to his father."

68. Thou art good, and dost good: teach me thy statutes.

Here, 1. David praises God's goodness, and gives him the glory of it; Thou art good, and dost good. All who have eyes to see know how lovingly he deals with him, that he will own that he does good, and therefore will conclude that he is good. The streams of God's goodness are so numerous, and run so full, so strong, to all the creatures, that we must conclude the fountain that is in himself to be inexhaustible. We cannot conceive how much good our God does every day, much less can we conceive how good he is. Let us acknowledge it with admiration, and with holy love and thankfulness.

2. He prays for God's grace, and begs to be under the guidance and influence of it; Teach me thy statutes. "Lord, thou dost good to all, art the bountiful Benefactor of all the creatures; this is the good I beg thou wilt do to me,—Instruct me in my duty incline me to it, and enable me to do it. Thou art good, and dost good; Lord, teach me thy statutes. that I may be good, and do good, may have a good heart, and live a good life. It is an encouragement to poor sinners to hope that God will teach them his way, because he is good and upright, xxv. 8.

69. The proud have forged a lie against me: but I will keep thy precepts with my whole heart. 70. Their heart is as fat as grease: but I delight in thy law.

David here tells us how he was affected as to the proud and wicked people that were about him.

1. He did not fear their malice, nor was he by it deterred from his duty; They have forged a lie against me; thus they aimed to take away his good name: nay, all we have in the world, even life itself, may be brought into danger by those who make no pause in their malice. They have envied David's reputation, because it eclipsed them; and therefore did all they could to blemish him: they took a pride in trampling upon him: they therefore persuaded themselves it was no sin to tell a deliberate lie, if it might but expose him to contempt. Their wicked wit forged lies, invented stories, which there was not the least colour for, to serve their wicked designs. And what did David do, when he was thus belied? He will bear it pateply; he will keep that precept which forbids him to render railing for railing, and will with all his heart sit down silent. He will go on in his duty with constancy and resolution; "Let them say what they will, I will keep thy precepts, and not tread their reproach."

2. He did not envy their prosperity, nor was he by it allured from his duty; Their heart is as fat as grease. The proud are at ease; (cxiii. 4.) they are full of the world, and the wealth and pleasures of it; and this makes them, (1.) Senseless, secure; and stupid; they are past feeling; thus the phrase is used, (Isa. vi. 10.) Make the heart of these people fat. They are not sensible of the touch of the word of God, or his rod. (2.) Sensual and voluptuous; Their eyes stand out with fatness; (Ps. lxxiii. 7.) they roll themselves in the pleasures of sense, and take up with them as their chief good; and much good may it do them, I would not change conditions with them; I delight in thy law; I build my security upon the promises of God's word, and have pleasure enough in communion with God, infinitely preferable to all their delights. The children of God, who are acquainted with spiritual pleasures, need not envy the children of this world their carnal pleasures.

71. It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes.

See here, 1. That it has been the lot of the best saints to be afflicted. The proud and the wicked live in pomp and pleasure, while David, though he did not close in with God and his duty, was still in affliction.

Water of a full cup are wrung out to God's people, lxxiii. 10.

2. That it has been the advantage of God's people to be afflicted. David could speak experimentally; It was good for me; many a good lesson he had learnt by his afflictions, and many a good duty he had been brought to, which otherwise had been unlearnt and undone. Therefore God visited him with affliction, that he might learn God's statutes; and the intention was answered, the afflictions had contributed to the improvement of his knowledge and grace. He that chastened him taught him. The rod and reproof give wisdom.

72. The law of thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver.

This is a reason why David reckoned, that, when by his afflictions he learned God's statutes, and the profit did so much balance the loss, he was really a gainer by them; for God's law, which he got acquaintance with by his affliction, was better to him than all the gold and silver which he lost by his affliction.

1. David had but a little of the word of God, in comparison with what we have, yet see how highly he valued it; how inexcusable then are we, who have both the Old and New Testament complete, and yet account them as a strange thing! Observe, Therefore he valued the law, because it is the law of God's mouth, the revelation of his will, and ratified by his authority.

2. He had a great deal of gold and silver, in comparison with what we have, yet see how little he valued it; his riches increased, and yet he did not set his heart upon them, but upon the word of God. That was better to him, yielded him better pleasures, and better maintenance, and a better inheritance, than all the treasures he was master of. Those that have read, and believe, David's Psalms and Solomon's Ecclesiastes, cannot but prefer the word of God far above the wealth of this world.

73. Thy hands have made me, and fashioned me; give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments.

Here, 1. David adores God as the God of nature, and the Author of his being; Thy hands have made me and fashioned me, Job x. 8. Every man is as truly the work of God's hands as the first man was, Ps. cxxxxix. 15, 16. "Thy hands have not only made me, and given me a being, otherwise I would have never been, but fashioned me, and given me this being, the noble and excellent being, endowed with these powers and faculties;" and we must own that we are fearfully and wonderfully made.

2. He addresses himself to God as the God of grace, and begs he will be the Author of his new and better being. God made us to serve him and enjoy him; but by sin we have made ourselves unable for his service, and indisposed for the enjoyment of him; and we must have a new and divine nature, otherwise we had the human nature in vain; therefore David prays, "Lord, since thou hast made me by thy power for thy glory, make me anew by thy grace, that I may answer the ends of my creation, and live to some purpose; give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments." The way in which God recovers and secures his interest in men, is, by giving them an understanding; for by that door he enters into the soul, and gains possession of it.

74. They that fear thee will be glad when they see me; because I have hoped in thy word.

Here is, 1. The confidence of this good man in the hope of God's salvation; I have hoped in thy word; and I have not found it in vain to do so; it has not failed me, nor have I been disappointed in my expectations from it. It is a hope that maketh not ashamed; but is present satisfaction, and fruition at last.

2. The concurrence of other good men with him in the joy of that salvation; They that fear thee, will be glad when they see me relieved by my hope in thy word, and delivered according to my hope.

The comforts which some of God's children have in God, and the favours they have received from him, should be matter of joy to others of them. St. Paul often expressed the hope that for God's grace to him thanks would be rendered by many, 2 Cor. i. 11.—iv. 15. Or it may be taken more generally; good people are glad to see one another; they are especially pleased with those (and, as I may say, proud of them) who are eminent for their hope in God's word.

75. I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me.

Still David is in affliction, and, being so, he owns, 1. That his sin was justly corrected; I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, are righteous ness itself. However God is pleased to afflict us, he does us no wrong, nor can we charge him with any iniquity, but must acknowledge that it is less than we have deserved. We know that God is holy in his nature, and wise and just in all the acts of his government, and therefore we cannot but know, in the general, that his judgments are right, though, in some particular instances, there may be difficulties which we cannot easily resolve.

2. That God's promise was graciously performed. The former may silence us under our afflictions, and forbid us to repine, but this may satisfy us, and enable us to rejoice; for afflictions are in the covenant, and therefore they are not only not meant for our hurt, but they are really intended for our good; "In faithfulness thou hast afflicted me, pursuant to the great design of my salvation. It is easier to own, in general, that God's judgments are right, that to own it when they come to favor our own case. David subscribes to it with application, "Even my afflictions are just and kind."

76. Let, I pray thee, thy merciful kindness be for my comfort, according to thy word unto thy servant. 77. Let thy tender mercies come unto me, that I may live: for thy law is my delight.

Here is, 1. An earnest petition to God for his favour. They that own the justice of God in their afflictions, (as David had done, v. 75.) may, in faith, and with humble boldness, be earnest for the mercy of God, and the tokens and fruits of that mercy, in their affliction. He prays for God's merciful kindness, (v. 76.) his tender mercies, v. 77. He can claim nothing as his due, but all his supports under his affliction must come from mere mercy and compassion, to one in misery, one in want. "Let these come to me," that is, "the evidence of them; clear it up to me, that thou hast a kindness for me, and mercy in store; and let the effects of them come; let them work my relief and deliverance."

2. The benefit he promised himself from God's loving-kindness; "Let it come to me for my comfort;" (v. 76.) that will comfort me, when nothing else will; that will comfort me, whatever grieveth me." Gracious souls fetch all their comfort from a gracious God, as the Fountain of all happiness and joy; "Let it come to me, that I may live, that I may be revived, and my life may be made sweet to me, for I have no joy of it while I am under God's displeasure. In his favour is life, in his frowns are death." A good man cannot live, with any satisfaction, any longer than he has some tokens of God's favour to him.

3. His pleas for the benefits of God's favour. He pleads, (1.) God's promise; "Let me have thy kindness, according to thy word unto thy servant; the kindness which thou hast promised, and because thou hast promised it." Our Master has passed his word to all his servants, that he will be kind to them, and they may plead it with him. (2.) His own confidence and complacency in that promise; "Thy law is my delight; I hope in thy word, and rejoice in the same." Those that delight in the law of God, may depend upon the favour of God, for it shall certainly make them happy.

78. Let the proud be ashamed; for they dealt perversely with me without a cause: but I will meditate in thy precepts. 79. Let those that fear thee turn unto me, and those that have known thy testimonies.

Here David shows, 1. How little he valued the ill-will of sinners. There were those that dealt perversely with him, that were peevish and ill-conditioned toward him, that sought advantages against him, and misconstrued all he said and did. Even those that dealt most fairly may meet with those that deal perversely. But David mattered it not, for, (1.) He knew it was without cause, and that for his love they were his adversaries. The causeless reproach, like the curse, causes no evil, may be easily slighted; it does not hurt and therefore should not move us. (2.) He could pray, in faith, that they might be ashamed of it, God's dealing favourably with him might make them ashamed to think that they had dealt perversely with him. "Let them be ashamed; let them be brought either to repentance or to ruin." (3.) He could go on in the way of his duty, and find comfort in that. "However they deal with me, I will meditate in thy precepts, and entertain myself with them."

2. How much he valued the good-will of saints, and how desirous he was to stand right in their opinion, and keep up his interest in them, and communion with them: Let those that fear thee, turn to me. He does not mean so much that they might side with him, and take up arms in his cause, as that they might love him, and pray for him, and associate with him. Good men desire the friendship and society of those that are good. Some think it intimates, that, when David had been guilty of that foul sin in the murder of Uriah, though he was a king, they that feared God grew strange to him, and turned from him, for they were ashamed of him; this troubled him, and therefore he prays, Lord, let them turn to me again. He desires especially the company of those that were not only honest, but intelligent, that have known thy testimonies, have good heads as well as good hearts, and whose conversation will be edifying. It is desirable to have an intimacy with such.

80. Let my heart be sound in thy statutes, that I be not ashamed.

Here is, 1. David's prayer for sincerity, that his heart might be brought to God's statutes, and that it might be sound in them, not rotten and deceitful; that he might not rest in the form of godliness, but be acquainted with, and subject to, the power of it; that he might see the beauty and constant in religion, and that his soul might be in health.

2. His dread of the consequences of hypocrisy: that I be not ashamed. Shame is the portion of hypocrites, either here, if it be repented of, or hereafter, if it be not; "Let my heart be sound, that I fall not into scandalous sin, that I fall not quite off from the ways of God, and so shame myself. Let my heart be sound, that I may come boldly to the throne of grace, and may lift up my face without spot at the great day."

11. CAPH.

81. My soul fainteth for thy salvation; but I hope in thy word. 82. Mine eyes fail for thy word, saying, When wilt thou comfort me?

Here we have the Psalmsist, Longing for help from heaven; My soul faints, mine eyes fail. He longs for the salvation of the Lord, and for his word, that is, salvation according to the word. He is not thus eager for the creatures of fancy, but for the objects of faith; salvation from the present calamities under which he was groaning, and the doubts and fears which he was oppressed with. It may be understood of the coming of the Messiah, and so he speaks in the name of the Old Testament church; the souls of the faithful even then looked to the salvation which the prophets testified; (1 Pet. i. 10.) their eyes failed for it. Abraham saw it at a distance, and so did others, but at such a distance that it put their eyes to the stretch, and they could not steadfastly see it. David was now under prevailing dejections, and, having been long so, his eyes cried out, When wilt thou comfort me? Comfort me with thy salvation, comfort me with thy word. Observe, (1.) The suffering and complainings of God's people are secured to them by the word, which will certainly be fulfilled in its season. (2.) The promised salvation and comfort may be, and often are, long-deferred, so that they are ready to faint and fall in the expectation of them. (3.) Though we think the time long ere the promised salvation and comfort come, yet we must still keep our eye upon it, and resolve to take up with nothing short of it. "Thy salvation, thy loved, thy comfort, are what my heart is still upon." 2. Waiting for that help; assured that it will come, and tarrying till it doth come; But I hope in thy word; and, but for hope, the heart would break. When the eyes fail, yet the faith must not; for the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and shall not lie.

33. For I am become like a bottle in the smoke, yet do I not forget thy statutes.

David begs God would make haste to comfort him. 1. Because his affliction was great, and therefore he was an object of God's pity; Lord, make haste to help me, for I am become like a bottle in the smoke, a leather bottle, what is in the throne, which, if it hang any while in the smoke, was not only blackened with soot, but dried, and parched, and shrivelled up. David was thus wasted by age, and sickness, and sorrow. See how affliction will mortar the strongest and stoutest of men! David had been of a ruddy countenance, as fresh as a rose; but now he is withered, his colour is gone, his cheeks are furrowed. Thus does man's beauty consume under God's rebuke, and how many: and he is in the throne, which, if the heart is in the throne, the heart suffers, and suffers greatly. 2. Because, though his affliction was great, yet it had not driven him from his duty, and therefore he was within the reach of God's promise; Yet do I not forget thy statutes. Whatever our outward condition is, we must not cool in our affection to the word of God, nor let that slip out of our minds; no care, no grief, must crowd that out. As some drink and forget the law, (Prov. xxxi. 5,) so others weep and forget the law; but we must, in every condition, both prosperous and adverse, have the things of God in remembrance; and, if we are mindful of God's statutes, we may pray and hope that he will be mindful of our sorrows, though for a time he seems to forget us.

34. How many are the days of thy servant? when wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me?

Here, 1. David prays against the instruments of his troubles, that God would make haste to execute judgment on those that persecuted him. He prays not for power to avenge himself, (he bore no malice to any,) but that God would take to himself the vengeance that belonged to him, and would repay, (Rom. 12.19,) the wages of wickedness in the coin of the days. 2. He prays that the execution of judgment will be a day of great and terrible day it will be, when God will execute judgment on all the proud persecutors of his people; tribulation to them that troubled them; Enoch foretold it, (Jude 14.) whose prophecy perhaps David here had an eye to; and that day we are to look for, and pray for the hastening of; Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.

The long continuance of his trouble; "How many are the days of thy servant? The days of my life are but few;" so some; "therefore let them not all be miserable; and therefore make haste to appear for me against my enemies, before I go hence, and shall be seen no more." Or rather, "The days of my affliction are many, thou seest, Lord, how many they be; when wilt thou return in mercy to me? Sometimes, for the elects' sake, the days of trouble are shortened. Oh let the days of my trouble be shortened; I am thy servant; and therefore, as the eyes of a servant are to the hand of his master, so are mine to thee, until that thou have mercy on me."

83. The proud have digged pits for me, which are not after thy law. 36. All thy commandments are faithful: they persecute me wrongfully; help thou me. 87. They had almost consumed me upon earth: but I forsook not thy precepts.

David's state was herein a type and figure of the state both of Christ and Christians, that he was grievously persecuted: as there are many of his psalms, so there are many of the verses of this psalm, which complain of this, as those here. Where observe,

1. The account he gives of his persecutors, and their malice against him. (1.) They were proud, and in their pride they persecuted him, glorying in this, that they could trample upon one who was so much cried up, and hoping to raise themselves on his ruins. (2.) They were unjust; they persecuted him wrongfully; so far was he from giving them any provocation, that he had studied to oblige them; but for his love they were his adversaries. (3.) They were spiteful; they digged pits for him; which showed that they were deliberate in their designs against him, and that what they did was of malice prepense: it intimates likewise, that they were subtle and crafty, and had the serpent's head as well as the serpent's venom; that they were industrious, and would refuse no pains to do him a mischief; and treacherous, laying snares in secret for him, as hunters do to take wild beasts, xxxv. 7. Such has been the enmity of the serpent's seed to the seed of the woman. (4.) They herein showed their enmity to God himself; the pits they digged for him were not after God's law; he means, they were very much against his law, which forbids to devise evil to one's neighbors and has particularly said, Touch not mine anointed. The law appointed, that if a man digged a pit which occasioned any mischief, he should answer for the mischief, (Exod. xxii. 33, 34.) much more, when it was digged with a mischievous design. (5.) They carried on their designs against him so far, that they had almost consumed him upon earth; they went near to ruin him and all his interests. It is possible that he who shall shortly be consumed in heaven, may be, for the present, almost consumed on earth; and it is of the Lord's mercies, (and, considering the malice of their enemies, it is a miracle of mercy,) that they are not quite consumed. But the bush in which God is, though it burns, shall not be burnt up.

2. His application to God in his persecuted state. (1.) He acknowledges the truth and goodness of his religion, though he suffered; "However it be, all thy commandments are faithful, on them I may rely." (2.) He begs that God would also show that he was a faithful servant, and persecute me, help thou me; help me under my troubles, that I may bear them patiently, and as becomes me, and may still hold fast my integrity, and in due time help me out of my troubles. God help me, is an excellent comprehensive prayer; it is pity that it should ever be used lightly, and as a by-word.

3. His adherence to his duty, notwithstanding all the malice of his persecutors; (v. 87.) But I forsook not thy precepts. That which they aimed at, was, to frighten him from the ways of God, but they could not prevail; he would sooner forsake all that was dear to him in this world, than forsake the word of God; would sooner lose his life, than lose the comfort of doing his duty.

88. Quicken me after thy loving-kindness; so shall I keep the testimony of thy mouth.

Here is, 1. David in care to be found in the way of his duty; his constant desire and design are, to keep the testimonies of God's mouth, to keep to it as his rule, and to keep hold of it as his confidence and portion for ever. This we must keep, whatever we lose.

2. David at prayer for divine grace to assist him therein; "Quicken me after thy loving-kindness; make me alive, and make me lively, so shall I keep thy testimonies; implying, that otherwise he should not keep them. We cannot proceed, nor persevere, in the good way, unless God quicken us, and put life into us; we are therefore here taught to depend upon the grace of God for strength to do every good work, and to depend upon it as grace, as purely the fruit of God's favour. He had prayed before, Quicken me in thy righteousness; (v. 40.) but here, Quicken me after thy loving-kindness. The surest token of God's good-will toward us, is his good work in us.

12. LAMED.

89. For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled in heaven. 90. Thy faithfulness is unto all generations; thou hast established the earth, and it abideth. 91. They continue this day according to thine ordinances; for all are thy servants.

Here, 1. The psalmist acknowledges the unchangeableness of the word of God, and of all his counsels. "For ever, O Lord, thy word is settled. Thou art for ever thyself, so some read it; thou art the same, and with thee there is no variableness, and this is a proof of it. Thy word, by which the heavens were established, is settled there in the abiding products of it;" or the settling of God's word in heaven, is opposed to the changes and revolutions that are here upon earth. All flesh is grass; but the word of the Lord endures for ever. It is settled in heaven, in the secret counsel of God, which is hid in himself, and is far above out of our sight, and is immoveable, as mountains of brass. And his revealed will is as firm as his secret will; as he will fulfill the thoughts of his heart, so no word of his shall fail to the end; for it follows here, Thy faithfulness is unto all generations; the promise is sure to every age of the church, and it cannot be antiquated by track of time. The promises that look ever so far forward shall be performed in their season.

2. He produces, for proof of it, the constancy of the course of nature; Thou hast established the earth, and it abides; it is what it was at first made, and where it was placed at first made. He hath given it weight, and, notwithstanding the convulsions in its own bowels, the agitations of the sea that is interwoven with it, and the violent concussions of the atmosphere that surrounds it, remains unmoveo. "They" (the heavens and the earth, and all the hosts of both) "continue to this day according to thine ordinances; they remain in the places wherein thou hast set them, they fill up the place assigned them, and answer the purposes for which they were intended. "The stability of the ordinances of day and night, of heaven and earth, is produced, to prove the perpetuity of God's covenant, Jer. xxxi. 35. 36. —xxxiv. 20. 21. It is by virtue of God's promise to Noah, (Gen. viii. 22.) that day and night, summer and winter, observe a steady course. "They have continued to this day, and shall still continue to the end of time, acting according to the ordinances which were at first given them; for all are thy servants, they entertain, and set forth thy glory, and in both are thy servants." All the creatures are, in their places, and according to their capacities, serviceable to their Creator, and answer the ends of their creation; and shall man be the only rebel, the only revoler from his allegiance, and the only unprofitable blemish of the earth?

92. Unless thy law had been my delight, I should then have perished in mine affliction.

Here is, 1. The great distress that David was in; he was in affliction, and ready to perish in his affliction; not likely to die, so much as likely to despair: he was ready to give up all for gone, and to lock upon himself as cut off from God's sight; he therefore, with admirable faith and hope, declares that he had not perished, that he kept the possession of his own soul, and was not driven out of his wits by his troubles, but especially that he was enabled to keep close to his God, and was not driven off from his religion by them. Though we are not kept from affliction, yet, if we are kept from perishing in our affliction, we have no reason to say, We have cleansed our hands in vain; or, What profit is it that we have worshipped God?

2. His support in this distress. God's law was his delight, (1.) It had been so formerly, and the remembrance of that was a comfort to him; as it afforded him a good evidence of his integrity. (2.) It was so now in his affliction; it afforded him abundant matter of comfort, and from these fountains of life he drew living waters, when the cisterns of the creature were broken or dried up. His converse with God's law, and his meditations on it, were his delightful entertainment in solitude and sorrow. A Bible is a pleasant companion at any time, if we please.

93. I will never forget thy precepts; for with them thou hast quickened me.

Here is, 1. A very good resolution; "I will never forget thy precepts, but will always return a remembrance of, and regard to, thy word as my rule." It is a resolution for perpetuity, never to be altered. Note, The best evidence of our love to the word of God, is, never to forget it. We must resolve that we will never, at any time, cast off our religion, and never, upon any occasion, lay aside our religion, but that we will be constant to it, and preserve it in it. 2. A very good reason for it; "For by them thou hast quickened me; not only they are quickening, but," (1.) "They have been so to me, I have found them so." Those speak best of the things of God who speak by experience, who can say, that by the word the spiritual life has been begun in them, maintained and strengthened in them, excited and comforted in them. (2.) "Thou hast made them so;" the word of itself, without the grace of God, would not quicken us; ministers can but prophesy upon the dry bones, they cannot put life into them; but, ordinarily, the grace of God works by the word, and makes use of it as a means of quickening; and this is a good reason why we should never forget it, but should highly value what God has put such honour upon, and dearly love what we have found such benefit by, and hope still to find. See here what is the best help for bad memories, namely, good affections; if we are quickened by the word, we should never forget it; nay, that word that does really quicken us to, and in, our duty, is not forgotten; though the expressions be lost, if the impressions remain, it is well.

94. I am thine; save me; for I have sought thy precepts.

Here, 1. David claims relation to God: "I am thine, devoted to thee, and owned by thee, thine in covenant." He does not say, Thou art mine, (as Dr. Manton observes,) though that follows of course, because that was a higher challenge; but, I am thine, expressing himself in a more humble and dutiful way of resignation; nor does he say, I am thus, but, I am thine, not pleading his own good pretensions to qualification, but God's proprietor in him; "I am thine, not my own, not the world's."

2. He proves his claim; "I have sought thy precepts, I have carefully inquired concerning my duty, and diligently endeavoured to do it." This will be the best evidence that we belong to God; all that are his, though they have not found perfection, are seeking it.

3. He improves his claim; "I am thine; save me, save me from sin, save me from ruin." Those that have, in sincerity, given up themselves to God, to be his, may be sure that he will protect them, and preserve them to his heavenly kingdom, Mal. iii. 18.

95. The wicked have waited for me, to destroy me: but I will consider thy testimonies.

Here, 1. David complains of the malice of his enemies; The wicked (and none but such would be so good a man) have waited for me, (not they,) to destroy me; they were very cruel, and aimed at no less than his destruction; they were very crafty, and sought all opportunities to do him a mischief; and they were confident, they expected, (so some read it,) that they should destroy him, they thought themselves sure of their prey.

2. He comforts himself in the word of God, as his protection; While they are prevailing my destruction, I consider thy testimonies, which secure to me my salvation." God's testimonies are then likely to be our support, when we consider them, and dwell in our thoughts upon them.

96. I have seen an end of all perfection: but thy commandment is exceeding broad.

Here we have David's testimony, from his own experience,

1. Of the vanity of the world, and its insufficiency to make us happy; I have seen an end of all perfection. Poor perfection which one sees an end of! Yet such are all those things in this world which pass for perfections. David, in his time, had seen Goliath, the strongest, overcome; Asahel, the swiftest, taken; Ahithophel, the wisest, befooled; Absalom, the fairest, deformed; and, in short, he had seen an end of perfection, of all perfection; he saw it by faith, he saw it by observation, he saw an end of the perfection of the creature, both in respect of sufficiency, it was scanty and defective, (there is that to be done for us which the creature cannot do,) and, in respect of continuance, it will not last our time, for it will not last to eternity, as we must. The glory of man is but as the flower of the grass.

2. Of the fulness of the word of God, and its sufficiency for our satisfaction; But thy commandment is broad, exceeding broad. The word of God reaches to all cases, to all times. The divine law lays a restraint upon the whole man, is designed to sanctify us wholly. There is a great deal required and forbidden in every commandment. The divine promise (for that also is commanded) extends itself to all our burthens, wants, and grievances, and has that in it which will make a portion and happiness for us when we have seen an end of all perfection.

97. O how I love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day.

Here is, 1. David's inexpressible love to the word of God; O how I love I thy law! He protests his affection to the word of God with a holy vehemency; not from love to it in his heart, which, no mattering the corruption of his nature, and the temptation of the world, he could not but wonder at, and at that grace which had wrought it in him. He not only loved the promises, but loved the law, and delighted in it after the inner man.

2. An unexceptionable evidence of this. What we love, we love to think of; by this appeared that David loved the word of God, it was his meditation. He not only read the book of the law, but read in his thoughts, and was delivered into it as into a mould: it was his meditation, not only in the night, when he was silent and solitary, and had nothing else to do, but in the day, when he was full of business and company; nay, and all the day some good thoughts were interwoven with his common thoughts; so full was he of the word of God.

98. Thou, through thy commandments, hast made me wiser than mine enemies: for they are ever with me. 99. I have more understanding than all my teachers: for thy testimonies are my meditation.

We have here an account of David's learning, not that of the Egyptians, but of the Israelites indeed.

1. The good method by which he got it. In his youth, he minded business in the country, as a shepherd; from his youth, he minded business in the court and camp; which way, then, could he get any great store of learning? He tells us here how he came by it; he had it from God as the Author; Thou hast made me wise: all true wisdom is from God. He had it by the word of God, as the means; by his commandments, and his testimonies. These are able to make us wise to salvation, and to furnish the man of God for every good work.

(1.) These David took for his constant companions; "They are ever with me, ever in my mind, ever in my eye." A good man, wherever he goes, carries his Bible along with him, if not in his hands, yet in his head and in his heart. (2.) These he took for the delightful subject of his thoughts; they were his meditation, not only as matters of speculation for his entertainment, as scholars meditate on their notions, but as matters of concern, for his right management, as men of business think of their business, that they may do it in the best manner. (3.) These he took for the commanding rules of all his actions; I keep thy precepts; I make conscience of doing my duty in every thing. The best way to improve in knowledge is, to abide and abound in all the instances of serious godliness for, if any man do his will, he shall know of the doctrine of Christ, shall know more and more of it, John vii. 17. The love of the truth prepares for the light of it; the pure in heart shall see God here.

2. The great eminency he attained to in it. By studying and practising God's commandments, and making them his rule, he learnt to behave himself wisely in all his ways, 1 Sam. xviii. 14. (1.) He outwitted his enemies; Goliath made him wise to battle and defeat their designs against him than they were to lay them. Heavenly wisdom will carry the point, at last, against carnal policy. By keeping the commandments, we secure
God on our side, and make him our Friend, and therein are certainly wiser than those that make him their head by keeping the common judgments; we preserve to ourselves that peace and quiet of mind which our enemies would rob us of, and so are wise for ourselves, wiser than they are for themselves, for this world as well as for the other. (2.) He outstrip his teachers, and had more understanding than all of them. He means either those who would have been his teachers, who blamed his conduct, and undertook to prescribe to him: by keeping God's commandments, he managed his matters so, that it appeared, in the event, he had taken the right measures, and they had taken the wrong. Or, he may mean those who should have been his teachers, the priests and Levites, who sat in Moses's chair, and whose lips ought to have kept knowledge, but who neglected the study of the law, and minded their honours and revenues, and the formalities only of their religion; and so David, who conversed much with the Scripture by that means, became more intelligent than they. Or, he may mean those who had been his teachers when he was young; he built so well upon the foundation which they had laid, that, with the help of his Bible, he became able to teach them, to teach them all. He was not now a babe that needed milk, but had spiritual senses exercised, Heb. v. 14. It is no reflection upon our teachers, but rather an honour to them, to prove them so really to exceed them, and not to need them. By meditation, we preach to ourselves, and so we come to understand more than our teachers, for we come to understand our own hearts, which they cannot. (3.) He outdid the ancients; either those of his day, he was young, like Elisha, and they were very old, (but his keeping of God's precepts taught him more wisdom than the multitude of their years, Job xxxiii. 7, 8.) or those of former days: he himself quotes the proverb of the ancients, Prov. v. 7, but he applied and gave him to understand things better than he could do by tradition, and all the learning that was handed down from preceding ages. In short, the written word is a sure guide to heaven to all the doctors and fathers, the teachers and ancients, of the church; and the sacred writings kept, and kept to, will teach us more wisdom than all their writings.

101. I have refrained my feet from every evil way, that I may keep thy word.

Here is, 1. David's care to avoid the ways of sin; "I have refrained my feet from the evil ways they were ready to step aside into; I checked me, and drew back, as soon as I was aware that I was entering into temptation." Though it was a broad way, a green way, a pleasant way, and a way that many walked in, yet, being a sinful way, it was an evil way, and he refrained his feet from it, foreseeing the end of that way. And his care was universal; he shunned every evil way. By the words of thy lips I have kept me from the paths of the destroyer, Prov. xiv. 24.

2. His care to be found in the way of duty; That I might keep thy word, and never transgress it. His abstaining from sin was, (1.) An evidence that he did conscientiously aim to keep God's word, and had made that his rule. (2.) It was a means of his keeping God's word in the exercises of religion; for we cannot, with any comfort or boldness, attend on God in holy duties, so as in them to keep his word, while we are under guilt, or in any by-way.

102. I have not departed from thy judgments: for thou hast taught me.

Here is, 1. David's constancy in his religion. He had not departed from God's judgments; he had not chosen any other rule than the word of God, nor had he wilfully deviated from that rule. A constant adherence to the ways of God, in trying times, will be a good evidence of our integrity.

2. The cause of his constancy; "For thou hast taught me, they were divine instructions that I learned; I was satisfied that the doctrine was of God, and therefore I stuck to it." Or rather, "It was divine grace in my heart that enabled me to receive those instructions." All the saints are taught of God, for "he it is that gives the understanding; and those, and those only, that are taught of God, will continue to the end in the things that they have learned.

103. How sweet are thy words unto my taste! Yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth! Through thy precepts I get understanding; therefore I hate every false way.

Here is, 1. The wonderful pleasure and delight which David took in the word of God; it was sweet to his taste, sweeter than honey. There is such a thing as a spiritual taste, an inward savour and relish of divine things; such an evidence of them to ourselves, by experience, as we cannot give to others. We have heard them ourselves, John iv. 42. To this scripture-taste the word of God is sweet, very sweet, sweeter than any of the gratifications of sense, even those that are most delicious. David speaks as if he wanted words to express the satisfactions he took in the discoveries of the divine will and grace no pleasure was comparable to it.

2. The unspackleable profit and advantage he gained by the word of God; (1.) It helped him to a good head; "Through thy precepts I get understanding, to discern between truth and falsehood, good and evil, so as not to mistake either in the conduct of my own life, or in advising others." (2.) It helped him to a good heart; "Therefore, because I have got understanding of the truth, I hate every false way, and am steadfastly resolved not to turn aside into it." Observe here, The way of sin is a false way, it deceives, and will ruin, all that walk in it; it is the wrong way, and yet it seems to a man right, Prov. xiv. 12. It is the character of every good man, that he hates the way of sin, and hates it because it is a false way: he not only refrains his feet from it, (v. 101.) but he hates it, has an antipathy to it, and a dread of it. Those who hate sin as sin, will hate all sin, hate every false way, because every false way leads to destruction. And the more understanding we get by the word of God, the more rooted will our hatred of sin be; for, to depart from evil, that is understanding; (Job xxviii. 26.) and the more ready we are in the scriptures, the better furnished we are with answers to temptation.

105. Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.

Observe here, 1. The nature of the word of God, and the great intention of giving it to the world; it is a lamp and a light, it discovers to us that, concerning God and ourselves, which otherwise we could not have known; it shows us what is amiss, and will be dangerous; it directs us in our work and way, and is a dark; a false way; he not only refrains his feet from it; it is a lamp which we may set up by us, and take into our hands for our own particular use, Prov. vi. 23. The commandment is a lamp kept burning with the oil of the Spirit; it is like the lamps in the sanctuary, and the pillar of fire, to Israel.

2. The use we should make of it. It must be not only a light to our eyes, to gratify them, and fill our heads with speculations, but a light to our feet and to our path, to direct us in the right ordering of our conversation; both in the choice of our way in general, and in particular, we take it in that way; that we may not take a false way, nor a false step in the right way. We are then truly sensible of God's goodness to us in giving us such a lamp and light, when we make it a guide to our feet, our path.

106. I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments.

Here is, I. The motion David had of religion; it is, keeping God's righteous judgments. God's commandments are his judgments, the decrees of infinite wisdom. There are righteous judgments, consonant to the eternal rules of equity, and it is our duty to keep them carefully.

2. The obligation he here laid upon himself to be religious, binding himself, by his own promise, to that which he was already bound to by the divine precept, and all little enough. "I have sworn, I have lifted up my hand to the Lord, and I cannot go back; and therefore must go forward, I will cleave to his ways." Note, (1.) It is good for us to bind ourselves with a solemn oath to be religious. We must swear to the Lord as subjects swear allegiance to their sovereign, promising fealty, appealing to God concerning our sincerity in this promise, and owning ourselves liable to the curse, if we do not perform it. (2.) We must often call to mind the vows of God that are upon us, and remember that we have sworn. (3.) We must make conscience of performing unto the Lord our oaths; (an honest man will, as his word;) nor have we sworn to our own hurt, but it will be unspeakably to our hurt, if we do not perform.

107. I am afflicted very much: quicken me, O Lord, according unto thy word.

Here is, 1. The presentation David makes of the sorrowful condition he was in; I am afflicted very much, afflicted in spirit; he seems to mean that especially; he laboured under many discouragements; without were fightings, within fears: this is occasioned to the best saints, therefore think it not strange if sometimes it be ours.

2. The recourse he has to God in this condition; he prays for his grace, "Quicken me, O Lord; make me lively, make me cheerful, quicken me, by afflictions, to greater diligence in my work: quicken me; deliver me out of my afflictions, which will be as life from the dead." He pleads the promise of God, guides his desires by it, and grounds his hopes upon it; Quicken me according to thy word. David resolved to perform his promises to God, (ver. 106.) and therefore could, with humble boldness, beg of God to make good his word to him.

108. Accept, I beseech thee, the free-will-offerings of my mouth, O Lord, and teach me thy judgments.

Tw. things we are here taught to pray for, in reference to our religious performances.

1. Acceptance of them; this we must aim at in all we do in religion, that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of the Lord. That which David here earnestly prays for the acceptance of, is, the free-will-offerings, not of his purse, but of his heart, his praises and prayers; the crown of our lives, (Hos. xiv. 2.) the fruit of our lives, (Heb. i. 15.) these are the spiritual offerings which all Christians, as spiritual priests, must offer to God; and they must be free-will-offerings, for we must offer them abundantly and cheerfully; and it is this willing mind that is accepted. The more there is of freeness and willingness in the service of God, the more pleasing it is to him.

2. Assistance in them; Teach me thy judgments. We cannot offer any thing to God, which we have reason to think he will accept of, but you must be pleased to instruct us in the doing of; and we must be as earnest for the grace of God in us, as for the favour of God towards us.

109. My soul is continually in my hand: yet do I not forget thy law. 110. The wicked have laid a snare for me: yet I erred not from thy precepts.

Here is, 1. David in danger of losing his life. There is but a step between him and death, for the wicked have laid a snare for him; Saul did so many a time, because he hated him for his piety. Wherever he was, he found some design or other laid against him to take away his life, for that was it they aimed at; what they could not effect by open violence, he hoped to compass by treachery, which made him say, My soul is continually in my hand: it was not so with him, only as a man, (so it is true of us all;) wherever we are, we lie exposed to the strokes of death, what we carry in our hand, is easily snatched away from us by violence, or, if sandy, as our life is, it easily of itself slips through our fingers,) but as a man of war, a soldier, who often jeopardized his life in the high places of the field; and especially as a man after God's own heart, and, as such, hated and persecuted, and always delivered to death, (2 Cor. iv. 11.) killed all the day long.

2. David in no danger of losing his religion, notwithstanding this. Thus, in jeopardy every hour, and yet constant to God and his duty, none of these things move him: for, (1.) He does not forget the law, and therefore he is likely to persevere. In the multitude of his cares, for his own safety, he finds com in his head and heart for the word of God, and has that in his mind as fresh as ever; and, where that dwells richly, it will be a well of living water. (2.) He has not yet erred from God's precepts, and therefore it is to be hoped he will not. He had stood many a shock, and kept his ground, and surely that grace which had helped him hitherto would not fail him, but would still prevent his wanderings.

111. Thy testimonies have I taken as a heritage for ever: for they are the rejoicing of my heart. 112. I have inclined my heart to perform thy statutes always, even unto the end.

The psalmist here, in a most affectionate manner, like an Israelite indeed, resolves to stick to the word of God, and to live and die by it.

1. He resolves to portion himself in it, and there to seek his happiness, nay, there to enjoy it; "Thy testimonies have I taken as a heritage for ever, for they are the rejoicing of my heart." The present delight he took in them was an evidence that the good things contained in them were, in his account, the best things, and the treasure which he set his heart upon. (1.) He expected an eternal happiness in God's testimonies; the covenant God had made with him was an everlasting covenant, and therefore he took it as a heritage for ever. He says, They shall be my heritage, yet he could say, "I have made choice of them for my heritage, and will never take up with a portion in this life," xvii. 14, 15. God's testimonies are a heritage to all that have received the Spirit of adoption; for, if children, then heirs; they are a heritage for ever, and that no earthly heritage is; (1 Pet. i. 4.) all the saints accept them as such, take up with them, live upon them, and can therefore be content with but little of this world.
2. He enjoyed a present satisfaction in them; They are the rejoicing of my heart, because they will be my heritage for ever. It requires the heart of a good man to see his portion in the promise of God, and not in the possession of this world. He resolves to show himself by it, and thence to take his measures; I have inclined my heart to do thy statutes. They that have the blessings of God's testimonies, must come under the bonds of his statutes. We must look for comfort only in the way of duty, and that duty must be done, (1.) With full consent and complacency; "I have, by the grace of God, inclined my heart to it, and conquered the aversion I had to it." A good man brings his heart to his work, and then it is done well. A gracious disposition to do the will of God is the acceptable principle of all obedience. (2.) With constancy and perseverance. He would perform God's statutes always, in all instances, in the duty of every day, in a constant course of holy walking, and this to the end, without weariness. This is following the Lord fully.

15. SAMECH.

113. I hate vain thoughts; but thy law do I love.

Here is, 1. David's dread of the risings of sin, and the first beginnings of it; I hate vain thoughts. He does not mean that he hated them in others, for there he could not discern them, but he hated them in his own heart. Every good man makes conscience of his thoughts, for they are words to God: vain thoughts, how light soever most make of them, are sinful and hurtful, and therefore we should account them hateful and dreadful, for they not only divert the mind from that which is good, but open the door to all evil, Jer. iv. 14. Though David could not say that he was free from vain thoughts, yet he could say that he hated them; he did not countenance them, or give them any entertainment, but did what he could to keep them out, at least to keep them under. The evil I do, I allow not.

2. David's delight in the rule of duty; but thy law do I love, which forbids those vain thoughts, and threatens them. The more we love the law of God, the more we shall get the mastery of our vain thoughts, the more hateful they will be to us, as being contrary to the whole law, and the more watchful shall we be against them, lest they draw us from that we love.

114 Thou art my hiding-place and my shield: I hope in thy word.

Here is, 1. God's care of David to protect and defend him, which he comforts himself with, when his enemies were very malicious against him; Thou art my Hiding-place, and my Shield. David, when Saul pursued him, often betook himself to close places for shelter. In war, he betook himself with his shield, now God was both these to him; a Hiding-place to preserve him from danger, and a Shield to preserve him in danger, his life from death, and his soul from sin. Good people are safe under God's protection. He is their Strength and their Shield, their Help and their Shield; their Sun and their Shield; their Shield and their great Reward; and here, their Hiding-place and their Shield. They may live in a retir'd place to him, and repose in him as their Hiding-place, where they are kept in secret. They may by faith oppose his power to all the might and malice of their enemies, as their shield to quench every fiery dart.

2. David's confidence in God; he is safe, and therefore he is easy, under the divine protection. "I hope in thy word, which has acquainted me with thee, and assured me of thy kindness to me?" They who depend on God's promise shall have the benefit of his power, and be taken under his special protection.

115. Depart from me, ye evil-doers: for I will keep the commandments of my God.

Here is, 1. David's firm and fixed resolution to live a holy life; I will keep the commandments of my God. Bravely resolved! like a saint, like a soldier; for true courage consists in a steady resolution against all sin, and for all duty. These that would keep God's commandments, must be often renewing their resolutions to do so; "I will keep them: whatsoever others do, this I will do; though I be singular, though all about me be evil-doers, and desert me; whatever I have done hitherto, I will for the future walk closely with God. They are the commandments of God, of which I, and therefore I will keep them. He is God, and may command me; my God, and will command me nothing but what is for my good."

2. His farewell to bad company, pursuant to this resolution; Depart from me, ye evil-doers. Though David, as a good magistrate, was a terror to evil-doers, yet there were many such, even about court, intruding near his person; these he here abdicates, and resolves to have no conversation with them. Note, They that resolve to keep the commandments of God, must have no society with evil-doers; for bad company is a great hindrance to a holy life. We must not choose wicked people for our companions, nor be intimate with them; we must not do as they do, nor do as they would have us do, Ps. i. 1. Eph. v. 11.

116. Uphold me according unto thy word, that I may live: and let me not be ashamed of my hope.

Here, 1. David prays for sustaining grace; for this grace sufficient he besought the Lord twice; Uphold me, and again, Hold thou me up. He sees himself, not only unable to go on in his duty by any strength of his own, but in danger of falling into sin, unless he was prevented by divine grace; and therefore he is thus earnest for that grace to uphold him in his integrity, (xli. 12.) to keep him from falling, and to keep him from tiring, that he might neither turn aside to evil-doing, nor be weary of well-doing. We stand no longer than God holds us, and go no further than he carries us.

2. He pleads earnestly for this grace.

(1.) He pleads the promise of God, his dependence upon the promise, and his expectation from it; "Uphold me, according to thy word, which word I hope in; and if it be not performed, I shall be made ashamed of my hope, and be called a fool for my credulity." But they that hope in God's word may be sure that the word will not fail them, and therefore their hope will not make them ashamed.

(2.) He pleads the great need he had of God's grace, and the great advantage it would be of to him; Uphold me, that I may live; intimating, that he could not live without the grace of God; he should fall into sin, into death, into hell, if God did not hold him up; but, supported by his hand, he shall live; his spiritual life shall be grounded on the surest foundation, and the rest of eternal life. Hold me up, and I shall be safe; out of danger, and out of the fear of danger. Our holy security is grounded on divine supports.

(x.) He pleads his resolution, in the strength of this grace, to proceed in his duty; "Hold me up, and then I will have respect unto thy statutes con- tinually, and never to turn my eyes or feet aside from them." I will employ myself, so some; I will delight myself, so others, in thy statutes. If God's right hand uphold us, we must, in his strength, go on in our duty; both with diligence and with pleasure. 118. Thou hast trodden down all them that err from thy statutes: for their deceit is falsehood. 119. Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross: therefore I love thy testimonies. 120. My flesh trembleth for fear of thee; and I am afraid of thy judgments.

Here is, 1. God's judgments on wicked people, on those that wander from his statutes, that take his measures from other rules, and will not have God reign over them. All depart from God, and hear of his judgments is certainly an error, and will prove a fatal one. These are the wicked of the earth; they mind earthly things, and lay up their treasures in the earth, and live in pleasure on the earth, and are strangers and enemies to heaven and heavenly things. Now, see how God deals with them, that you may neither fear them, nor envy them. (1.) He treads them all down; he brings them to ruin, to utter ruin, to shameful ruin; he makes them his footstool, tramples on them, brings them low; (Amos i. 9.) he has done it many a time, and he will do it, for he resists the proud, and will triumph over those that oppose his kingdom. Proud persecutors trample upon his people, but, sooner or later, he will trample upon them. (2.) He puts them all away like dross. Wicked people are as dross, which, though it be mingled with the good metal in the ore, and seems to be of the same substance with it, must be separated from it. And, in God's account, they are worthless things, the scum and refuse of the earth, and no more to be compared with the righteous, than dross with fine gold. There is a day coming which will put them away from among the righteous, (Matth. xxiii. 49.) so that they shall have no place in their congregations; (Ps. i. 5.) which will put them away into everlasting fire, the fittest place for the dross. Sometimes, in this world, the wicked, by the censures of the church, or the sword of the magistrate, or the judgments of God, put away as dross, Prov. xxv. 4, 5.

2. The reasons of these judgments. God casts them off, because they err from his statutes; they that will not submit to the commands of the word, shall feel the curses of it. And because their deceit is falsehood, because they deceive themselves by setting up false rules, in opposition to God's statutes, which they err from; and because they go about to deceive others with their hypocritical pretences of good, and their crafty projects of mischief. Their cunning is falsehood, so Dr. Hammond. The utmost of their policy is treachery and perfidiousness; this the God of truth hates, and will punish.

3. The improvement David made of these judgments; he took notice of them, and received instruction from them. The ruin of the wicked helped to fix it on his heart, and was the means of God's grace, to see what comes of sin; therefore I love thy testimonies, which warn me to take heed of these dangerous courses, and keep me from the paths of the destroyer. We see the word of God fulfilled in his judgments on sin and sinners, and therefore we should love it. (2.) His fear of the wrath of God: My flesh trembles for fear of thee. Instead of insulting these who fell under God's displeasure, he humbled himself to God, and hearkened the judgments of God upon wicked people, should make us, [1.] To reverence his terrible majesty, and to stand in awe of him; Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? 1 Sam. vi. 20. [2.] To fear lest we offend him, and become obnoxious to his wrath. Good men have need to be restrained from sin by the terrors of the Lord; especially when judgment begins at the house of God, and hypocrites are discovered, and put away as dross.

16. AIN.

121. I have done judgment and justice; leave me not to mine oppressors. 122. Be surety for thy servant for good: let not the proud oppress me.

David here appeals to God,

1. As his Witness, that he had not done wrong; he could truly say, "I have done judgment and justice; I have made conscience of rendering to all their due, and have not, by force or fraud, hindered any of their right." Take him as a king, he executed judgment and justice to all his people; (2 Sam. viii. 15.) take him in a private capacity, he could say, "I have done judgment and justice, there was no evil or transgression in his hand," 1 Sam. xxiv. 11. Note, Honesty is the best policy, and will be our rejoicing in the day of evil.

2. As his Judge, that he might not be wronged; he, having done justice for others that were oppressed, begs that God would do him justice, and avenge him of his adversaries; "Be surety for thy servant for good; undertake for me against those that would run me down, and ruin me. He is sensible that he cannot make his part good himself, and therefore begs that God would appear for him. Christ is our Surety with God; and, if he be so, Providence shall be our Surety against all the world; who, or what, shall harm us, if God's power and goodness be engaged for our protection and rescue? He does not prescribe to God what he should do for him; only let it be for good, in such way and manner as infinite Wisdom sees best; only let me not be left to mine oppressors. Though David had done judgment and justice, yet he had many enemies; but, having God for his Friend, he hoped they should not have their will against him; and in that hope he prayed again, Let not the proud oppress me. David, one of the best of men, was oppressed by the proud, whom God beholds afar off: the condition, therefore, of the persecuted is better than that of the persecutors, and will appear so at last.

123. Mine eyes fail for thy salvation, and for the word of thy righteousness.

David, being oppressed, is here waiting and wishing for the salvation of the Lord, which would make him easy.

1. He cannot but think that it comes slowly; Mine eyes fail for thy salvation. His eyes were towards it, and had been long so; he looked for help from heaven, and we deceive ourselves if we look for it any other way; but it did not come so soon as he expected. What we need is not to fail, and he was sometimes ready to despair, and to think that, because the salvation did not come when he looked for it, it would never come. It is after the infirmity even of good men, to be weary of waiting God's time, when their time is elapsed.

2. Yet he cannot but hope that it comes surely. For he expects the word of God's righteousness, and no other salvation than what is secured by that word, which cannot fail to the ground, because it is a word of righteousness. Though our eyes fail, yet God's word does not, and therefore those that build upon it, though now discouraged, shall in due time see his salvation.

124. Deal with thy servant according unto thy mercy, and teach me thy statutes.

125. I am thy servant, give me understanding, that I may know thy testimonies.
Here is, 1. David's petition for divine instruction; "Teach me thy statutes; give me to know all thy duty; when I am in doubt, and know not for certain what is my duty, direct me, and make it plain to me; now that I am afflicted, oppressed, and mine eyes ready to fail for thy salvation, let me know what my duty is, in this condition." In difficult times, we should desire more to be told what we must do, than what we may expect; and should pray more to be led into the knowledge of scripture-precepts than of scripture-prophecies. If God, who gave us his statutes, do not teach us, we shall never learn them. How God teaches, is implied in the next petition, Give me understanding, a renewed understanding, apt to receive divine light, that I may know thy testimonies. It is God's prerogative to give an understanding, that understanding, without which we cannot know God's testimonies. Those who know most of God's testimonies desire to know more, and are still earnest with God to teach them, never thinking they know enough.

2. His pleas to enforce this petition.

(1.) He pleads God's goodness to him; Deal with me according to thy mercy. The best saints count this their best plea for any blessing, "Let me have it according to thy mercy." For we deserve no favour from God, nor can we claim any as a debt, but we are then most likely to be easy, when we cast ourselves upon God's mercy, and refer ourselves to it. Particularly, when we come to him for instruction, we must beg it as a mercy, and reckon that in being taught we are well dealt with.

(2.) He pleads his relation to God; "I am thy servant, and have work to do for thee, therefore teach me to do it, and to do it well." The servant has reason to expect, that, if he be at a loss about his work, his master should teach him, and if it were given him an understanding, he would do it well.

"Lord," says David, "I desire to serve thee, show me how." If any man resolve to do God's will as his servant, he shall be made to know his testimonies, John vii. 17. Ps. xxv. 14.

126. It is time for thee, LORD, to work; for they have made void thy law.

Here is, 1. A complaint of the daring impiety of the wicked; David, having in himself a holy indignation at it, humbly represents it to God. "Lord, there are those that have made void thy law, have set thee and thy government at defiance, and have done works that cancel and vacate the obligation of thy commandments. They that sin through infirmity transgress the law, but presumptuous sinners do, in effect, make void the law, saying, Who is the Lord? What is the Almighty, that we should fear him? It is possible a godly man may sin against the commandment, but a wicked man would sin away the commandment, would repeal God's laws, and enact his own lusts. This is the sinfulness of sin, and the malignity of the carnal mind.

2. A prayer that God would appear for the vindication of his own honour. "It is time for thee, LORD, to work, to do something for the effectual confutation of atheists and infidels, and the silencing of those that set their mouth against the heavens." God's time to work, is, when vice is become most aromatic, and the measure of iniquity is full. Now will I arise, saith the Lord. Some read it, and the original will bear it, it is time to work for thee, O Lord; it is time for every one in his place to appear on the Lord's side, against the threatening growth of profaneness and immorality. We must do what we can for the support of the sinking interests of religion, and after all, we must beg of God to take the work into his own hands.

127. Therefore I love thy commandments above gold, yea, above fine gold. 128. Therefore I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right; and I hate every false way.

David aye, as often in this psalm, professes the great love he had to the word and law of God; and, to evidence the sincerity of it, observe,

1. The degree of his love. He loved his Bible better than he loved his money; above gold, yea, above fine gold. Gold, fine gold, is what most men set their hearts upon; nothing charms them and dazzles their eyes so as gold does; it is fine gold, a fine thing in their eyes; they will venture their souls, their God, their all, to get and keep it; but David saw that the word of God answers all purposes better than money does; for it enriches the soul toward God, and therefore he loved it better than gold; for it had done that for him which gold could not do, and would stand him in stead when the wealth of the world would fail him.

2. The ground of his love. Therefore he loved all God's commandments, because he esteemed them to be right, all reasonable and just, and suited to the end for which they were made. They are all as they should be, and no fault can be found with them; and therefore we must love them, because they bear God's image, and are the revelations of his will. If we thus consent to the law, that it is good, we shall delight in it after the inner man.

3. The fruit and evidence of this love; He hated every false way. The way of sin being directly contrary to God's precepts, which are right, is a false way, and therefore they that have a love and esteem for God's law, hate it, and will not be reconciled to it.

17. PE. 129. Thy testimonies are wonderful: therefore doth my soul keep them.

See here, how David was affected toward the word of God.

1. He admired it, as most excellent in itself; Thy testimonies are wonderful. The word of God gives us admirable discoveries of God, and Christ, and another world, and the world of divine love and grace. The majesty of the style, the purity of the matter, the harmony of the parts, are all wonderful; its effects upon the consciences of men, both for conviction and comfort, are wonderful; and it is a sign that we are not acquainted with God's testimonies, or do not understand them, if we do not admire them.

2. He adhered to it, as of constant use to him; "Therefore doth my soul keep them, as a treasure of inestimable value, which I cannot be without." We do not keep them to any purpose, unless our souls keep them; there they must be deposited as the tables of the testimony in the ark, there they must have the innermost and uppermost place. They that see God's word to be admirable, will prize it highly, and preserve it carefully, as that which they promise themselves great things from.

130. The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple.

Here is, 1. The great use for which the word of God was intended; to give light, that is, to give understanding; to give us to understand that which will be of use to us in our travels through this world; and it is the outward and ordinary means by which the Spirit of God enlightens the understanding of all that are sanctified. God's testimonies are not only wonderful, for the greatness of them, but useful, as a light in a dark place.

2. Its efficacy for this purpose; it admirably an
131. I opened my mouth, and panted: for I longed for thy commandments.

Here is, 1. The desire David had toward the word of God; I longed for thy commandments. When he was under a forced absence from God's ordinances, he longed to be restored to them again; when he enjoyed ordinances, he greedy sucked in the word of God, as new-born babes desire the milk. When Christ is formed in the soul, there are gracious longings, unaccountable to one that is a stranger to the work.

2. The degree of that desire, appearing in the expression of it; I opened my mouth, and panted; as one, overcome with heat, or almost stifled, pants for a mouthful of fresh air. Thus strong, thus earnest, should our desires be toward God, and the remembrance of his name, xlii. 1, 2. Luke xii. 50.

132. Look thou upon me, and be merciful unto me, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name.

Here is, 1. David's request for God's favour to himself; Look graciously upon me; let me have thy smiles, and the light of thy countenance; take cognizance of me and my affairs, and be merciful to me; let me taste the sweetness of thy mercy, and receive the gifts of thy mercy. See how humble his petition is; he asks not for the operations of God's hand, only for the smiles of his face; a good look is enough; and for that he does not plead merit, but implores mercy.

2. His acknowledgment of his favour to all his people; As thou usest to do unto those that love thy name, so also to me, and may either of the two be shown to me; let me be shown to you, (as I have been shown to them) that which thou usest to bestow on those that love thy name, which thou bearest to thy chosen, cxi. 4, 5. He desires no more, no better, than neighbour's fare, and he will take up with no less; common looks and common mercies will not serve, but such as are reserved for those that love him; which are such as eke has not seen, 1 Cor. ii. 9. Note, The dealings of God with them that love him, are such, that a man needs not desire to be any better dealt with, for he will make them truly and eternally happy. And as long as God deals with us no otherwise than as he uses to deal with those that love him, we have no reason to complain, 1 Cor. x. 13.

133. Order my steps in thy word: and let not any iniquity have dominion over me.

Here David prays for two great spiritual blessings, and is, in this verse, as earnest for the good work of God in him, as, in the verse before, for the good-will of God toward him. He prays,

1. For direction in the paths of duty; Order my steps in thy word; having led me into the right way, let every step I take in that way be under the conduct of thy grace. We ought to walk by rule; all the motions of the soul must not only be kept within the bounds prescribed by the word, so as not to transgress them, but carried out in the paths prescribed by the word, so as not to trifle in them. And therefore we must beg of God, that, by his grace and power, he would order our steps accordingly.

2. For deliverance from the power of sin; Let not iniquity have dominion over me, so as to gain my consent to it, and that I should be led captive by it. The dominion of sin is to be dreaded and deprecated by every one of us; and if in sincerity we pray against it, we may receive that promise as an answer to the prayer, (Rom. vi. 14.) Sin shall not have dominion over you.

134. Deliver me from the oppression of man: so will I keep thy precepts.

Here, 1. David prays that he might live a quiet and peacable life, and might not be harassed and discomposed by those that studied to be vexatious; Deliver me from the oppression of man, whom God can control, and whose power is limited; let them know themselves to be but men, (ix. 20.) and let me be delivered out of the hands of unreasonable men.

2. He prays that then he would live in all godliness and honesty. Let me be delivered out of the hands of my enemies, that I may serve God without fear; so will I keep thy precepts. Not but that he would keep God's precepts, though he should be continued under oppression; but so shall I keep thy precepts more cheerfully, and with more enlargement of heart, my bonds being loosed. Then we may expect temporal blessings, when we desire them with this in our eye, that we may serve God the better.

135. Make thy face to shine upon thy servant; and teach me thy statutes.

David here, as often elsewhere, writes himself God's servant, a title he gloried in, though he was a king: now here, as became a good servant,

1. He is very ambitious of his Master's favour, accounting that his happiness and chiefest good. He asks not for corn and wine, for silver and gold, but, Make thy face to shine upon thy servant; let it be accepted of thee, and let me know that I am so. Comfort me with the light of thy countenance, in every cloudy and dark day; if the world frown upon me, yet do thou smile.

2. He is very solicitous about his master's work, accounting that his business and chief concern; this he would be instructed in, that he might do it, and do it well, so as to be accepted in the doing of it; Teach me thy statutes. Note. We must pray as earnestly for grace as for comfort. If God hides his face from us, it is because we have been careless in keeping his statutes; and therefore, that we may be qualified for the returns of his favour, we must pray for wisdom to do our duty.

136. Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law.
Here we have David in sorrow,
1. It is a great sorrow; to that degree, that he weeps rivers of tears; commonly, where there is a gracious heart, there is a weeping eye; in conformity to Christ, who was a Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. David had prayed for comfort, and the Lord had promised it (Ps. lix. 16), and now pleads that he was qualified for that comfort, and had need of it, for he was one of them that mourned in Zion, and they that do so shall be comforted, Isa. lxi. 3.

2. It is godly sorrow. He wept not for his troubles, though they were many, but for the dishonour to God, Because they keep not thy law. Either, because mine eyes keep not thy law, so some. The eye is the inlet and outlet of a great deal of sin, and therefore it is required, that what we do not approve of in ourselves, they, those about me, v. 139. Nete, The sins of sinners are the sorrows of saints. We must mourn for that which we cannot mend.

18. TZADDI.

137. Righteous art thou, O Lord, and upright are thy judgments. 138. Thy testimonies that thou hast commanded are righteous and very faithful.

Here is, 1. The righteousness of God, the infinite rectitude and perfection of his nature; as he is what he is, so he is what he should be, and in every thing acts as becomes him; there is nothing wanting, nothing amiss, in God; his will is the eternal rule of equity, and he is righteous, for he doeth all according to it.

2. The righteousness of his government. He rules the world by his providence, according to the principles of justice, and never did, nor ever can, do any wrong to any of his creatures; Upright are thy judgments, the promises and threatenings are executions of both. Every word of God is pure, and he will be true to it; he perfectly knows the merits of every cause, and will judge accordingly.

3. The righteousness of his commands, which he has given to be the rule of our obedience; Thy testimonies that thou hast commanded, which are backed with thy sovereign authority, and to which thou dost require our obedience, are exceeding righteous and faithful: righteousness and faithfulness itself. As he acts like himself, so his law requires that we act like ourselves, and like him; that we be just to every man, and to God, alike. Those are the engagements we lay ourselves under both to God and man. That which we are commanded to practice is righteous; that which we are commanded to believe is faithful. It is necessary to our faith and obedience that we be convinced of this.

139. My zeal hath consumed me: because mine enemies have forgotten thy word. Here is, 1. The great contempt which wicked men put upon religion; Mine enemies have forgotten thy words. They have often heard them, but so little did they heed them, that they could forget them, they willingly forget them; not only, through carelessness, let them slip out of their minds, but contrived how to cast them behind their backs. This is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked, and particularly of their malignity and enmity to the people of God; they have forgotten the words of God, else those would give check to their sinful courses.

2. The great concern which godly men show for religion. David reckoned those his enemies who forgot the words of God, because they were enemies to religion, which he had entered into a league with, offensive and defensive. And therefore his zeal even consumed him, when he observed their impie-ties. He conceived such an indignation at their wickedness as preyed upon his spirits, act them up, (as Christ's zeal, John ii. 17.) swallowed up all inferior considerations, and made him forget himself. My zeal has pressed or constrained me; so Dr. Hammond reads it, Acts xvii. 3. Zeal against sin should constrain us to do what we can against it in our places, at least, to do so much the more in religion ourselves. The worse others are, the better we should be.

140. Thy word is very pure: therefore thy servant loveth it.

Here is, 1. David's great affection for the word of God; Thy servant loveth it. Every good man, being a servant of God, loves the word of God, because it lets him know his Master's will, and directs him in his Master's work. Wherever there is grace, there is a warm attachment to the word of God.

2. The ground and reason of that affection; he saw it to be very pure, and therefore he loved it. Our love to the word of God is then an evidence of our love to God, when we love it for the sake of its purity; because it bears the image of God's holiness and is designed to make us partakers of his holiness. It commands purity; and as it is itself refined from all corrupt mixture, so, if we receive it in the light of love of God, it will remove from the dross of worldliness and fleshly-minDEDness.

141. I am small and despised; yet do not I forget thy precepts.

Here is, 1. David pious, and yet poor. He was a man after God's own heart, one whom the King of kings did delight to honour, and yet small and despised, in his own account, and in the account of many others. Men's real excellency cannot always secure them from contempt; nay, it often exposes them to the scorn of some, and always makes them lean on their own eyes. God has chosen the foolish things of the world, and it has been the common lot of his people to be a despised people.

2. David poor, and yet pious; small and despised for his strict and serious godliness; yet his conscience can witness for him, that he did not forget God's precepts. He will not throw off his religion, though it exposed him to contempt, for he knew that was designed to try his constancy. When we are small and despised, we have the more reason to remember God's precepts, that we may have them to support us under the pressures of a low condition.

142. Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness, and thy law is the truth.

Observe, 1. That God's word is righteousness, and it is an everlasting righteousness; it is the rule of God's judgment, and it is consonant to his counsels from eternity, and will direct his sentence for eternity. The word of God will judge us, it will judge us in righteousness, and by it our everlasting state will be determined. This should possess us with a strong reason for great reverence for the word of God, that it is righteousness itself, the standard of righteousness, and it is everlasting in its rewards and punishments.

2. That God's word is a law, and that law is truth. See the double obligation we are under to be governed by the word of God; we are reasonable creatures, and as such we must be ruled by truth, acknowledging the force and power of it. If the principles be true, the practices must be agreeable to them, else we do not act rationally. We are creatures, and therefore subjects, and must be ruled by our Creator; and whatever he commands we are bound to obey as a law. See how these obligations are here twisted, these cords of a man: here is truth brought to the understanding, there to sit chief, and direct the motions of the whole man. But, lest the authority of that should become weak through the flesh, here is a law to bind the will, and bring that into subjection. God's truth is a law, (John xviii. 37.) and God's law is the truth; surely we cannot break such words as these asunder.

143. Trouble and anguish have taken hold on me; yet thy commandments are my delights. 144. The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live.

These two verses are almost a repetition of the two foregoing verses, but with improvements.

1. He again professes his constant adherence to God and his duty, notwithstanding the many difficulties and discouragements he met with. He had said, (v. 141.) I am small and despised, and yet adhere to my duty; here he finds himself not only mean, but miserable, as far as this world could make him so. Trouble and anguish have laid hold on me; trouble without, anguish within; they surprised him, they seized him, they held him. Sorrows are often the lot of saints in this vale of tears; they are in heaviness through manifold temptations. There he had said, Yet do I not forget thy precepts; here he carries his constancy much higher; Yet thy commandments are my delights. All this trouble and anguish did not put his mouth out of taste for the comforts of the word of God, but he could still relish them, and find that peace and pleasure in them, which all the calamities of this present time could not deprive him of. There are delights, variety of delights, in the word of God, which the saints have often the sweetest enjoyment of, when they are in trouble and anguish, 2 Cor. i. 3.

2. He again acknowledges the everlasting righteousness of God's word as before; (v. 142.) The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting, and cannot be altered; and when it is admitted in its power into a soul, it is there an abiding principle, a well of living water, John iv. 14. We ought to meditate much and often upon the equity and the eternity of the word of God. Here he adds, by way of inference, (1.) His prayer for grace; Give me understanding. Those that know much of the word of God, should still covet to know more; for them there is more to be known. He does not say, “Give me a further revelation,” but, Give me a further understanding; what is revealed, we should desire to understand, and what we know, to know better; and we must go to God for a heart to know. (2.) His hope of eternity; “Give me this renewed understanding, as if I might (shall) live; shall live for ever, shall be eternally happy, and shall be comforted, for the present, in the prospect of it.” This is life eternal, to know God, John xvii. 3.

145. I cried with my whole heart; hear me, O Lord: I will keep thy statutes. 146. cried unto thee; save me, and I shall keep thy testimonies.

Here is, 1. David's good prayers, by which he sought to God for mercy; these he mentions here, as a boasting of them, or trusting to any merit in them, but reflecting upon them with comfort, that he had taken the appointed way to comfort. Observe here, (1.) That he was inward with God in prayer, he prayed with his heart; and the prayer is acceptable no further than the heart goes along with it. Lip-labour, if that be all, is lost labour. (2.) He was importunate with God in prayer; he cried, as one in earnest, with fervour of affection, and a holy vehemence and vigour of desire. He cried with his whole heart; all the powers of his soul were not only engaged and employed, but exerted to the utmost, in his prayers. Then we are likely to speed, when we thus strive and wrestle in prayer. (3.) That he directed his prayer to God; I cried unto thee. Whether should the child go but to his father, when any thing is with him that he could not say before him? Or, that he could not say it before any one, but bring it to God in prayer?

3. That he was earnest for an answer; and not only looked up in his prayers, but looked after them, to see what became of them; (Ps. v. 3.) “Lord, hear me, and let me know that thou hearest me.”

2. David's good purposes, by which he bound himself to duty, when he was in the pursuit of mercy. “I will keep thy statutes; I am resolved that by thy grace I will;’ for, if we turn away our ear from hearing the law, we cannot expect an answer of peace to our prayers, Prov. xxviii. 9. This purpose is used as a humble plea; (v. 146.) “Lord, hear me;” I have put my sins asunder, and all my temptations, all the hindrances that lie in my way; that I may keep thy testimonies. We must cry for salvation, not that we may have the ease and comfort of it, but that we may have an opportunity of serving God the more cheerfully.

147. I prevented the dawning of the morning, and cried; I hoped in thy word. 148. Mine eyes prevent the night-watches, that I might meditate in thy word.

David goes on here to relate how he had abounded in the duty of prayer, much to his comfort and advantage: he cried unto God, offered up to him his pious and devout attentions with all seriousness.

Observe, 1. The handmaid of his devoted. The two great exercises that attended his prayers, were help to his understanding, (1.) Hope in God's word, which encouraged him to continue instant in prayer, though the answer did not come immediately; “I cried, and hoped that at last I should speed, because the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie. I hoped in thy word, which I knew would not fail me.” (2.) Meditation in God's word. The more intimately we converse with the word of God, and the more we dwell upon it in our thoughts, the better able we shall be to speak to God in his own language, and the better we shall know what to pray for as we ought. Reading the word will not serve, but we must meditate in it.

2. The hours of his devotion; he prevented the dawning of the morning; may, and the night-watches. See here, (1.) That David was an early riser, which perhaps contributed to his eminency. He was none of those that say, Yet a little sleep. (2.) That he began the day with God; the first thing he did in the morning, before he admitted any business, was, to pray; when his mind was most fresh, and in the best frame. If our first thoughts in the morning be of God, it will help to keep us in his fear all the day long. (3.) That his mind was so full of God, and the cares and delights of his religion, that a little sleep served his turn; even in the night-watches, when he waked from his first sleep, he would rather meditate and pray, than turn him and go to sleep again. He esteemed the words of God's mouth more than his necessary repose, which we can as ill spare as our food, Job xxiii. 12. (4.) That he would redeem time for religious exercises; he was full of business all day, but that will excuse no man from secret devotion; it is better to take time from sleep, as David did, than not to find time for prayer. And this is true prayer; such as David made, that we can never come unassayably to the throne of grace; for we may have access to it at all hours. Baal may be asleep, but Israel's God never slumbers, nor are there any hours in which he may not be spoken with.

149. Hear my voice, according unto thy loving-kindness: O Lord, quicken me according to thy judgment. Here, 1. David applies himself to God for grace and comfort, with much solemnity. He begs of God to hear his voice: "Lord, I have something to say to thee; shall I obtain a gracious audience?" Well, what has he to say? What is his petition, and what is his request? It is not long, but it has much in a little; "Lord, quicken me; stir me up to that which is good, and make me vigorous and lively, and cheerful in it. Let habits of grace be drawn out into acts."

2. He encourages himself to hope that he shall obtain his request; for he depends, (1.) Upon God's loving-kindness; "He is good, therefore he will be good to me, who hope in his mercy. His loving-kindness manifested to me will help to quicken me, and put life into me." 2. Upon God's judgment, that is, his wisdom; "He knows what I need, and what is good for me, and therefore will quicken me." Or his promise, the word which he has spoken, mercy secured by the new covenant; Quicken me, according to the tenor of that covenant.

150. They draw nigh that follow after mischief: they are far from thy law. 151. Thou art near, O Lord; and all thy commandments are truth. Here is, 1. The apprehension David was in of danger from his enemies. (1.) They were very malicious, and industrious in prosecuting their malicious designs; they follow after mischief, any mischief they could do to David or his friends; they would let slip no opportunity, nor let fall any pursuit, that might be to his hurt. (2.) They were very impious, and had no fear of God before their eyes; They are far from thy law; setting themselves as far as they can out of the reach of its convictions and commands. The persecutors of God's people are such as make light of God himself; we may therefore be sure that God will take his people's part against them. (3.) They followed him close, and he was just ready to fall into their hands; They draw nigh, higher than they were; so that they got ground of him; they were at his heels, just upon his back. God sometimes suffers persecutors to prevail very far against his people, so that, as David said, (1 Sam. xx. 3.) There is but a step between them and death. Perhaps this comes in here as a reason why David was so earnest in prayer, v. 149. God brings us into imminent perils, as he did Jacob, that, like him, we may wrestle for a blessing.

2. The assurance David had of protection with God; "They draw nigh to destroy me, but thou art near; O Lord, to save me; not only mightier than they, and therefore able to help me against them, but nearer than they, and therefore ready to help." It is the happiness of the saints, that, when trouble is near, God is near, and no trouble can separate between them and him. He is never far to seek, but he is within our call, and means are within his call, Deut. iv. 7. All thy commandments are truth. The enemies thought to defeat the promises God had made to David, but he was sure it was out of their power, they were inviolably true, and would be infallibly performed.

152. Concerning thy testimonies, I have known of old that thou hast founded them for ever.

This confirms what he had said in the close of the foregoing verses, All thy commandments are truth; he means the covenant, the word which God has commanded to a thousand generations. This is firm, as true as truth itself. For, 1. God has founded it so; he has framed it for a perpetuity; such is the constitution of it, and so well ordered is it in all things, that it cannot but be sure. The promises are founded for ever, so that, when heaven and earth pass away, every iota and tittle of the promise shall stand firm, 2 Cor. i. 20. 2. David had found it so; both by a work of God's grace upon his heart, (begetting in him a full persuasion of the truth of God's word, and enabling him to rely upon it with a full satisfaction,) and by the works of his providence on his behalf, fulfilling the promise beyond what he expected. Thus he knew of old, from the days of his youth, ever since he began to look toward God, that the word of God is what one can venture by, and that assurance was confirmed by the observations and experiences of his own life, all along, and of others that had gone before him in the ways of God. All that ever dealt with God, and trusted in him, will own that they have found him faithful.

153. Consider mine affliction, and deliver me; for I do not thou thy law. 154. Plead my cause, and deliver me: quicken me according to thy word. Here, 1. David prays for succour in distress. Is any afflicted? Let him pray; let him pray as David does here, (1.) He has an eye to God's pity, and prays, "Consider mine affliction; take it into thy thoughts, and all the circumstances of it, and sit by as one unconcerned." God is never unmindful of his people's afflictions, but he will have us to put him in remembrance, (Isa. xlix. 26.) to spread our case before him, and then leave it to his compassionate consideration to do in it as in his wisdom he shall think fit, in his own time and way. (2.) He has an eye to God's power, and prays, Deliver me; and again, Deliver me; consider my troubles, and bring me out of them. God has promised deliverance; (l. 15.) and we may pray for it, with submission to his will, and with regard to his glory, that we may serve him the better. (3.) He has an eye to God's righteousness, and prays, Plead my cause; be thou my Patron and Advocate, and take me for thy client. David had a just cause, but his adversaries were many and mighty, and he was in danger of being run down by them; yet he therefore begs of God to clear his integrity, and silence their false accusations. If God do not plead his people's cause, who will? He is righteous, and they commit themselves to him, and therefore he will do it, and do it effectually, Isa. li. 22. Jer. l. 34. (4.) He has an eye to God's grace, and prays, Quicken me; Lord, I am weak, and unable to bear my troubles; my spirit is apt to droop and sink. O that thou wouldest revive and comfort me, till the deliverance come!"

2. He pleads his dependence upon the word of God, and upon his guidance; Quicken, and deliver me, according to thy word of promise; for I do not forget thy precepts. The closer we cleave to the word of God, both as our rule, and as our stay, the more assurance we may have of deliverance in due time.
155. Salvation is far from the wicked: for they seek not thy statutes.

Here is, 1. The description of wicked men; they do not only not do God's statutes, but they do not so much as seek them; they do not acquaint themselves with them, nor so much as desire to know their duty, or in the least endeavour to do it. These are wicked indeed, who do not think the law of God worth inquiring after, but are altogether regardless of it, being resolved to live at large; and to walk in the way of their heart.

2. Their doom; Salvation is far from them. They cannot upon any good grounds promise themselves temporal deliverance. Let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord. How can they expect to seek God's favour with success, when they are in adversity, who never sought his statutes, when they were in prosperity? But eternal salvation is certainly far from them. They flatter themselves with a conceit that it is near, and that they are going to heaven; but they are mistaken, it is far from them, they thrust it from them, by thrusting the Saviour from them; it is so far from them, that they cannot reach it, and the longer they persist in sin, the further it is; nay, while salvation is far from them, damnation is near; it slumbers not; Behold, the Judge stands before the door.

156. Great are thy tender mercies, O Lord; quicken me according to thy judgments.

Here, 1. David admires God's grace; Great are thy tender mercies, O Lord. The goodness of God's nature, as it is his glory, so it is the joy of all the saints; his mercies are tender, for he is full of compassion; they are many, they are great, a fountain that can never be exhausted; he is rich in mercy to all that call upon him. He had spoken of the misery of the wicked, (v. 155.) but God is good notwithstanding; there were tender mercies sufficient in God to have saved them, if they had not despised the riches of those mercies. They that are delivered from the sinner's doom, are bound for ever to own the greatness of God's mercies which delivered them.

2. He begs for God's grace, reviving, quickening, grace, according to his judgments, according to the tenor of the new covenant, that established rule by which he goes in dispensing that grace. Or, according to his munier, his custom or usage with those that love his name, v. 152.

157. Many are my persecutors and mine enemies; yet do I not decline from their testimonies.

Here is, 1. David surrounded with difficulties and dangers; Many are my persecutors and mine enemies. When Saul, the King, was his persecutor and enemy, no marvel that many more were; multitudes will follow the pernicious ways of abused authority. David, being a public person, had many enemies, but withal he had many friends, who loved him and wished him well, let him set the one over against the other. In this, David was a type both of Christ and his church. The enemies, the persecutors of both, are many.

2. David established in the way of his duty, notwithstanding; "Yet do I not decline from thy testimonies, as knowing that, while I adhere to them, God is for me; and then no matter who is against me." A man who is steady in the way of his duty, though he may have many enemies, needs fear none.

158. I beheld the transgressors, and was grieved; because they kept not thy word.

Here is, 1. David's sorrow for the wickedness of the wicked. Though he conversed much at home, yet sometimes he looked abroad, and could not but see the wicked walking on every side. He beheld the transgressors, those whose sins were open before all men, and it grieved him to see them dishonour God, serve Satan, debauch the world, and ruin their own souls; to see the transgressors so numerous, so daring, so very impudent, and so dastardly to draw unstable souls into their snares. All this cannot but be a grief to those who have any regard to the glory of God, and the welfare of mankind.

2. The reason of that sorrow. He was grieved, not because they were vexatious to him, but because they were provoking to God; They kept not thy word. That they hate sin truly, hate it as sin, as a transgression of the law of God, and a violation of his word.

159. Consider how I love thy precepts; quicken me, O Lord, according to thy loving-kindness.

Here is, 1. David's appeal to God concerning his love to his precepts; "Lord, thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love them; consider it then, and deal with me as thou usest to deal with those that love thy word, which thou hast magnified above all thy name." He does not say, "Consider how I fail thy precepts," he was conscious to himself, that in many things he came short; but, "Consider how I love thee." Our obedience is then only pleasing to God, and pleasant to ourselves, when it comes from a principle of love.

2. His petition thereupon; "Quicken me, to do my duty with vigour; revive me, keep me alive; not according to any merit of mine, though I love thy word, but according to thy loving-kindness;" to that we owe our lives, nay, that is better than life itself. We need not desire to be quickened any further than God's loving-kindness will quicken us.

160. Thy word is true from the beginning: and every one of thy righteous judgments endureth for ever.

David here comforts himself with the faithfulness of God's word, for the encouragement of himself and others to rely upon it.

1. It has always been found faithful hitherto, and never failed any that ventured upon it. It is true from the beginning. Ever since God began to reveal himself to the children of men, all he said was true, and to be trusted. The church, from its beginning, was built upon this rock. It has not gained its validity by track of time, as many governments, whose best plea is prescription and long usage. Quad initio non valet, tractu tempestis convaleat —That which, at first, wanted validity, in the progress of time, acquired it. But the beginning of God's word was true, so some read it; his government was laid on a sure foundation. And all, in every age, that have received God's word in faith and love, have found every saying in it faithful and well worthy of all acceptation.

2. It has been found faithful to the end, because righteous. Every one of the judgments endures for ever unalterable, and of perpetual obligation; adjusting men's everlasting doom.

21. SCHIN.

161. Princes have persecuted me without a cause: but my heart standeth in awe of thy word.

David here lets us know,
1. How he was discouraged in his duty by the fear of man; Princes persecuted him. They looked upon him as a traitor and an enemy to the government, and under that notion sought his life, and bid him go serve other gods, 1 Sam. xxxvi. 19. It has been the common lot of the best men to be persecuted; and the case is the worse, if princes be the persecutors, for they have not only the sword in their hand, and therefore can do the more hurt, but they have the law on their side, and can do it with reputation and a colour of justice. It is sad that the power which magistrates have from God, and should use for him, should ever be employed against him. But, marvel not at the matter, Eccl. v. 8. It was not so, when princes persecuted him, he could truly say it was without cause, he never gave them any provocation.

2. How he was kept to his duty, notwithstanding, by the fear of God; "They would make me stand in awe of them and their word, and do as they bid me; but my heart stands in awe of thy word, and I was resolved to please God, and keep in with him, whoever is displeased, and falls out with me." Every gracious soul stands in awe of the word of God, of the authority of its precepts, and the terror of its threatenings; and to those that do so, nothing appears, in the power and wrath of man, at all formidable. We ought to obey God rather than men, and to make sure of God's favour, though we throw ourselves under the frowns of all the world, Luke xii. 4, 5. The heart that stands in awe of God's word, is armed against the temptations that arise from persecution.

II. I rejoice at thy word, as one that findeth great spoil.

Here is, 1. The pleasure David took in the word of God. He rejoiced at it, rejoiced that God had made such a discovery of his mind, that Israel was blessed with that light, when other nations sat in darkness; that he was himself let into the understanding of it, and had had experience of the power of it. He took a pleasure in reading it, hearing it, and meditating on it, and every thing he met with in it was agreeable to him. He had just now said, that his heart stood in awe of his word, and yet here, that he rejoiced in it; the more reverence we have for the word of God, the more joy we shall find in it.

2. The degree of that pleasure, as one that finds great spoil. This supposes a victory over the enemy. It is through much opposition that a soul comes to this, to rejoice in God's word. But, besides the pleasure and honour of a conquest, there is great advantage gained by the plunder of the field, which adds much to the joy. By the word of God we become more than conquerors, that is, unassailable gainers.

I hate and abhor lying; but thy law do I love.

Love and hatred are the leading affections of the soul; if those be fixed right, the rest move accordingly. Here we have them fixed right in David.

1. He had a rooted antipathy to sin, he could not endure to think of it; I hate and abhor lying; which may be taken for all sin, insomuch as by it we deal treacherously and perfidiously with God, and put a cheat upon him. Hypocrisy is lying; Vice is the false doctrine is lying; breach of faith is lying. Lying, in commerce or conversation, is a sin, which every good man hates and abhors, hates and dreads, because of the seven things which the Lord hates, one is a lying tongue, and another is a false witness that speaks lies, Prov. vi. 16. Every man hates to have a lie told him; but we should more hate telling a lie, because by the former we only receive an affront from men, by the latter we give an affront to God.

2. He had a rooted affection to the word of God; Thy law do I love. And therefore he abhorred lying, for lying is contrary to the whole law of God; and the reason why he loved the law of God, was, because of the truth of it. The more we see of the amiable beauty of truth, the more we shall see of the detestable deformity of a lie.

164. Seven times a day do I praise thee: because of thy righteous judgments.

David, in this psalm, is full of complaints, yet those did neither justly out his praises, nor put him out of tune for them; whatever condition a child of God is in, he does not want matter for praise, and therefore should not want a heart. See here,

1. How often David praised God; Seven times a day, very frequently; not only every day but often every day. Many think that once a week will serve, or once or twice a day, but David would praise God seven times a day at least. Praising God is a duty which we should very much abound in.

2. What he praised God for; because of thy righteous judgments. We must praise God for his precepts, which are all just and good, for his promises and threatenings, and the performance of both in his providence. We are to praise God even for our afflictions, if through grace we get good by them.

165. Great peace have they which love thy law: and nothing shall offend them.

Here is an account of the happiness of good men, who are governed by a principle of love to the word of God, that make it their rule, and are ruled by it.

1. They are easy, and have a holy serenity: none enjoy themselves more than they do; Great peace have they that love thy law, abundant satisfaction in doing their duty, and pleasure in reflecting upon it. The work of righteousness is peace, (Isa. xxxii. 17.) such peace as the world can neither give nor take away. They shall rejoice in great peace without, and yet enjoy great peace within; sat lucis intus—abundance of internal light. They that love the world have great vexation, for it does not answer their expectation; they that love God's word have great peace, for it outdoes their expectation, and in it they have sure footing.

2. They are safe, and have a holy security; Nothing shall offend them; nothing shall be scandal, snare, or stumbling-block, to them, to entangle them, either in guilt or grief. No event of providence shall be either an invincible temptation or an intolerable affliction to them, but their love to the word of God shall enable them both to hold fast their integrity and to preserve their tranquillity. They will make the best of that which is, and not quarrel with any thing that God does. Nothing shall offend or hurt them, for every thing shall work for good to them, and therefore shall please them and they reconcile themselves to it. They, in whom this holy love reigns, will not be apt to perplex themselves with needless scruples, or to take offence at their brethren, 1 Cor. xiii. 6, 7.

166. LORD, I have hoped for thy salvation, and done thy commandments.

Here is the whole duty of man; for we are taught,

1. To keep our eye upon God's favour as our end; "Lord, I have hoped for thy salvation, not only temporal but eternal salvation. I have hoped for that as my happiness, and laid up my treasure in it; I have hoped for it as thine, as a happiness of thy preparing, thy promising, and which consists in being with thee; that hope of this has raised me above the world, and borne me up under all my burdens in it.”

2. To keep our eye upon God’s word as our rule, I have done thy commandments; I have made conscience of conforming myself to thy will in every thing. Observe here how God has joined these two together, and let no man put them asunder. We cannot, upon good grounds, hope for God’s salvation, unless we set ourselves to do his commandments, keep his statutes, that he may open the way to do his commandments, ought to keep up a good hope of the salvation; and that hope will both engage and enlarge the heart in doing the commandments. The more lively the hope is, the more lively the obedience will be.

167. My soul hath kept thy testimonies; and I love them exceedingly. 168. I have kept thy precepts and thy testimonies: for all my ways are before thee.

David’s conscience here witnesses for him. 1. That his practices were good. (1.) He loved God’s testimonies, he loved them exceedingly. Our love to the word of God must be a superlative love; we must love it better than the wealth and pleasure of this world: and it must be a victorious love, such as will subdue and mortify our lusts, and extirpate carnal affections. (2.) He kept them, his soul kept them, bodily exercised; profits little in religion, we must make heart-work of it, or we make nothing of it. The soul must be sanctified and renewed, and delivered into the mould of the word; the soul must be employed in glorifying God, for he will be worshipped in the spirit. We must keep both the precepts and the testimonies, the commands of God by our obedience to them, and his promises by our reliance on them.

2. That he was governed herein by a principle; “Therfore I have kept thy precepts, because by faith I have seen thine eye always upon me, all my ways are before thee; thou knowest every step I take, and strictly observest all I say and do. Thou dost see and accept all that I say and do well; thou dost see and disapprove all I say and do amiss.” Note, The consideration of this, that God’s eye is upon us at all times, should make us very careful in everything to keep his commandments, Gen. xviii. 1. 22. TAU.

169. Let my cry come near before thee, O LORD: give me understanding according to thy word. 170. Let my supplication come before thee: deliver me according to thy word.

Here is, 1. A general petition for audience repeated; Let my cry come near before thee; and again, Let my supplication come before thee. He calls his prayer his supplication, which denotes the humility of it; and his supplication, which denotes the humility of it; we must come to God as beggars come to our doors for an alms. He is concerned that his prayer might come before God, might come near before him, that he might have grace and strength by faith and fervency to lift up his prayers; that no guilt might interpose to shut out his prayers, and to separate him from God, and that God would graciously receive his prayers and take notice of them. His prayer, that his supplication might come before God, implies a deep sense of his unworthiness, and a holy fear that his prayers should come short or miscarry, as not fit to come before God; nor would any of our prayers have had access to God, if Jesus Christ had not approached to him as an Advocate for us.

2. Two particular requests, which he is thus earnestly to press. (1.) That God, by his grace, would give him wisdom to conduct himself well under his troubles; Give me understanding; he means that wisdom of the prudent, which is, to understand his way; “Give me to know thee and myself, and my duty to thee.” (2.) That God, by his providence, would rescue him out of his troubles. Deliver me; with the temptation make a way to escape, 1 Cor. x. 13.

3. The same general plea to enforce these requests, according to thy word. This directs and limits his desires; “Lord, give me such an understanding as thou hast promised, and such a deliverance as thou hast promised, I ask for no other.” It also encourages his faith and expectation; “Lord, that which I pray for is what thou hast promised, and wilt not thou be as good as thy word?”

171. My lips shall utter praise, when thou hast taught me thy statutes.

Here is, 1. A great favour which David expects from God, that he will teach him his statutes. This he had often prayed for in this psalm, and urges his petition for it with various arguments; and, now he is drawing toward the close of the psalm, he speaks of it as taken for granted. They that are humbly earnest with God for his grace, and resolve with Jacob that they will not let him go unless he bless them with spiritual blessings, may be humbly confident that they shall at length, obtain what they are so importunate for. The God of Israel will grant them those things which they request of him.

2. The grateful sense he promises to have of that favour; My lips shall utter praise when thou hast taught me. (1.) Then he shall have cause to praise God. Those that are taught of God have a great deal of reason to be thankful, for this is the foundation of all these spiritual blessings, which are the best blessings, and the earnest of eternal blessings. (2.) Then he shall know how to praise God, and have a heart to it. All that are taught of God are taught this lesson; when God opens the understanding, opens the heart, and so opens the lips, it is that the mouth may show forth his praise. We have learned nothing to purpose, if we have not learned to praise God. (3.) Therefore he is thus importunate for divine instructions, that he might praise God. They that pray for God’s grace, must aim at God’s glory, Eph. i. 12.

172. My tongue shall speak of thy word: for all thy commandments are righteous.
173. Let thy hand help me: for I have chosen thy precepts. 174. I have longed for thy salvation, O Lord; and thy law is my delight.

Here, 1. David prays that divine grace would work for him; Let thine hand help me. He finds his own hands are not sufficient for him, nor can any creature lend him a helping hand to any purpose; therefore he looks up to God in hopes that the hand that had made him would help him; & so if the Lord do not help us, whence can any creature help us? All our help must be expected from God's hand, from his power and his bounty.

2. I plead that divine grace had already wrought in him, as a pledge of further mercy, being a qualification for it. Three things he pleading: (1.) That he had made religion his serious and deliberate choice; "I have chosen thy precepts."

"Let me live, and serve my country, live and provide for my family;" but, "Let me live, that, in doing this, I may praise God here in this world of conflict and opposition." When we die, we hope to go to a better world to praise him; and that is more agreeable for us, but here there is more need of us. And therefore one would not desire to live any longer than we may do God some service here. Let my soul live; let me be sanctified and comforted; these are the life of the soul, and then it shall praise thee. Our souls must be employed in praising God, and therefore we must pray for grace and peace, that we may be fitted to praise God.

2. He prays that God would give him strength to praise him; "Let thy judgments help me; let all ordinances and all providences" (both are God's judgments) "further me in glorifying God; let them be the matter of my praise, and fit me for that work."

176. I have gone astray like a lost sheep: seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments.

Here is, 1. A penitent confession; I have gone astray, or wander up and down like a lost sheep. As unconverted sinners are like lost sheep, (Luke xv. 4.) so weak unsteady saints are like lost sheep, Matth. xviii. 12, 13. "We are apt to wander like the sheep, and very unapt, when we have gone astray, to find the way again. By going astray we lose the comfort of the green pastures, and expose ourselves to a thousand miscarriages.

2. A believing petition; his thy servant, as the good shepherd seeks a wandering sheep to bring it back again, Ezek. xxxiv. 12. "Lord, seek me, as I used to seek my sheep when they went astray;" for David had been himself a tender shepherd.

"Lord, own me for one of thine; for though I am a stray sheep, I have thy mark; concern thyself for me; send after me by the word, and conscience, and providences; bring me back by thy grace." See not my sins, let me see mine, and then I shall say, Turn me, and I shall be turned.

3. An obedient plea; Though I have gone astray, yet I have not wickedly departed, I do not forget thy commandments. Thus he concludes the psalm with a penitent sense of his own sin, and a believing dependence on God's grace. With these a devout Christian will conclude his duties, will conclude his life; he will live and die, repenting and praying. Observe here, (1.) It is the character of good people that the Lord finds them out; it is his pleasure and delight to be well-pleased with their convictions, and well-settled in their resolutions. (2) Even those who, through grace, are mindful of their duty, cannot but own that they have in many instances wandered from it. (3) Those that have wandered from their duty, if they continue mindful of it, may with a humble confidence commit themselves to the care of God's grace.

PSALM CXX.

This psalm is the first of those fifteen which are here put together under the title of songs of degrees. It is well that it is not material what the meaning of that title should be, that is, that nothing is offered toward the explanation of it, no, not by the Jewish writers themselves, but what is conjectural. These psalms do not seem to be composed all by the same hand, much less all at the same time. Five of them thus addressed to David, and one said to be designed for Solomon, all penned perhaps by him; yet Psa. cxvi. and cxix. seem to be of a much later date; some of them are calculated for the close, (as cxx., cxxvi.) some for the family, (as cxxvii., cxxviii.) some for the public service, (as cxxix. and cxxxv.) and, as the psalm begins, (as cxv.) is of a general title, as cxvii., cxviii. So that, if it should seem, they had not this title from the author, but from the publisher. Some conjecture that they are so called from their singular excellence; as the song of sol's, so the song of degrees, is an most excellent song, in the highest degree. Others, from the tune they were set to, or the musical instruments they were sung to, or the raising of the voice in singing them. Some think they were sung on the fifteen steps or stairs, by which they went up from the outward court of the temple to the inner; others, at so many stages of the people's journey, when they returned out of captivity. I shall only observe, 1. That they are all short poems of a few lines, but one of them (Psa. cxv.) have but three verses a piece, and that they are placed next to Ps. cxix. which is by much the longest of all. Now as that was one psalm divided into many parts, so these were many psalms, which, being short, were sometimes sung all together, and many, as it were, one psalm observable only a pause between each; as many steps make one pair of stairs. 2. That, in the composition of them, we frequently meet with the figure they call climax or an ascending scale of sentiment, rising up, and rising to something further, as cxx. With him that hated peace, I peace. cxvi. From whence cometh my help, my help cometh. He that keepeth thee, shall slumber, he that keepeth Jerusalem, O Jerusalem, Jerusalem is builded. cxviii. Until he that have mercy upon us, Have mercy upon us. And the like in most of them, if not all. Perhaps for one of these reasons they are called songs of degrees.

This psalm is supposed to have been penned by David upon occasional of Doeg’s accusing him and the priests to Saul, because it is like Ps. lii. which was penned on that occasion. The psalmist speaks of his being driven out of the congregation of the Lord, and his being forced among barbarous people. He prays to God to deliver him from the mischief designed him by false and malicious tongues, v. 1, 2. He threatens the judgments of God against such, v. 3, 4. III. He complains of his wicked neighbours that were quarrelsome and vexatious, v. 5., 6., 7. In singing this psalm, we may comfort ourselves in reference to the scourge of the tongue, when at last we fallately under the lash of it, that better than we have smarted for it.

A song of degrees.

1. In my distress I cried unto the Lord, and he heard me. 2. Deliver my soul, O Lord, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue. 3. What shall be given unto thee, or what shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue? 4. Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper.

Here is,

1. Deliverance from a false tongue obtained by prayer; David records his own experience of this. (1.) He was brought into distress, into great distress, by lying lips, and a deceitful tongue. There were those that sought his ruin, and had affected it by lying lips, v. 1, 2. They flattered him with professions and protestations of friendship, and promises of kindness and service to him, that they might the more securely, and without suspicion, carry on their designs against him, and might have an opportunity, by betraying his counsels, to do him a mischief. They smiled in his face and kissed him, then when they were aiming to snite him under the fifth rib. The most deceitful designs against him, and those which it is most hard to guard against, are such as carry on their malicious designs under the colour of friendship. The Lord deliver every good man from such lying lips. (2.) By telling lies of him. They forged false accusations against him, and laid to his charge things that he knew not. This has often been the lot not only of the innocent, but of the excellents, of the ones, who have been great discomposed by lying lips, and have not only had their names marred, and made odious by calumnies in conversation, but their lives, and all that is dear to them in this world, endangered by false-witness bearing in judgment. David was here-in a type of Christ, who was distressed by lying lips and deceitful tongues.

2. In this distress he had recourse to God by faith and fervent prayer; I cried unto the Lord. Having no fence against false tongues, he appealed to him who has all men’s hearts in his hand, who has power over the consciences of bad men, and can, when he pleases, bridle their tongues. His prayer was, “Deliver my soul, O Lord, from lying lips, that my enemies may not by these cursed methods work my ruin.” He that had prayed so earnestly to be kept from lying, (cxxx. 29.) and hated it so heartily in himself, (v. 163.) might with the more confidence pray to be kept from being belied him, and carried away by the ill consequences of the deceitfulness of tongues.

3. He obtained a gracious answer to this prayer; God heard him; so that his enemies, though they carried their designs very far, were baffled at last, and could not prevail to do him the mischief they intended. The God of truth is, and will be, the Protector of his people from lying lips, xxxvii. 6.

4. The doom of a false tongue foretold by faith, v. 3, 4. As God will preserve his people from this mischievous generation, so he will reckong with their enemies, exi. 3, 7. The threatening is addressed to the sinner himself, for the awakening of his conscience, if he have any left; “Consider what shall be given unto thee, and what shall be done unto thee, by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, thou false tongue.” Surely sinners durst not do as they do, if they knew, and would be persuaded to think, what will be in the end thereof. Let liars and calumniators consider the doom of them; Sharp arrows of the Almighty, with coals of juniper, will fall and lie for ever under the wrath of God, and will be made memorable by the tokens of his displeasure, which will fly swiftly like arrows, and will strike the sinner ere he is aware, and when he sees not who hurts him. This is threatened against liars, (liv. 7.) God shall shoot at them with an arrow, suddenly shall they be wounded. They set at distance from them, but from afar his arrows can reach them. They are sharp arrows, and arrows of the mighty, the Almighty; for they shall pierce through the strongest armour, and strike deep into the hardest heart. The terrors of the Lord are his arrows, (Job vi. 4.) and his wrath is compared to burning coals of juniper, which do not flame or crackle, like thorns under a pot, but have a vehement heat, and keep fire very long; some say a year round, even when they seem to be gone out. This is the judgment of the Almighty; for all that love and make a lie shall have their portion in the lake that burns eternally, Rev. xxii. 15.

5. Wo is me that sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar! My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace. 7. I am for peace; but, when I speak, they are for war.

The psalmist here complains of the bad neighbourhood into which he was driven; and some apply the two foregoing verses to this; What shall the deceitful tongue give, what shall it do to those that open their mouths to speak lies against him? They are malicious deceits, what such malicious deceitful men? Nothing but sharp arrows, and coals of juniper, all the mischiefs of a false and sputeful tongue, liv. 4. Wo is me, says David, that I am forced to dwell among such, that I sojourn in Mesech and Kedar! Not that David dwelt in the country of Mesech or Kedar; we never find him so far off from his own native country; but he dwelt among rude and barbarous people, like the inhabitants of Mesech, and Kedar; as when we would describe an ill neighbourhood, we say, We dwell among Turks and heathens: this made him cry out, Wo is me!

1. He was forced to live at a distance from the ordinances of God. While he was in banishment, he looked upon himself as a sojourner, never at home but when he was near God’s altars; and he cries out, “Wo is me, that my sojournings are prolonged, that I cannot get home to my resting-place, but am still kept at a distance!” So says it, and it. Note, A good man cannot think himself at home while he is banished from God’s ordinances, and has not them within reach. And it is a great grief to all that love God, to want the means of grace, and of communion with God: when they are under a force of that kind, they cannot but cry out, as David here, Wo is me!

2. He was forced to live among wicked people, who were, upon many accounts, troublesome to him. He dwelt in the tents of Kedar, where the shepherds were probably in an ill name for being litigious, like the herdsmen of Abraham and Lot. It is a very grievous burthen to a good man to be cast into, and kept in, the company of these whom he hopes to be for ever separated from; (like Lot in Sodom; 2 Pet. ii. 8.) to dwell long with such is grievous indeed, for they are thorns, vexing, and scratching, and tearing, and who will show the old enmity that is  in the seed of the serpent, against the seed of the woman. Those that David dwelt with, were such as not only hated him, but hated peace, and proclaimed war with it; who might write on their weapons of war, not Sic sequimur pacem—Thus we aim at peace, but Sic sequimur pacem—Thus we persecute. Perhaps Saul’s court was the Mesech and Kedar in which David dwelt, and Saul was the man he means that hated peace, whom David studied to oblige and conciliate, that he might shew the unkindness to him, the more exasperated he was against him.

See here, (1.) The character of a very good man in David, who could truly say, though he was a man of war, I am for peace, for living peaceably with all men, and unpeaceably with none. I peace, so it is in the original; “I love peace, and pursue peace; my disposition is to peace, and my delight is in it. I pray for peace, and strive for peace, will do any thing, submit to any thing, part with any thing, in reason, for peace. I am for peace, and have made it to appear that I am so.” The wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable.

(2.) The character of the worst of bad men in David’s enemies, who would pick quarrels with those that were most peaceably disposed; “When I speak, they are for war; and the more forward for war, the more they find me inclined to peace.” He spoke with all the respect and kindness that could be; proposed methods of conciliation, of peaceable, of spake reason, spake love; but they would not so much as hear him patiently, but cried out, “To arms, to arms;” so fierce and implacable were they, and so bent to mischief. Such were Christ’s enemies: for his love they were his adversaries, and for his good words and good works they stoned him. If we meet with such enemies, we must not think it strange, nor the peace less for our seeking it in vain. Be not overcome of evil, no not of such evil as this, but, even when this tried, still try to overcome evil with good.

PSALM CXXI.

Some call this the soldier’s psalm, and think it was penned in the camp, when David was jeopardizing his life in the high-places of the field, and thus trusted God to cover his head in the day of battle. Others call it the traveller’s psalm, (for there is nothing in it of military dangers,) and think David penned it when he was going abroad, and designed it, pro vehicle—for the carriage, for a good man to carry and companion in a journey or voyage. But we need no method so particular in this, for whether we are, at home or abroad, we are exposed to danger more than we are aware of; and this psalm directs and encourages us to repose ourselves and our confidence in God, and by faith to put ourselves under his protection, and commit ourselves to his care, which we must do, with an entire resignation and satisfaction, in singing this psalm. I. David here assures himself of help from God, v. 1, 2. II. He assures others of it, v. 3, 4.

A song of degrees.

I. I WILL lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. 2. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth. 3. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber. 4. Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. 5. The Lord is thy keeper; the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand. 6. The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night. 7. The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil: he shall preserve thy soul. 8. The Lord shall preserve thy going out, and thy coming in, from this time forth, and even for evermore.

This psalm teaches us,

I. To stay ourselves upon God as a God of power, and a God all-sufficient for us. David did so, and found the benefit of it. 1. We must not rely upon creatures, upon men and means, instruments and second causes, nor make flesh our arm: “Shall I lift up mine eyes to the hills? (so some read it.) “Does my help come from thence? Shall I depend upon the powers of the earth; upon the strength of the hills upon princes and great men, who, like hills, fill the earth and make them high? What, can I lift up mine eyes to heaven? No; in vain is salvation hoped for from hills and mountains, Jer. iii. 23. I never expect help to come from them, my confidence is in God only. “We must lift up our eyes above the hills, so some read it; we must look beyond instruments to God, who makes them that to us which they are. 2. We must see all our help laid up in God, his power and goodness, his providence and grace; and from him we must expect it to come; “My help comes from the Lord; the help I desire is what he sends, and from him I expect it in his own way and time. If he do not help, no creature can help; if he do, no creature can hinder, can hurt.” 3. We must fetch in help from God, by faith in his promises, and a due regard to all his institutions; “I will lift up mine eyes to the hills;” (probably he means the hills on which the temple was built, and the temple of Solomon, and the holy hill of Zion, where the ark of the covenant was, and the temple, and the altars,) “I will have an eye to the special presence of God in his church, and with his people, (his presence by promise,) not only to his common presence.” When he was at a distance, he would look toward the sanctuary; (xxviii. 12—xxix. 6.) from thence cometh our help, from the word and prayer, from the secret of his tabernacle. (My help cometh from the Lord,) so the word is, (v. 2.) from before the Lord, (from the light and from the presence of the Lord.) “Which (says Dr. Hammond) may refer to Christ incarnate, with whose humanity the Deity being inseparably united, God is always present with him, and through him with us, for whom, sitting at God’s right hand, he constantly maketh intercession. Christ is called the angel of his presence, that saved his people, Isa. lxiii. 9. 4. We must encourage our confidence in God with this, that he must not only be our God, but he must do all that can do any thing. He made the world out of nothing, himself alone, by a word’s speaking, in a little time, and all very good, very excellent and beautiful; and therefore, how great soever our straits and difficulties are, he has power sufficient for our succour and relief. He that made heaven and earth is sovereign Lord of all the hosts of both, and can make use of them as he pleases for the help of his people, and restrain them when he pleases from hurting his people.

II. To comfort ourselves in God, when our difficulties and dangers are greatest. It is hence promised, that if we put our trust in God, and keep in the way of our duty, we shall be safe under his protection, so that no real evil, no mere evil, shall happen to us, nor any affliction, but what God sees good for us, and will do good by. 1. God hath undertaken to be our Protector; The Lord is thy keeper, v. 5. Whatever charge he gives his angels to keep his people, he has not thereby discharged himself, so that whether every particular saint has an angel for his guardian or no, we are sure he has God himself for his Guardian. It is infinite wisdom that contrives, and infinite power that works, the safety of those that have put themselves under God’s protection. These must needs be well kept, that have the Lord for their Keeper. If, by affliction, they be made his prisoners, yet still he is their Keeper.
2. The same that is the Protector of the church in general, is engaged for the preservation of every particular believer; the same wisdom, the same power, the same promises. He that keepeth Israel, (v. 4.) is thy Keeper, v. 5. The Shepherd of the flock is the Shepherd of every sheep, and will take care, that not one, even of the little ones, shall be lost. He that keepeth Israel, that keepeth thee, O Israelite, shall neither slumber nor sleep; he never did, or ever will, for he is never weary; he not only does not sleep, but he does not so much as slumber; he has not the least inclination to sleep.”

4. He not only protects those whom he is the Keeper of, but he refreshes them; He is their Shade. The comparison has a great deal of gracious condescension in it; thou, and all Believers, who is his infinite Sub stance, is what he is, in order that he may speak sensible comfort to his people, promises to be their Umbre—their Shadow, to keep as close to them as the shadow does to the body, and to shelter them from the scorching heat, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, Isa. xxxii. 2. Under this shadow they may sit with delight and assurance, Cant. ii. 3.

5. He is always near to his people for their protection and refreshment, and never at a distance; he is their Keeper and Shade on their right hand; so that he is never far to seek. The right hand is the working hand; let them but turn themselves dexterously to their duty, and they shall find God ready to them, to assist them, and give them success, Ps. xvi. 8.

He is not only at their right hand, but he will also keep the feet of his saints, 1 Sam. ii. 9. He will have an eye upon them in their motions; he will not suffer thy foot to be moved. God will provide that his people shall not be tempted above what they are able, shall not fall into sin, though they may be very near it, (Is. ii. 23.) shall not fall into trouble, though there be many endeavouring to undermine them by fraud, or overthrow them by force. He will keep them from being frightened, as we are when we slip or stumble, and are ready to fall.

7. He will protect them from all the malignant influences of the heavenly bodies; v. 6. The sun shall not smite thee, with his heat by day, nor the moon, with her cold and moisture, by night. The sun and moon are great blessings to mankind, and yet (such a sad change has sin made in the creation) even the sun and moon, though worshipped by a great part of mankind, are often instruments of hurt and discomfort to human bodies: God by them often smites us; but his favour shall interpose so, that they shall not damage his people. He will keep them night and day, (Is. xlii. 3.) as he kept Israel in the wilderness by a pillar of cloud by day, which screened them from the heat of the sun, and of fire by night, which probably diffused a gentle warmth over the whole camp, that they might not be prejudiced by the cold and damp of the night; their father Jacob having complained, (Gen. xxxi. 40.) that by day the drought consumed him, and the frost by night. It may be understood figuratively; “Thou shalt not be hurt either by the open assaults of thine enemies, which are as visible as the scorching beams of the sun, or by their secret treacherous attempts, which are like the insensible insinuations of the cold by night.”

8. His protection will make them safe in every respect; v. 8. They shall preserve thee from all ev ill, v. 9. They shall prevent the evil thou fearest, and shall sanctify, remove, or lighten, the evil thou feelest. He will keep thee from doing evil, (2 Cor. xii. 7.) and so far from suffering evil, that whatever affliction happens to thee, there shall be no evil in thee. Even that which kills, shall not hurt.”

9. It is the spiritual life especially that God will take under his protection; He shall preserve thy soul. All souls are his; and the soul is the man, and therefore he will with a peculiar care preserve them, that they be not defiled by sin, and disturbed by affliction. He will keep them, by keeping us in the possession of them; and he will preserve them from perishing eternally.

10. He will keep us in all our ways; “He shall preserve thy going out and coming in. Thou shalt be under his protection in all thy journeys and voyages, outward-bound or homeward-bound, as he kept Israel in the wilderness, in their removes and rests. He will prosper thee in all thy affairs at home and abroad, in the beginning and in the conclusion of them. He will keep thee in life and death, thy going out and going on while thou livest, and thy coming in when thou diest; going out to thy labour in the morning of thy days, and coming home to thy rest when the evening of old age calls thee in,” (v. 23.)

11. He will continue his care over us from this time forth and even for evermore. It is a protection for life, never out of date. He will be thy Guide even unto death, and will hide thee in the grave, hide thee in heaven. He will preserve thee in his heavenly kingdom.” God will protect his church and his saints always, even to the end of the world. The Spirit, who is their Preserver and Comforter, shall abide with them for ever.

PSALM CXXII.

This psalm seems to have been penned by David for the use of the people of Israel, when they came up to Jerusalem, to worship at the three solemn feasts. It was in David’s time that Jerusalem was first chosen to be the city where God would record his name. It being a new thing, this, among other means, was used to bring the people to be in love with Jerusalem, as the Holy City, though it was but the other day in the hands of the Jebusites. Observe, I. The joy with which they were to go up to Jerusalem, v. 1, 2. II. The great esteem they were to have of Jerusalem, v. 3, 5. III. The great concern they were to have for Jerusalem, and the prayers they were to put up for its welfare, v. 6, 9. In singing this psalm, we must have an eye to the gospel-church, which is called the Jerusalem that is from above. *A song of glores of David.

1. I WAS glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord.

2. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.

3. Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together: 4. Whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the Lord, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the Lord. 5. For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David.

Here is, 1. The pleasure which David, and other pious Israelites, took in approaching to, and attending upon, the house of God. (1.) The invitation to them was very welcome. David was himself glad, and would have every Israelite to say that he was glad, when he was called upon to go up to the house of the Lord. Note, [1.] It is the will of God that we should worship him in concert; that many should join together to wait upon him in public ordinances. We ought to worship God in our own houses, but that is not enough, we must go up to the house of the Lord, and show our homage to him there, and not forsake the assemblying ourselves together. [2.] We should not only agree with one another, but excite and stir up one another, to go to worship God in public. Lo
6. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee. 7. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. 8. For my brethren and companions’ sakes I will now say, Peace be within thee. 9. Because of the house of the Lord our God I will seek thy good.

Here,
1. David calls upon others to wish well to Jerusalem, v. 6, 7. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, for the welfare of it, for all good to it, particularly for the uniting of the inhabitants among themselves, and their preservation from the incursions of enemies. This we may truly desire, that in the peace thereof we may have peace; and this we must earnestly pray for, for it is the gift of God, and for it he will be inquired of. These can do nothing else for the peace of Jerusalem, can pray for it, which is something more than showing their goodwill, it is the appointed way of fetching in mercy. The peace and welfare of the gospel-church, particularly in our land, is to be earnestly desired and prayed for by every one of us.

Now, (1.) We are here encouraged in our prayers for Jerusalem’s peace: They shall prosper that love thee. We must pray for Jerusalem, not out of custom, or for fashion’s sake, but out of a principle of love to God’s government of man, and man’s worship of God: and in seeking the public welfare, we seek our own; for so well does God love the gates of Zion, that he will love all those that do love them; and therefore they cannot but prosper; at least their souls shall prosper by the ordinances they so dearly love.

(2.) We are here directed in our prayers for it, and words are put into our mouths, v. 7. Peace be within thy walls. He teaches us to pray, [1.] For all the inhabitants in general; all within the walls, from the least to the greatest. Peace be in thy fortifications, let them never be attacked; or, if they be, let them never be taken, but be an effectual security to the city. [2.] For the princes and rulers especially; Let prosperity be in the palaces of the great men that sit at the helm, and have the direction of public affairs; if they prosper, it will be well for the public. The poorer sort are apt to envy the prosperity of the palaces, but they are here taught to pray for it.

2. He resolves, that, whatever others do, he will approve himself a faithful friend to Jerusalem; (1.) In his prayers; “I will now say, now I see the tribes so cheerfully resorting hither to the testimony of Israel, and the matter settled, that Jerusalem must be the place where God will record his name, now I will say, Peace be within thee.” He did not say, “Let others pray for the public peace, the priests and the prophets, whose business it is, and the people, that have nothing else to do, and I will fight for it, and rule for it.” No; “I will pray for it too.” (2) In his endeavours, with which he will second his prayers; “I will, to the utmost of my power, seek thy good.” Whatever lies within the sphere of our activity to do for the public good, we must do it, else we are not sincere in praying for it.

Now it might be said, No thanks to David to be so solicitous for the welfare of Jerusalem, it was his own city, and the interests of his family were lodged in it. It is true; yet he professes that was not the reason why he was in such care for the welfare of Jerusalem; but it proceeded from the warm regard he had, [1.] To the communion of saints; It is for my brethren and companions’ sakes, that is, for the sake of all true-hearted Israelites, whom I look upon as my brethren, (so he calls them, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2.) and who have often been my companions in the worship of God, which hath knit my heart to them. [2.] To the ordinances of God: He had set his affection to the house of his God; (1 Chron. xxix. 3.) he took a great pleasure in public worship, and for that reason would pray for the good of Jerusalem. Then our concern for the public welfare is right, when it is the effect of a sincere love to God's institutions and his faithful worshippers.

PSALM CXXIII.

This psalm was penned at a time when the church of God was brought low and trampled upon; some think it was when the Jews were captives in Babylon; though that was not the only time that they were insulted over by the proud. The psalmist begins as if he spoke for himself only, (v. 1.) but presently speaks in the name of the church. Here is, 1. Their expectation of mercy from God, v. 1, 2. 2. Their plea for mercy with God, v. 3, 4. In singing it, we must have our eye up to God's favours, with a holy concern, and then an eye down to men's reproach, with a holy contempt.

A song of degrees.

1. UNTO thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens. 2. Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that he have mercy upon us. 3. Have mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us: for we are exceedingly filled with contempt. 4. Our soul is exceedingly filled with the scorning of those that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud.

We have here, I. The solemn profession which God's people make of faith and hope in God, v. 1, 2. Observe, 1. The title here given to God; O thou that dwellest in the heavens. Our Lord Jesus has taught us, in prayer, to have an eye to God, as our Father in heaven; not that he is concealed there, but there especially he manifests his glory, as the King in his court. Heaven is a place of prospect, and a place of prospect a dwelling place. He beholds all the calamities of his people, and from thence can send to save them. Sometimes God seems to have forsaken the earth, and the enemies of God's people ask, Where is now your God? But then they can say with comfort, Our God is in the heavens. O thou that sittest in the heavens, so some; sittest as Judge there; for the Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens, and to that throne injured innocency may appeal. 2. The regard here had to God; the psalmist himself lifted up his eyes to him. The eyes of a good man are ever toward the Lord; (xxv. 15.) in every prayer we lift up our soul, the eye of our soul, to God; especially in trouble, which was the case here. The eyes of the people waited on the Lord, v. 2. We find mercy coming toward a people, when the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel, are toward the Lord. Zach. ix. 4. The eyes of the body are heaven-ward. Oe homini sublime dedit—To man he gave an erect mien, to teach us which way to direct the eyes of the mind. Our eyes wait on the Lord; the eye of desire and prayer; the begging eye, and the eye of dependence; hope and expectation; the longing eye. Our eyes must wait upon God as the Lord, and our God, until that he have mercy upon us. We desire mercy from him, we hope he will show us mercy, and we will continue our attendance on him till it come.

This is illustrated, (v. 2.) by a similitude: Our eyes are to God, as the eyes of a servant's handmaid, to the hand of their master and mistress. The eyes of a servant are, (1.) To his master's directing hand, expecting that he will appoint his work, and cut it out for him, and show him how he must do it; Lord, what will thou have me to do? (2.) To his supplying hand. Servants look to their master, or their mistress, for their portion of meat in due season, Prov. xxxi. 15. And to God must we look for our daily bread, for from him we must receive it thankfully. (3.) To his protecting hand. If the servant cannot do his work himself, where must he look for help but to his master. And in the strength of the Lord God we must go forth and go on. (4.) To his protecting hand. If the servant meet with opposition in his work, if he be questioned for what he does, if he be wronged and injured, who should bear him cut and right him, but his master are that set him on work? The people of God, when they are persecuted, may appeal to their Master. We are thine, save us. (5.) To his correcting hand. If the servant have provoked his master to beat him, he does not call for help against his master, but looks at the hand that strikes him, till it shall say, "It is enough, I will not contend for ever. The people of God were now under his rebukes; and whether they should turn to him that smote them? Isa. ix. 15. To whom should they now turn? And God's correction, if they will not do will as Hagar did, who ran away from her mistress, when she put some hardships upon her, (Gen. xvi. 6.) but they submit themselves to, and humble themselves under, God's mighty hand. (6.) To his rewarding hand. The servant expects his wages, his well-done, from his master. Hypocrites have their eye to the world's hand, thence they have their reward; (Matt. vi. 2.) but true Christians have their eye to God as their Rewarder.

II. The humble address which God's people present to him in their calamitous condition, (v. 3, 4.) wherein, 1. They sue for mercy; not prescribeing to God what he shall do for them, nor pleading any merit of their own, why he should do for them, but, Have mercy upon us, O Lord, have mercy upon us. We find little mercy with men, their tender mercies are cruel, but we have a God whose tender mercies are great. If our eyes are cursed mackings, but this is our comfort, that with the Lord there is mercy, and we need desire no more to relieve us, and make us easy, than the mercy of God. Whatever the troubles of the church are, God's mercy is a sovereign remedy.

2. They set forth their grievances; We are exceedingly filled with contempt. Reproach is the wound, the burthen, they complain of. Observe, (1.) Who were reproached; We, who have our eyes up to the heavens, (v. 2.) Those who are owned of God are often despised and trampled on by the world. Some translate the words which we render, those that are at ease, and the proud, so as to signify the persons that are scorned and contemned. "Our soul is troubled to see how these that are at peace, and the excellent ones, are scorned and despised." The saints are a peaceable people, and yet are abused; (xxxv. 20.) the excellent ones of the earth, and yet reproached. (2.) We are reproached; We are filled, or we are surfeited with it; Our soul is exceedingly filled with it. The enemies that we could not jeer them enough, nor say...
PSALMS, CXXIV.

David penned this psalm (we suppose) upon occasion of some great deliverance which God wrought for him and his people from some very threatening danger, which was likely to have involved them all in ruin; whether by foreign invasion, or intestine insurrection, is not certain; whatever it was, he seems to have been himself much affected, and very desirous to affect others, with the goodness of God, in making a way for them to escape: to him he is careful to give all the glory, and takes none to himself, as conquerors usually do. 1. He here magnifies the greatness of the danger they were in, and of the ruin they were at the brink of, v. 1. 5. 2. He gives God the glory of their escape, (v. 6, 7.) compared with v. 1-5. He takes encouragement and strength of trust in God, v. 8. In singing this psalm, beside the application of it to any particular deliverance wrought for us and our people, in our days and the days of our fathers, we may have in our thoughts the great work of our redemption by Jesus Christ, by which we were rescued from the powers of darkness.

A song of degrees of David.

1. If it had not been the Lord who was on our side, now may Israel say; 2. If it had not been the Lord who was on our side, when men rose up against us; 3. Then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us; 4. Then the waters had overwhelmed us, the stream had gone over our soul: 5. Then the proud waters had gone over our soul.

The people of God, being here called upon to praise God for their deliverance, are to take notice, 1. Of the malice of men, by which they were reduced to the very brink of ruin. Let Israel say, that there was but a step between them and death: the more desperate the disease appears to have been, the more does the skill of the Physician appear in the cure. Observe, (1.) Whence the threatening danger came; Men rose up against us; creatures of our own kind, and yet bent upon our ruin: Homo homini lupus—Man is a wolf to man. No marvel that the red dragon, the roaring lion, should seek to swallow us up; but that men should thirst after the blood of men, Absalom after his father's blood, the elder brother the blood of the younger brother; thus they could be drunk with the blood of the saints, is what, with St. John, we may wonder at with great admiration. From men we may expect humanity, yet there are those whose tender mercies are cruel. But what was the matter with these men? Why, their wrath was kindled against us; (v. 3.) something or other they were angry at, and then no less would serve than the destruction of those they had conceived a displeasure against. Wrath is cruel, and anger is fierce; it is a fire ready to consume us; they were proud; and the wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor. They were daring in their attempt, they rose up against us; rose in rebellion, with a resolution to swallow us up alive. (2.) How far it went, and how fatal it had been if it had gone a little farther; "We had been devoured as a lamb by a lion; not only slain, but swallowed up, so that there should have been no relics of us remaining; swallowed up with so much haste, ere we were aware, that we should have gone down alive to the pit. We had been overwhelmed as the lowly and humble, for a land-flood, or the sands by a high spring-tide." This similitude he dwells upon, with the ascents, which bespeaks this a song of degrees, or risings, like the rest. The waters had overwhelmed us. What of us? Why, the stream had gone over our souls, our lives, our comforts; all that is dear to us. What waters? Why, the proud waters. God suffers his enemies of his people sometimes to prevail very far against them, that his own power may appear more illustrious in their deliverance.

2. Of the goodness of God, by which they were rescued from the very brink of ruin; "The Lord was on our side; and if he had not been so, we had been undone." (1.) "God was on our side; he took our part, espoused our cause, and appeared for us: he was our Helper, and a very present Hulp, a Help on our side, nigh at hand. He was with us; not only for us, but against our enemies, and in chief of our forces." (2.) That God was Jehovah; there the emphasis lies. "If it had not been Jehovah himself, a God of infinite power and perfection, that had undertaken our deliverance, our enemies had overpowered us." Happy the people, therefore, whose God is Jehovah, a God all-sufficient. Let Israel say this, to his honour, and resolve never to forsake him.

6. Blessed be the Lord, who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth. 7. Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped. 8. Our help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth.

Here the psalmist further magnifies the great deliverance God had lately wrought for them.

1. That their hearts might be the more enlarged in thankfulness to him; (v. 6.) Blessed be the Lord. God is the Author and Overruler of our deliverance, and therefore he must have the glory of it. We exalt him of his due, if we do not return thanks to him. And we are the more obliged to praise him, because we had such a narrow escape. We were delivered, (1.) Like a lamb out of the very jaws of a beast of prey; God has not given us as a prey to their teeth; intimating, that they had no power against God's people, but what was given them from above. They could not be a prey to their teeth, unless God had given them up, and therefore they were rescued, because God would not suffer them to be ruined. (2.) Like a bird, a little bird, (the word signifies a sparrow,) out of the snare of the fowlers. The enemies are very subtle and sly; they lay snares for God's people, to bring them into sin and trouble, and to hold them there. Sometimes they seem to have prevailed so far as to gain their point; God's people are taken in by their artifice, and it seems helpless to help themselves out as any weak and silly bird is; and then is God's time to appear for their relief, when all other friends fail; then God breaks the snare, and turns the counsel of the enemies into foolishness; The snare is broken, and so we are delivered. Isaac is saved when he lay ready to be sacrificed. Jehovah-jireh; in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen.

2. That their hearts, and the hearts of others, might be more enlarged in trust in God in the like dangers; (v. 8.) Our help is in the name of the Lord. David had directed us (cxxx, 2.) to depend upon God for help as to our personal concerns; My help is in the name of the Lord; here, as to the concerns of the public; Our help is in. It is a comfort to all that lay the interests of God's Israel near their hearts, that Israel's God is the same that made the world, and therefore will have a church in the world, and can secure that church in the times of the greatest danger and distress. In him therefore let the church's friends put their confidence, and they shall not be put to confusion.

PSALM CXXV.

This short psalm may be summed up in those words of the prophet, (Isa. iii. 16, 11.) Say ye to the righteous, It shall be well with him. Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him. Thus are life and death, the blessing and the curse, set before us often in the psalms, as well as in the law and the prophets. 1. It is certainly well with the people of God; for, 1. They have the promises of a good God, (that shall be kept, (v. 1.) and safe, (v. 2.) and not always under the hatches, v. 3.) 2. They have the prayers of a good man, which shall be heard for them, v. 4. 22. It is certainly ill with the wicked, and particularly with the apostates, v. 3. Somewhere in the Jewish rav-sus are of opinion that it has reference to the days of the Messiah; however, we that are members of the gospel-church may certainly, in singing this psalm, take the comfort of these promises, and the more so, if we stand in awe of the threatening.

A song of degrees.

1. THEY that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. 2. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth, even for ever. 3. For the rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous; lest the righteous put forth their hands unto iniquity.

Here are three very precious promises made to the people of God, which, though they are designed to secure the welfare of the church in general, may be applied by particular believers to themselves, as other promises of this nature may.

Here is, 1. The character of God's people to whom these promises belong. Many call themselves God's people who have no part nor lot in this matter. But those shall have the benefit of them, and may take the comfort of them, (1.) Who are righteous, (v. 3.) righteous before God, righteous to God, and righteous to all men; for his sake justified and sanctified. (2.) Who trust in the Lord, who depend upon his care, and devoutly themselves to his honour. All that deal with God must deal upon trust, and he will give comfort to those only that give credit to him, and not to put it to assay: they do so, but quitting other confidences, and venturing to the utmost for God. The closer our expectations are confined to God, the higher our expectations may be raised from him.

2. The promises themselves.

(1.) That their hearts shall be established by faith: those minds shall be truly stay'd that are stay'd on God; They shall be as mount Zion. The church is, in general, called mount Zion; (Heb. xii. 22.) and it shall in this respect be like mount Zion, it shall be built upon a rock, and its interests shall be so well secured, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. The stability of the church is the satisfaction of all its well-wishers. Particular persons, who trust in God, shall be established; (Ps cxii. 7.) their faith shall be their fixation, Isa. vii. 9. They shall be as mount Zion, which is firm, and is not moved by the wind, and can never be more as a holy mountain supported by promise. [1.] They cannot be removed by the prince of the power of the air, nor by all his subdity and strength. They cannot be removed from their integrity, nor from their confidence in God. [2.] They abide for ever in that grace which is the earnest of their everlasting continuance in glory.

(2.) That, committing themselves to God, they shall be safe, under his protection, from all the insults of their enemies. As Jerusalem had a natural fastness and fortification in the mountains that were round about it, v. 2. (those mountains not only with the hatches, winds and tempests, and broke the force of them, but made it also very difficult of access for an enemy,) such a defence is God's providence to his people! Observe, [1.] The compass of it; The Lord is round about his people on every side; there is no gap in the hedge of protection which he makes round about his people, at which the enemy, who goes about them, seeking to do them a mischief, can find entrance, Job i. 10. [2.] The circumscription of it; from henceforth even for ever. Mountains may moulder and come to nothing, and rocks be removed out of their place, (Job xiv. 18,) but God's covenant with his people cannot be broken, (Isa. lix. 10.) nor his care of them cease. Their being said to stand fast for ever, (v. 1.) and here to have God round about them for ever, intimates, that the promises of the stability and security of God's people will have their full accomplishment in their everlasting state. In heaven they shall stand fast for ever, shall be firm of our God, and go no more out; (Rev. iii. 12.) and there God himself, with his glory and favour, will be round about them for ever.

(3.) That their troubles shall last no longer than their strength will serve to bear them up under them, v. 3. (1.) It is supposed that the rod of the wicked may come, may fall, upon the lot of the righteous. The rod of their power may oppress them, the rod of their anger may vex and torment them. It may fall upon their persons, their estates, their liberties, their families, their names, any thing that falls to their lot; only it cannot reach their souls. (2.) It is promised, that, though it may come upon their lot, it shall not rest there, it shall not continue so long as the enemies design, and as the people of God fear, but God will cut the work short in righteousness; so short, that even with the temptation he will make a way for them to escape. (3.) It is considered as a reason of this promise, that, if the trouble should continue ever-long, the righteous themselves would be in temptation to put forth their hands to iniquity, to join with wicked people in their wicked practices; to say as they say, and do as they do. There is danger lest, being long persecuted for their religion, at length they grow weary of it, and willing to give it up; being kept long in expectation of promised mercies, they begin to distrust the promise, and to think of casting off God, left upon suspicion of his having cast them off. See Lxxiii. 15, 14. Note, God considers the frame of his people, and will proportion their trials to their strength, by the care of his providence, as well as their strength to their trials, by the power of his grace. Oppression makes a wise man mad, especially if it continue long; therefore for the elects sake the days shall be shortened, that, whatever goes with their lot in this world, they may not lose their lot among the chosen.

4. Do good, O Lord, unto those that be good, and to them that are upright in their hearts. 5. As for such as turn aside unto their crooked ways, the Lord shall lead them forth with the workers of iniquity; but peace shall be upon Israel.

Here is,

1. The prayer the psalmist puts up for the happiness of those that are sincere and constant; (v. 4.) Do good, O Lord, unto those that are good. This teaches us to pray for all good people, to make sup
It is sometimes but the Israel; was willfulness and God's promises should quicken our prayers. It is comfortable wishing well to those for whom God has engaged to do well.

The prospect was of the ruin of hypocrites and apostates; he does not pray for it, I have not desired the woeeful day, thou knowest, but he predicts it; As for those who, having known the way of righteousness, for fear of the rod of the wicked, basely turn aside out of it to their wicked ways, use indirect ways to prevent trouble, or extricate themselves out of it; or those who, instead of reforming, grow worse and worse, and are more obstinate and daring in their impieties, God shall send them away, cast them out, and lead them forth, with the workers of iniquity, he shall appoint them their portion with the worst of sinners. Note, (1.) Sinful ways are crooked ways; sin is the perverting of that which is right. (2.) The doom of those who turn aside to those crooked ways, out of the right way, will be the same with theirs who have all along walked in them; nay, and more grievous, for if any place in hell be hotter than another, that shall be the portion of hypocrites and apostates. God shall lead them forth, as prisoners are led forth to execution, Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire; and these shall go away, all their former righteousness shall not be mentioned unto them. The last words, Peace upon Israel, may be taken as a prayer; God preserve his Israel in peace, when his judgments are abroad reeking with evil-doers. We read them as a promise, Peace shall be upon Israel; that is, [1.] When those who, by treacherously deserted the ways of God meet with their own destruction, those who faithfully adhere to them, though they may have trouble in their way, their end shall be peace. [2.] The destruction of those who walk in crooked ways will contribute to the peace and safety of the church; when Herod was cut off, the word of God grew, Acts xii. 23. 24. [5.] The peace and happiness of God's Israel will be the occasion, and add much to the terror, of those who, in their wickedness, Luke xiii. 28. Isa. lxv. 13. My servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed.

PSALM CXXVI.

It was with reference to some great and surprising deliverance of the people of God out of bondage and distress, that this psalm was penned; and that likely their return out of Babylon, which Dr. Hammond thinks Babylon he here mentioned, as it is, (Ps. cxxxvii.) their captivity there was the most remarkable captivity, both in itself, and as their return out of it was typical of our redemption. Those Psalms were penned by Ezra, and some of the prophets that came up with the first. We read of singers of the children of Asaph, that famous psalmist who returned them, Ezra ii. 41. It being a song of degrees, which was sung and repeated with advancement, (v. 2, 3. and v. 4, 5.) it is something among the rest of the psalms that bear that title. I. Those that were returned out of captivity are here called upon to be thankful, v. 1. - 3. II. Those that were yet remaining behind, who were prayed for, (v. 1. 4. 5. 6.) were encouraged, v. 5. 6. It will be easy, in singing this psalm, to apply it either to any particular deliverance wrought for the church, or our own land, or to the great work of our salvation by Christ.

A song of degrees.

1. WHEN the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream. 2. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing; then said they among the heathen, The Lord hath done great things for them. 3. The Lord hath done great things for us, yereof we are glad.

While the people of Israel were captives in Babylon, their harps were hung upon the willows; for then God called to weeping and mourning, then he measured unto them, and they lamented; but, now that their captivity is turned, they resume their harps; Providence pipes to them, and they dance. Thus must we accommodate ourselves to all the dispensations of Providence, and be suitably affected with them. And the harps are never more melodiously tunable than after such a melancholy season. The long wait of mercies greatly sweetens their return.

Here is, 1. The deliverance God had wrought for them; He turned again the captivity of Zion. It is possible that Zion may be in captivity for the punishment of her degeneracy; but her captivity shall be turned again, when the end is answered, and the work designed by it is effected. Cyrus, for reasons of state, proclaimed liberty to God's captives, and yet it was the Lord's doing, according to his word. But God is free to be for ever merciful. God that in captivity, not as brass is put into the fire to be consumed, but as gold to be refined. Observe, The release of Israel is called the turning again of the captivity of Zion, the holy hill, where God's in Abode and dwelling-place were; for the restoring of their sacred interests, and the reviving of the public exercise of their religion, were the most valuable advantage of their return out of captivity.

2. The pleasing surprise that this was to them. They were amazed at it; it came so suddenly, that at first they were in confusion, not knowing what to make of it, nor what it was tending to; “We thought ourselves like men that dream, we thought it too good news to be true, and began to question whether we were well awake or no, and whether it was not still,” (as sometimes it had been to the prophets,) only a representation of it in vision;” as St. Peter for a while after, in regard to his deliverance was, Acts xii. 9. Sometimes the people of God are thus surprised with the blessings of his goodness before they are aware. We were like them that are recovered to health, so Dr. Hammond reads it; such a comfortable happy change it was to us, as life from the dead, or sudden ease from exquisite pain; we thought ourselves in a new world. And the surprise of it put them into an ecstasy and transport of joy, that they could scarcely contain themselves within the bounds of decency in the expression of it; Our mouth was filled with laughter, and our song with singing. Thus they gave vent to their joy, gave glory to their God, and gave notice to all about them what wonders God had wrought for them. They that were laughed at now laugh, and a new song is put into their mouths. It was a laughter of joy in God, not scorn of their enemies.

The notice which their neighbours took of it; They said among the heathen, Jehovah, the God of Israel, has done great things in the sight of their eyes, as our gods cannot do for us. The heathen had observed their calamity, and had triumphed in it, Jer. xxix. 8, 9. Ps. cxxxvii. 7. Now they could not but observe their deliverance, and admire that. It put a reputation upon those that had been scorned and despised, and made them look considerable; besides, it turned greatly to the honour of God, and extorted from those that set up other gods in competing with him, an acknowledgment of his wisdom, power and providence.
4. The acknowledgments which they themselves made of it, v. 3. The heathen were but spectators, and spake of it only as matter of news; they had no part or lot in the matter; but the people of God spake of it as sharers in it. (1.) With application; "He has done great things for us, things that we are interested in, and have advantage by." Thus it is comfortable speaking of the redemption Christ has wrought out, has wrought out for us, who loved us and foresaw for us. (2.) With affection; whereof we are glad. The heathen were amazed at it, and some of them angry, but we are glad. While Israel went a whoring from their God, joy was forbidden them; (Hos. ix. 1) but now that the iniquity of Jacob was purged by the captivity, and their sin taken away, now God makes them to rejoice. It is the repenting reformatory people that are, and shall be, the rejoicing people. Observe here, [1.] God's appearances for his people are to be looked upon as great things. [2.] God is to be eyed as the Author of all the great things done for the church. [3.] It is good to observe how the church's deliverances are for us, that we may rejoice in them.

4. Turn again our captivity, O Lord, as the streams in the south. 5. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. 6. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall, doubtless, come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.

These verses look forward to the mercies that were yet wanted; they that were come out of captivity were still in distress, even in their own land, (Neh. i. 5) and many yet remained in Babylon. And their progress with trembling, and bare upon their hearts the grievances that were yet to be redressed. We have here, 1. A prayer for the perfecting of their deliverance; (v. 4.) "Turn again our captivity. Let those that are returned to their own land be eased of the burthens which they are yet groaning under. Let those that remain in Babylon have their hearts stirred up, as ours were, to take the benefit of the liberty granted. The beginning of every encouragement to us is to pray for the completing of it. And while we are here in this world, there will still be matter for prayer, even then when we are most furnished with matter for praise. And when we are free, and in prosperity ourselves, we must not be unmindful of our brethren that are in trouble and under restraint. The bringing of those that were yet in captivity, to join with their brethren that were returned, would be as welcome to both sides as streams of water in those countries, which, lying far south, were parched and dry. As cold water to a thirsty soul, so would this good news be from that far country, Prov. xxv. 25.

2. A promise for their encouragement to wait for it, assuring them that though they had now a sorrowful time, yet it would end well. But the promise is expressed generally, that all the saints may comfort themselves with this confidence, that their seed and their hairs of trespass will certainly end in a harvest of joy at last, v. 5, 6.

(1.) Suffering saints have a seedness of tears. They are in tears often, they share in the calamities of human life, and commonly have a greater share in them than others. But they sow in tears; they do the duty of an afflicted state, and so answer the intentions of the providences they are under. Weeping must not hinder sowing; when we suffer ill we must be doing well. Nay, the ground is by the rain prepared for the seed, and the husbandman sometimes chooses to sow in the wet, so we must improve times of affliction, as disposing us to repentance, and prayer, and humiliation. Nay, there are tears which are themselves the seed that we must sow; tears of sorrow for sin, our own and others; tears of sympathy with the afflicted church; and tears of tenderness in prayer and under the word. These are precious seed, such as the husbandman sows when corn is dear, and he has but little for his family, and therefore weeps to part with it, yet buries it under ground, in expectation of receiving it again with advantage. Thus does a good man sow in tears.

(2.) They shall have a harvest of joy. The troubles of the saints will not last always, but, when they have done their work, shall have a happy period. The captives in Babylon were long soving in tears, but at length they were brought forth with joy, and then they reap the benefit of their patience, suffering, and brought their sheaves with them to their own land, in their experiment of the goodness of God to them. Job, and Joseph, and David, and many others, had harvests of joy after a sorrowful seedness. They that sow in the tears of godly sorrow, shall reap in the joy of a sealed pardon and a settled peace. Those that sow to the spirit, in this vale of tears, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting, and that will be a joyful harvest indeed. Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be for ever comforted.

PSALM CXXVII.

This is a family-psalm, as divers before were state-poems, and church-poems. It is entitled (as we read it) for Solomon, dedicated to him by his father. He having a house to build, a city to keep, and seed to raise up to his father, David directs him to look up to God, and to depend upon his providence, without which all his wisdom, care, and industry, would not serve. Some take it to have been penned by Solomon himself, and it may as well be read, a song of Solomon, who wrote a great many others. They compare it with his Ecclesiastes, the scope of both being the same, to show the vanity of worldly care, and how necessary it is that we keep in with God. On him we must depend. 1. For wealth, v. 1. 2. For heirs to leave it to, v. 5. 5. In singing this psalm, we must have our eye up unto God for success in all our undertakings, and a blessing upon all our comforts and enjoyments, because every creature is that to us which he makes it to be, and no more.

A song of degrees for Solomon.

1. EXCEPT the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. 2. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so he giveth his beloved sleep. 3. Lo, children are a heritage of the Lord: and the fruit of the womb is his reward. 4. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man: so are children of the youth. 5. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate.

We are here taught to have a continual regard to the Divine Providence in all the concerns of this life. Solomon was cried up for a wise man, and would be apt to learn to his own understanding and forecast, and therefore his father teaches him to look higher, and to take God along with him in his undertakings. He was to be a man of business, and therefore David instructed him how to manage his business under the direction of his religion; pa
We must have an eye to God,

I. In all the affairs and business of the family, even of the royal family, for king’s houses are no longer safe than while God protects them. We must depend upon God’s blessing, and not our own contrivance.

1. For the raising of a family: Except the Lord build the house, by his providence and blessing, its labour in vain, though ever so ingenious, that build it. We may understand it of the material house, except the Lord bless the building; it is to no purpose for men to build, any more than for the builders of Babel, who attempted it in defiance of heaven, or Hiol, who built Jericho under a curse. If the model and design be laid in pride and vanity, or if the foundations be laid in oppression and injustice, (Hab. ii. 11, 12.) God certainly does not build there; nay, if God be not acknowledged, we have the reason to expect his blessing, and without his blessing all is nothing. Or rather, it is to be understood of the making of a family considerable, that was mean; men labour to do this by advantageous matches, offices, employments, purchases; but all in vain, unless God build up the family, and raise the poor out of the dust.

The best laid project fails, unless God connecteth with it. (Mal. i. 3.)

2. For the security of a family or a city; for these are specified; if the guards of the city cannot secure it without God, much less can the good man of the house save his house from being broken up. Except the Lord keep the city from fire, from enemies, the watchmen, who go about the city, or patrol upon the walls of it, though they neither slumber nor sleep, wake but in vain, for a raging fire may break out, and the mischief of which the cleverest discoveries may not be able to prevent. That is a shame, or the city betrayed and lost by a thousand accidents, which the most watchful sentinel, or most cautious governor, could not obviate.

3. For the enriching of a family; that is a work of time and thought, but cannot be effected without the favour of Providence, any more than that which is the product of one happy turn; “It is in vain for the man that hateth light, and to deny yourselves your bodily refreshment to the pursuit of the wealth of the world.” Usually, those that rise early do not care for sitting up late, nor can those that sit up late easily persuade themselves to rise early; but there are some so hot upon the world, that they will do both, will rob their sleep to pay their cares; and they have as little comfort in their meals as in their rest, they eat the bread of sorrows. It is part of our sentence, that we eat our bread in the sweat of our face; but those go further, all their days they eat in darkness, Eccl. v. 17. They are continually full of care, which imbibes their comforts, and makes their lives a burthen to them. All this is to get money, and all in vain, except God prosper them, for riches are not always to men of understanding, Eccl. ix. 11. They that love God, and are beloved of him, have their minds easy, and live very comfortably, without this ado. Solomon was called Jedidiah, Beloved of the Lord; (2 Sam. xii. 25.) to him the kingdom was promised, and then it was in vain for Absalom to rise up early, to wheel the people, and for Adonijah to make such a stir, and to say, I will be king; Solomon sits still, and, being beloved of the Lord, to him he gives sleep and the kingdom too. Note, (1.) Inordinate excessive care about the things of this world, is a work of vain expense, which, if we have it, and often weary ourselves in vain for it, Hag. i. 6, 9. (2.) Bodily sleep is God’s gift to his beloved. We owe it to his goodness that our sleep is safe, (Ps. iv. 8.) that it is sweet, Jer. xxxi. 25, 26.

Then God gives as sleep, as he gives it to his beloved, when with it he gives us grace to lie down in his fear, and our souls returning to him, and reposing in him (as on Rest,) and will give us grace to be still with him, and to use the refreshment we have by sleep in his service. He gives his beloved sleep, quietness, and contentment of mind, a commodious enjoyment of what is present, and a commodious expectation of what is to come. Our care must be to keep ourselves in the love of God, and then we may be easy, whether we have little or much of this world.

II. In the increase of the family; he shows,

1. That children are God’s gift, v. 3. If children are withheld, it is God that withholds them (Gen. xxx. 2.) if they are given, it is God that gives them; (Gen. xxxiii. 5.) and they are to us what he makes them, comforts or crosses. Solomon multiplied wives, contrary to the law, but we never read of more than one wife that he had; for those that desarie children, as an heritage from the Lord, must receive them in the way that he is pleased to give them, by lawful marriage to one wife; (Mal. ii. 15.) therefore one, that he might seek a seed of God. But they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase. Children are a heritage, and a reward; and are so to be accounted blessings, and not burshtens; for he that sends mouths will send meat, if we trust in him. Obad. edom. might be bright sons, for the Lord blessed him because he had entertained them. Jer. I Chron. xxxvi. 5. Children are a heritage for the Lord, as well as from him; they are my children, (says God,) which thou hast borne unto me; (Ezkj. xvi. 20.) and then they are most our honour and comfort, when they are accounted to him for a generation.

2. That they are a good gift, and a great support and defence to a family; As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man, who knows how to use them for his own safety and advantage; so are children of the youth, children born to their parents when they are young, which are the strongest and most healthful children, and are grown up to serve them by the time they need their service. Or rather, children who are themselves young; they are instruments of much good to their parents and families, which may fortify themselves with them against their enemies. The family which has a large stock of children, is like a quiver full of arrows, of different sizes we may suppose, but all of use one time or other; children of different capacities and inclinations may be several ways serviceable to the family. He that has a numerous issue may boldly speak with his enemy in the gate in judgment; in battle he needs not fear, leaving so many good seconds, so zealous, so faithful, and in the vigour of youth, 1 Sum. ii. 4, 5. Observe here, Children of the youth are arrows in the hand, which, with prudence, may be directed aright to the mark, God’s glory, and the service of their generation; but afterward, when they are gone abroad into the world, they are arrows out of the hand, it is too late to bend them then.

These arrows in the hand too often prove arrows in the heart, a constant grief to their godly parents, whose gray hairs they bring with sorrow to the grave.

PSALMS CXXVIII.

This, as the former, is a psalm for families. In that, we were taught that the prosperity of our families depends upon the blessing of God; in this, we are taught that the only way to do it is by blessing the families of the Lord. Let us make our families comfortable, is, to live in the fear of God, and in obedience to him. They that do so, in general, shall be blessed, v. 1, 2, 4. In particular, I. They shall be prosperous in their several enterprises, v. 2, 11. Their relations shall be agreeable, v. 3. III. They shall live to see their families brought up, v. 4, 6. They shall have the satisfaction of seeing the church of God flourish in a flourishing condition, v. 5, 6. We must sing this psalm in the firm belief of this truth. That religion and psalms, and people, thy it. Happy shall thou be, and it shall be well with thee. 3. Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thy house: thy children like olive-plants round about thy table. 4. Behold, that thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the Lord. 5. The Lord shall bless thee out of Zion: and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life. 6. Yea, thou shalt see thy children’s children, and peace upon Israel.

It is here showed that godliness has the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

1. It is here again and again laid down as an undoubted truth, that they who are truly holy are truly happy. They whose blessed state we are here assured of, are such as fear the Lord, and walk in his ways; such as observe the commandments of God in their spirits, and evidence it by a regular and constant conformity to his will.

Where the fear of God is a commanding principle in the heart, the tenor of the conversation will be accordingly; and in vain do we pretend to be of those that fear God, if we do not make conscience both of keeping to his ways, and not trifling in them or drawing back. Such are blessed, (v. 1.) and shall be blessed, v. 4. God blessed them, and his pronouncing them blessed makes them so. They are blessed now, they shall be blessed still, and for ever.

This blessedness arising from this blessing, is here secured, 1. To all the saints universally; Blessed is every one that fears the Lord, whoever he be; in every nation, he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him, and therefore is blessed. Whether he be high or low, rich or poor, in the world, if religion rule him, it will keep him in this world, and crown him in the next. To such a saint in particular; thus shall the man be blessed; not only the nation, the church in its public capacity, but the particular person in his private interests.

We are here encouraged to apply it to ourselves; (v. 2.) “Happy shall thou be; thou mayest take the comfort of the promise, and expect the benefit of it, as if it were directed to thee by name, if thou fear God, and walk in his ways. Happy shall thou be; that is, It shall be well with thee; whatever befalls thee, thou shalt be brought out of it: it shall be well with thee while thou livest, better when thou diest, and best of all to eternity.”

It is asserted, (v. 4.) with a note commanding attention, Behold, thus shall the man be blessed; behold it by faith in the promise; behold it by observation in the performance of the promise; behold it with assurance that it shall be so, for God is faithful; and with admiration that it should be so, for we merit no favour, no blessing, from him.

II. Particular promises are here made to godly people, which they may depend upon, as far as is for God’s glory and their good; and that is enough.

1. That, by the blessing of God, they shall get an honest livelihood, and live comfortably upon it. It is not promised that they shall live at ease, without care or pains, but, Thou shalt eal the labour of thy hands. Here is a double promise, (1.) That they shall have something to do, (for an idle life is a miserable uncomfortable life,) and shall have health and strength, and capacity of mind, to do it, and shall not be forced to be beholden to others for necessary food, and to live, as the disabled poor do, upon the labours of other people. It is as much a mercy, as it is a duty, with quietness to work and eat our own bread, 2 Thess. iii. 12. (2.) That they shall succeed in their employments, and they and theirs shall enjoy what they get; others shall not come and eat the bread out of their mouths, not shall it be taken from them either by oppressive rulers or by men that can do it, and they shall have the fruits of what they do. Hence, Happy shall thou be, and it shall be well with thee. And happy shall thy children be, and the Lord shall bless thee out of Zion: and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life.

2. That they shall have abundance of comfort in their family-relations. As a wife and children are very much a man’s care, so, if by the grace of God they are such as they should be, they are very much the man’s delight, as much as any creature-comfort. (1.) The wife shall be as a vine by the sides of the house, not only as a spreading vine, which serves for an ornament, but as a fruitful vine, which is for profit, and with the fruit whereof both God and man are honoured, Judg. ix. 13. The vine is a weak and tender plant, and needs, to be supported and cherished, but it is a very valuable plant, and some think (because all the products of it were prohibited to the Jews, Deut. xviii. 4.) therefore, the wife’s fruitfulness is a figure of the church, to be cherished, and nourished. The wife’s place is the husband’s house; there her business lies, and that is her castle; Where is Sarah thy wife? Behold, in the tent; where should she be else? Her place is by the sides of the house, not under foot to be trampled on, nor yet upon the house-top to dominie: if she be so, she is but as the grass upon the house-top, in the next psalm; but on the side of the house, being a rib out of the side of the man; she shall be a loving wife, as the vine, which cleaves to the house-side, and one of its tender shoots, the vine, which is pliable, and grows as it is directed. She shall be fruitful as the vine, not only in children, but in the fruits of wisdom, and righteousness, and good management, the branches of which run over the wall, (Gen. xlix. 22. Ps. lxxx. 11.) like a fruitful vine, not cumbering the ground, or bringing forth sour grapes, or grapes of Sodom, but good fruit. (2.) The children shall be as olive-plants, likely in their early springs to thrive, and to grow and flourish in the olive-plant’s nature, yet grafted into the good olive, and partaking of its root and fatness, Rm. xi. 17. It is pleasant to parents, who have a table spread, though but with ordinary fare, to see their children round about it; to have many children, enough to surround it, and those with them, and not scattered, or the parents forced from them; Job makes it one of the first instances of his former prosperity, that his children were about him, Job xxxix. 5. Parents love to have their children at table, to keep up the pleasantness of the table-talk; to have them in health, craving food, and not phisy; to have them like olive-plants, straight and green, sucking in the sap of their good education, and likely in due time to be serviceable.

3. That they shall have those good things which God has promised, and which they pray for; The Lord shall bless thee out of Zion, where the ark of the covenant was, and where the plous Israelites attended with their devotions. Blessings out of Zion are the best blessings, which flow, not from common providence, but from special grace, Ps. xx. 2.

4. That they shall live long, to enjoy the comforts of the rising generations; “Thou shalt see thy children’s children, as Joseph, Gen. i. 23. Thy family shall be built up and continued, and thou shalt have the pleasure of seeing it.” Hence, Should beget, should get, as the crown of old men, (Prov. xvii, 6.) who are apt to be fond of their grand-children.

5. That they shall see the welfare of God’s church, and the land of their nativity, which everman who fears God is no less concerned for than for the prosperity of his own family, "Thou shalt be blessed in Zion's blessing, and wilt think thyself so. Thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem as long as thou livest, though thou livest long; and shalt not have thy private comforts allayed and im- bittered by public troubles." A good man can have little comfort in seeing his children's children punish- withal he see peace. God has Israel, and Israel has hopes of transubstantiation of religion pure and entire to those that shall come after him, for that is the best inheritance.

PSALM CXXIX.

This psalm relates to the public concerns of God's Israel. It is not certain who was the person to whom it was penned, probably when they were in captivity in Babylon, or about the time of their return. 1. They look back with thankfulness for the former deliverances God had wrought for them and their fathers, out of the many distresses and persecutions in former times. II. They look forward with a believing prayer, for, and prospect of, the destruction of all the enemies of Zion, v. 5-8. In singing this psalm, we may apply it both ways to the Gospel Israel, which, like the Old Testament Israel, has weathered many a storm, and is still threatened by many enemies.

A song of degrees.

1. MANY a time have they afflicted me from my youth, may Israel now say: 2. Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth; yet they have not prevailed against me. 3. The ploughers ploughed upon my back; they made long their fur- rows. 4. The Lord is righteous: he hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked.

The church of God, in its several ages, is here spoken of, or rather, here speaks, as one single person, now old and gray-headed, but calling to remembrance the former days, and reflecting upon the times of old. And, upon the review, it is found,

1. That the church has been often greatly dis- tressed by its enemies on earth; Israel may now say, "I am the people that have been oppressed more than any people, that has been as a steeple bird, pecked at by all the birds round about," Jer. xii. 9. It is true, they brought their troubles upon them- selves by their sins, it was for them that God punished them; but it was for the peculiarity of their covenant, and the singularities of their religion, that their neighbours hated and persecuted them. For these, many a time have they afflicted me from my youth. Note, God's people have al- ways had many enemies; and the state of the church, from its infancy, has frequently been an afflicted state. Israel's youth was in Egypt, or in the times of the Judges, then they were afflicted, and from thenceforward more or less. The gospel- church, ever since it had a being, has been at times afflic- ted; and it bare this yoke most of all in its youth, witness the ten persecutions which the primitive church grieved under, v. 3. The ploughers ploughed upon my back. We read (cxv. 3.) of the rod of the wicked upon the lot of the righte- ous, where we rather expected the plough, to mark it out for themselves; here we read of the plough of the wicked upon the back of the righteous, where we rather expected to find the rod. But the metaphors in these places may be said to be crossed; the sense, however, of both is the same, and is too plain, that we need not dwell all along upon them very barborously. They tare them as the husbandman tares the ground with his ploughshare, to pull them to pieces, and get all they could out of them, and so to swear out the saints of the Most High, as the ground is worn out that had been long tilled, tilled (as we say) quite out of heart. When God permitted them to plough thus, he intended it for his people's good, that, their fallow ground being thus broken up, he might sow the seeds of his grace upon them, and reap a harvest of good fruit from them; howbeit, the enemies meant not so, neither did their lawlessness, Isa. x. 7.) they made long their furrows, never knew when to have done, aiming at nothing less than the destruction of the church. Many, by the furrows they made on the backs of God's people, understand the stripes they gave them. The cutters cut upon my back, so they read it. The saints have often had trials of cruel scourgings, (probably the captives had,) and cruel mockings, (for we read of the scourgers of Jesus, Acts xxi. 32.) and they were fulfilled in Christ, when he gave his back to the smiters, Isa. i. 6. Or it may refer to the desolations they made of the cities of Israel; Zion shall, for your sake, be ploughed as a field, Mic. iii. 12. 2. That the church has been always graciously delivered by her Friend in heaven.

1. The enemies' projects have been defeated; they have afflicted the church, in hopes to ruin it, but they have not gained their point; many a storm, it has weathered, many a shock, and many a brunt, it has borne, and yet is in being; They have not prevailed against me. One would wonder how this ship has lived at sea, when it has been tossed with tempests, and all the waves and billows have gone over it. Christ has built his church upon a rock, and the gates of hell have not prevailed against it, nor ever shall. 2. The enemies' power has been broken; God has cut asunder the cords of the wicked; has cut their gears, their traces, and so spoiled their plough- ing; has cut their scourges, and so spoiled their lashing; has cut the bands of union, by which they were combined together; has cut the bands of cap- tivity, in which they held God's people. God has many ways of disabling wicked men to do the mis- chief they design against his church, and shaving their counsels.

These words, The Lord is righteous, may refer either to the distresses or to the deliverances of the church. [1.] The Lord is righteous, in suffering Israel to be afflicted. This the people of God were always ready to own, that, how unjust soever their enemies were, God was just in all that was brought upon them, Neh. ix. 35. [2.] The Lord is righte- ous, in not suffering Israel to be ruined; for he has promised to preserve it a people to himself, and he is as good as his word. He is righteous in reckoning with their persecutors, and rendering to them a recompense, 2 Thess. i. 6.

5. Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion: 6. Let them be as the grass upon the house-tops, which with- ereth afore it growtheth up; 7. Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand, nor he that bindeth sheaves, his bosom. 8. Neither do they which go by say, The blessing of the Lord be upon you: we bless you in the name of the Lord.

The psalmist, having triumphed in the defeat of the many designs that had been laid as deep as hell to ruin the church, here concludes his psalm as De- beoth did; let God have all along used them very barbarously. They tare them as the husbandman tares the ground with his ploughshare, to pull them to pieces, and get all they could out of them, and so to swear out the saints of the Most High, as the ground is worn out that had been long tilled, tilled (as we say) quite out of heart. When God permitted them to plough thus, he intended it for his people's good, that, their fallow ground being thus broken up, he might sow the seeds of his grace upon them, and reap a harvest of good fruit from them; howbeit, the enemies meant not so, neither did their lawlessness, Isa. x. 7.) they made long their furrows, never knew when to have done, aiming at nothing less than the destruction of the church. Many, by the furrows they made on the backs of God's people, understand the stripes they gave them. The cutters cut upon my back, so they read it. The saints have often had trials of cruel scourgings, (probably the captives had,) and cruel mockings, (for we read of the scourgers of Jesus, Acts xxi. 32.) and they were fulfilled in Christ, when he gave his back to the smiters, Isa. i. 6. Or it may refer to the desolations they made of the cities of Israel; Zion shall, for your sake, be ploughed as a field, Mic. iii. 12. 2. That the church has been always graciously delivered by her Friend in heaven.

1. The enemies' projects have been defeated; they have afflicted the church, in hopes to ruin it, but they have not gained their point; many a storm, it has weathered, many a shock, and many a brunt, it has borne, and yet is in being; They have not prevailed against me. One would wonder how this ship has lived at sea, when it has been tossed with tempests, and all the waves and billows have gone over it. Christ has built his church upon a rock, and the gates of hell have not prevailed against it, nor ever shall. 2. The enemies' power has been broken; God has cut asunder the cords of the wicked; has cut their gears, their traces, and so spoiled their ploughing; has cut their scourges, and so spoiled their lashing; has cut the bands of union, by which they were combined together; has cut the bands of captivity, in which they held God's people. God has many ways of disabling wicked men to do the mischief they design against his church, and shaming their counsels.

These words, The Lord is righteous, may refer either to the distresses or to the deliverances of the church. [1.] The Lord is righteous, in suffering Israel to be afflicted. This the people of God were always ready to own, that, how unjust soever their enemies were, God was just in all that was brought upon them, Neh. ix. 35. [2.] The Lord is righte- ous, in not suffering Israel to be ruined; for he has promised to preserve it a people to himself, and he is as good as his word. He is righteous in reckoning with their persecutors, and rendering to them a recompense, 2 Thess. i. 6.

5. Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion: 6. Let them be as the grass upon the house-tops, which with- ereth afore it growtheth up; 7. Wherewith that seek the ruin of both, and do what they can, that God may not have a church in the world.

2. We ought to pray that all their attempts against the church may be frustrated, that in them they may be confounded, and turned back with shame, as those that have not been able to bring to pass their enterprises and expectancies; Let them all be confounded as much as, They shall be all confounded. The confusion imprecated, and predicted, is illustrated by a similitude; while God's people shall flourish, as the loaded palm-tree, or the green and fruitful olive, their enemies shall wither as the grass upon the house-top. As men, they are not to be feared, for they shall be made as grass, Isa. lii. 12. But, as they are enemies to Zion, they are so certainly marked for ruin, that they shall be located as the grass upon the house-top, which is little, and short, and sour, and good for nothing.

(1.) It perishes quickly, it withers before it grows up to any maturity, having no root; and the higher its place is, which perhaps is its pride, the more it is exposed to the scorching heat of the sun, and consequently the sooner does it wither. It withers before it is plucked up, so some read it. The enemies of the church of God are not to be feared, for they will not be rooted out by the judgments of God.

(2.) It is of no use to any body; nor are they any thing but the unprofitable burthens of the earth; nor will their attempts against Zion ever ripen or come to any head; nor, whatever they promise themselves, will they get any more by them than the husbandman does by the grass on his house-top. Their harvest will be a heap in the day of grief, Isa. xlii. 11.

3. As one man will pray God to bless the mowers or reapers, v. 8. Observe, (1.) It has been an ancient and laudable custom not only to salute, and wish a good day to, strangers and travellers, but particularly to pray for the prosperity of harvest-labourers. Thus Boaz prayed for his reapers, (Ruth ii. 4.) The Lord be with you. We must thus acknowledge God's providence, testify our good-will to our neighbours, and commend their industry, and it will be accepted of God and as a pious ejaculation, if it comes from a devout and upright heart. (2.) Religious expressions, being sacred things, must never be made use of in light and licentious actions. Mowing the grass on the house-top would be a jest, and therefore those that have a reverence for the name of God will not prostitute to it the usual forms of salutation, which savoured of devotion; for holy things must not be jested with. (3.) It is a dangerous thing to let the church's enemies have our good wishes in their designs against the church. If we wish them God speed, we are partakers of their evil deeds, 2 John xi. When it is said, None will bless them, and show them respect, more is implied, namely, that all wise and good people will cry out shame on them, and beg of God to defeat them; and woe to those that have the prayers of the saints against them. I turned his habitation, Job v. 8.

PSALM CXXXX.

This psalm relates not to any temporal concern, either personal or public, but it is wholly taken up in the affairs of the soul. It is reckoned one of the seven penitential psalms, which have been made use of by penitents, upon their admission into the church; in singing it, we are all concerned to apply it to ourselves. The psalmist here expresses, 1. His desire toward God, v. 1, 2. His dependence upon God, v. 3, 4. III. His attendance upon God, v. 5, 6. IV. His expectations from God, v. 7, 8. And as in water face answers to face, so does the heart of one humble penitent to another.

A song of degrees.

1. OUt of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord. 2. Lord, hear my voice; let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications. 3. If then, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand? 4. But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.

In these verses, we are taught,

1. Whatever condition we are in, though ever so deplorable, to continue calling upon God, v. 1. The best men may sometimes be in the depths, in great trouble and affliction, and utterly at a loss what to do; in the depths of distress, and almost in the depths of despair; the spirit low and dark, singing and drooping, cast down and disquieted. But, in the greatest depths, it is our privilege that we may cry unto God, and he will hear. A prayer may reach the heights of heaven, though not out of the depths of hell, yet out of the depths of the greatest trouble we can be in, in this world; Jeremiah's, out of the dungeon, Daniel's, out of the den, and Jonah's, out of the fish's belly. It is our duty and interest to cry unto God, for that is the likeliest way both to prevent our sinking lower, and to recover us out of the horrible pit, and miry clay, xl. 1, 2.

While we continue calling upon God, to assure ourselves of an answer or deliverance from him; for this is that which David in faith prays for, (v. 2.) Lord, hear my voice, my complaint and prayer, and let thine ears be attentive to the voice both of my afflictions and of my supplications.

3. We are taught to humble ourselves before the justice of God, as guilty in his sight, and unable to answer him for one of a thousand of our offences; (v. 3.) If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand? His calling God Lord twice, in so few words, Jah and Adonai, is very emphatical, and intimates a very awful sense of God's glorious majesty, and a dread of his wrath. Let us learn here, (1.) To acknowledge our iniquities, that we cannot justify ourselves before God, or plead not guilty. There is that which is remarkable in our iniquities, and is liable to be animadverted upon. (2.) To own the power and justice of God, which is said that, if he should mark what we do amiss, there were no hopes of coming off. His eye can discover enough in the best man to ground a condemnation upon; and if he proceed against us, we have no way to help ourselves, we cannot stand, but shall certainly be cast. If God deal with us in strict justice, we are undone; if he makes remarks upon our iniquities, he will find them to be many and great; greatly aggravated, and very provoking; and then, if he should proceed accordingly, he would shut us out from all hope of his favour, and shut us up under his wrath; and what could we do to help ourselves? We could not make our escape, nor resist, or bear up under, his avenging hand. (3.) Let us admire God's patience and forbearance; we were undone if he should mark iniquities, and he knows it, and therefore bears with us. It is of his mercy that we are not consumed by his wrath.

4. We are taught to cast ourselves upon the pardoning mercy of God, and to comfort ourselves with that, when we see ourselves obnoxious to his justice, v. 4. Here is, (1.) God's grace discovered, and pleaded with him, by a penitent sinner; But there is forgiveness with thee. It is our unspeakable comfort, in all our approaches to God, that there is forgiveness with him, for that is what we need. He has put himself into a capacity to pardon sin, he has declared his mind and will, that he is ready to forgive, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. He has promised to forgive the sins of those that do repent. Never any that dealt with him found him impalpable, but easy to be entreated, and swift to show mercy. With us there is iniquity, and therefore it is well for us that with him there is forgiveness. There is a propitiation with thee, so some read it. Jesus Christ is the great Propitiation, the Ransom which God has found; he is ever with him, as Advocate for us, and through him we hope to obtain forgiveness. (2.) Our duty designed in that discovery, and inferred from it; There is forgiveness with thee, not that thou mayest be made bold with, and presumed upon, but that thou mayest be feared; in which case, what thou dost may be observed by the children of men, who, being sinners, could have no dealings with God, if he were not a Master that could pass by a great many faults. But this encourages us to come into his service, that we shall not be turned off for every misdemeanor; no, not for any, if we truly repent. This does in a special manner invite those who have sinned to repent, and return to the fear of God, that he may be gracious and merciful, and will receive them upon their repentance; (Joel ii. 13. Matth. iii. 2.) and we, therefore, are to have a holy awe and reverence of God's pardoning mercy; (Hos. iii. 5.) They shall fear the Lord, and his goodness; and then we may expect the benefit of the forgiveness that is with God, when we make it the object of our holy fear.

5. I wait for the Lord, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope. My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning; I say, more than they that watch for the morning. 7. Let Israel hope in the Lord: for with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption. 8. And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.

Here, 1. The psalmist engages himself to trust in God, and to wait for him, v. 5. 6. Observe, (1.) His dependence upon God, expressed in a climax, it being a song of degrees, or ascents: I wait for the Lord; from him I expect relief and comfort, believing it will come, long till it does come, but patiently bearing the delay of it, and resolving to look for it from no other hand. My soul doth wait; I wait for him in sincerity, and not in profession only. I am an expectant, and it is for the Lord that my soul waits, for the gifts of his grace, and the operations of his power.” (2.) The ground of that dependence; In his word do I hope. We must hope for that only, which he has promised in his word, and not for the creatures of our own fancy and imagination; and we must hope for it, because he has promised it, and not from any opinion of our own merit. (3.) The degree of that dependence; more than they that watch for the morning; who are, [1.] Well assured that the morning will come; and so am I, that God will return in mercy to me, according to his promise; for God's covenant is more firm than the ordinances of day and night, for they shall come to an end, but that is everlasting. [2.] Very desirous that it would come. Sentinels keep watch, and desire the day, both for the sick people, and travellers that are abroad upon their journey, long before day, wish to see the dawning of the day; but more earnestly does this good man long for the tokens of God's favour, and the visits of his grace; and more readily will he be aware of his first appearances than they are of day. Dr. Hammond reads it thus: My soul hastens to the Lord, from the guards the morning, the guards in the morning,” and gives this sense of it. To thee I daily betake myself, early in the morning, addressing my prayers, and my soul very, before thee, at the time that the priests offer their morning sacrifice.” 2. He encourages all the people of God, in like manner, to depend upon him, and trust in him; Let Israel hope in the Lord, and wait for him; not only the body of the people, but every good man, who is named by the name of Israel, Isa. xlv. 5. Let all that devote themselves to God cheerfully wait themselves upon him, (v. 7, 8.) for two reasons: (1.) Because the light of nature discovers to us that there is mercy with him, that the God of Israel is a merciful God, and the Father of mercies. Mercy is with him; not only inherent in his nature, but it is his delight, it is his darling attribute; it is with him in all his works, in all his counsels. (2.) Because the light of the gospel discovers to us that there is redemption with him, contrived by him, and to be wrought out in the fulness of time; it was in the beginning hid in God. See here, [1.] The nature of this redemption; it is redemption from sin, from all sin; and therefore capable of no other than a plenteous redemption which Jesus Christ became the Author of; for it is he that saves his people from their sins, (Matt. i. 21.) that redeems them from all iniquity, (Tit. ii. 14.) and turns away ungodliness from Jacob, Rom. xi. 26. It is he that redeems us both from the condemning, and from the commanding, power of sin. [2.] The riches of this redemption; it is a plenteous redemption; there is an all-sufficient fulness of merit and grace, which the Redeemer is able to supply for all, enough for each; enough for all who believes the believer. Redemption from sin includes redemption from all other evils, and there is a plenteous redemption. [3.] The persons to whom the benefits of this redemption belong; He shall redeem Israel; Israel according to the spirit; all those who are in covenant with God, as Israel was, and who are Israelites indeed, in whom is no guide.

PSALM CXXXI.

This psalm is David's profession of humility; humbly made, with thankfulness to God for his grace, and not in vain-glory. It is probable enough that (as most interpreters suggest) David made this protestation in answer to the complaints of Saul and his courtiers, who represented David as an ambitious aspiring man, who, under pretence of a divine appointment, sought the kingdom, in the pride of his heart. But he appeals to God, that he, on the contrary, was humble; He aimed at nothing high or great, v. 1. II. He was very careful of which God allotted him; (v. 2.) and therefore, III. He encourages all good people to trust in God as he did, v. 3. Some have made it an objection against singing David's psalms, that there are many who cannot say, My heart is not haughty, &c. It is true there are; but we may sing it for the same purpose that we read it, to teach and admonish ourselves, and one another, what we ought to be; with reverence that they have come short of being so, and humble prayer to God for his grace to make us so.

A song of degrees of David.

1. L ORD, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty: neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. 2. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother; my soul is even as a weaned child. 3. Let Israel hope in the Lord, from henceforth and for ever.

Here are two things which will be comforts to us: 1. Consciousness of our integrity. This was David's rejoicing, that his heart could witness for him, that he had walked humbly with his God, with- standing the censures he was under, and the temptations he was in. 1. He aimed not at a high condition, nor was he desirous of making a figure in the world, but, if God had so ordered, could have been well content to spend all his days, as he did the beginning of them, in the sheep-folds. His own brother, in a passion, charged him with pride, (1 Sam. xvii. 28.) but the charge was groundless and unjust; God, who searches the heart, knew,

(1.) That he had no conceited opinion of himself, or of what he was, for, on the contrary, my heart is not haughty. Humble saints cannot think so well of themselves as others think of them; are not in love with their own shadow, nor do they magnify their own attainments or acquisitions. The love of God, reigning in the heart, will subdue all inordinate self-love.

(2.) That he had neither a scornful nor an aspiring look; "My eyes are not lofty, either to look with envy upon those that are above me, or to look with disdain upon those that are below me. This is a proud heart, there is commonly a proud look;" (Prov. vi. 17.) but the humble publican will not so much as lift up his eyes.

(3.) That he did not employ himself in things above his station; in things too great or too high for him. He did not employ himself in studies too high; he made God's word his meditation, and did not amuse himself with matters of nice speculation or doubtful dissertation, or care to be wise above what is written; To know God and our duty, is learning sufficiently high for us. He did not employ himself in affairs too great; he followed his ewes, and never set up for a politician; no, nor for a soldier; for, when his brethren went to the wars, he stayed at home to keep the sheep. It is our wisdom, and will be our praise, to keep within our sphere, and not to intrude into things which we have not seen, or meddle with that which does not belong to us. Princes and scholars are not the only wise men in the world; there is greatness in the way, too high, for men: and those in a low station, and of ordinary capacities, must not pretend to that which is out of their reach, and which they were not cut out for. Those will fall under due shame, that affect undue honours.

2. He was well-reconciled to every condition that God placed him in; (v. 2.) I have behaved and quieted myself as a child that is weaned of his mother. As he was weaned, and we have reason to suppose since God had appointed him to it, he had not behaved insolently towards any, nor been restless in his attempts to get the crown before the time set; but, (1.) He had been as humble as a little child about the age of a weaning, as manageable and governable, and as far from aiming at high things; as entirely at God's disposal, as the child at the disposal of the mother or nurse; as far from taking state upon him, though anointed to be king, or vying himself upon the prospect of his future advancement, as a child in the arms. Our Saviour has taught us humility by this comparison; (Matt. xviii. 3.) we must become as little children. (2.) He had been as indifferent to the wealth and honour of this world as a child is to the breast, when it is thoroughly weaned from it. I have levelled and quieted myself, (so Dr. Hammond reads it,) as a child that is weaned. This intimates that our hearts are naturally as loathsome of worldly things as the breast is of the breast, and in like manner relish them, cry for them, are fond of them, play with them, and cannot live without them. But, by the grace of God, a soul that is sanctified is weaned from those things. Providence puts wormwood upon the breast, and that helps to wean us. The child is perhaps cross and fretful while it is in the weaning, and thinks itself undone when it has lost the breast; but in a day or two it is forgotten, the fret is over, and it accommodates itself well enough to a new way of feeding; cares no longer for milk, but can bear strong meat. Thus does a gracious soul quiet itself under the loss of that which it loved, and disappointment in that which it hoped for, and is easy whatever happens; lives, and lives comfortably, upon God and the covenant-grace, when creatures prove dry breasts. When our condition is not to our mind, we must bring our mind to our condition; and then we are easy to ourselves, and all about us; then our souls are as a weaned child.

3. Confidence in God; and that David recommends to all the Israel of God, no doubt from his own experience of the benefit of it; (v. 3.) Let Israel hope in the Lord, and let them continue to do so, from henceforth and for ever. Though David could himself wait patiently and quietly for the crown designed him, yet perhaps Israel, the people whose duration he was, would be ready to attempt something in favour of him before the time; he therefore endeavours to quiet them too, and bids them hope in the Lord, that they should see a happy change of the face of affairs in due time. Thus it is good to hope, and quietly to wait, for the salvation of the Lord.

PSALM CXXXII.

It is probable that this psalm was penned by Solomon, to be sung at the dedication of the temple which he built according to the charge his father gave him, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2, &c. Having fulfilled his trust, he begs of God to own what he had done. 1. He had built this house for the honour and service of God; and when he brings the Ark into it, the men of God's presence, he desires God himself would come and take possession of it, v. 8. 10. With these words Solomon concluded his prayer, 2 Chron. vi. 41, 42. 2. He had built it in pursuance of the orders he had received from his father, and therefore his pleas to enforce these petitions refer to David. 1. He pleads David's piety towards God, v. 1. 7. 2. He pleads God's promise to David, v. 11. 18. The former introduces his petition, the latter follows it as an answer to it. In this passage, we must have a concern for the church, as the temple of God, and a dependence upon Christ, as David our King, in whom the mercies of God are sure mercies.

A song of degrees.

1. LORD, remember David, and all his afflictions. 2. How he swarne unto the LORD, and vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob; 3. Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed; 4. I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids, 5. Until I find out a place for the LORD, a habitation for the mighty God of Jacob. 6. Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah; we found it in the fields of the wood. 7. We will go into his tabernacles; we will worship at his footstool. 8. Arise, O LORD, into thy rest; thou and the ark of thy strength. 9. Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness; and let thy saints shout for joy. 10. For thy servant David's sake turn not away the face of thine anointed.

In these verses, we have Solomon's address to God for his favour to him and to his government, and his acceptance of his building a house to God's name. Observe,

1. What he pleads: two things.

1. That what he had done was in pursuance of the promise which his father had made to build a house for God. Solomon was a wise man, yet pleads not any merit of his own; *I am not worthy, for whom thou shouldest do this; but, Lord, remember David, with whom thou madest the covenant;" (as Moses prayed, Exod. xxxiii. 13. Remember Abraham, the first trustee of the covenant;) "remember all his afflictions, all the troubles of his life, which his being anointed was the occasion of;" or, his care and concern about the ark, and what an unceasing it was to him that the ark was in curtains, 2 Sam. vii. 2. Remember all his humility and meekness; all his prayers and intercession, with which he had made the following vow. Note, It is not amiss for us to put God in mind of our predecessors in profession, of their afflictions, their services, and their sufferings; of God's covenant with them, the experiences they have had of his goodness, the care they took of, and the many prayers they put up for, those that should come after them. God had made it to David, the Son of Dav- id, and to all his afflictions; "Lord, remember my- nant made with him, and the satisfaction made by him; Remember all his operations, (Ps. xx. 5.) all his sufferings."

He especially pleads the solemn vow that David had made as soon as ever he was settled in his government, and before he was well settled in a house of his own, that he would build a house for God. Gen. xxii. 17.

(1.) Whom he bound himself to; to the Lord, to the mighty God of Jacob. Vows are to be made to God, who is a Party as well as a Witness. The Lord is the mighty One of Jacob; Jacob's God, and a mighty One, whose power is engaged for Jacob's defence and deliverance. Jacob is weak, but the God of Jacob is a mighty One.

(2.) What he bound himself to do; to find out a place for the Lord, for the ark, the token of his presence. He had observed in the law frequent mention of the place that God would choose to put his name there, to which all the tribes should resort. When he came to the crown, there was no such place, Shiloh was deserted, and no other place was pitched upon, for want of which the feasts of the Lord were not kept with due solemnity. "Well," says David, "I will find out such a place for the general rendezvous of all the tribes, a place of habi- tation for the mighty One of Jacob, a place for the ark, where there shall be room both for the priests and people to attend upon it."

(3.) How intent he was upon it; he would not settle in his house; nay, he would not sleep in his bed, till he had brought this matter to some head, v. 3, 4. The thing had been long talked of, and nothing done, till at last David, when he went out one morning about public business, made a vow, that before night he would come to a resolution in this matter, and would determine the place either where the tent should be pitched for the reception of the ark, at the beginning of his reign, or rather, where Solomon should build the temple, which was not fixed till the latter end of his reign, just after the pestilence with which he was punished for num- bering the people; (1 Chron. xxii. 1.) Then David said, This is the house of the Lord. And perhaps it was upon occasion of that judgment that he made this vow, being apprehensive that one of God's con- troversies with him was for his dilatoriness in this matter. Note, When needful work is to be done for God, it is good for us to task ourselves, and tie ourselves to a time, because we are apt to put off. It is good in the morning to cut out work for the day, binding ourselves that we will do it before we sleep, only with submission to Providence; for we know not what may befall us to-morrow. Lastly, the great work of conversion to God; we must be thus solicitous, thus zealous; we have good reason to re- solve that we will not enjoy the comforts of this life, till we have laid a foundation for hopes of a better.

That it was in pursuance of the expectations of the people of Israel, v. 6, 7. (1.) They were in- quisitive after the ark; for they lamented its obse- rity, 1 Sam. vii. 2. They heard of it at Ephraim, at Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, there they were told it had been, but it was gone; they found it at last in the fields of the wood, in Kirjath-jearim, which signifies the city of woods. Thence all Israel fetched it, with great solemnity, in the beginning of David's reign, (1 Chron. xii. 8) so that in building this house for the ark, Solomon had gratified all Is- rael; they needed not to go about to seek the ark any more, they now knew where to find it. (2.) They were resolved to attend to it; "Let us but have a conven- ient place, and we will go into his tabernacle, to pay our homage there; we will worship at his foot- stool, as subjects and suppliants; which we neglected to do, for want of such a place, in the days of Saul." 1 Chron. xiii. 5.

11. What he prays for, v. 8-10.

1. That God would vouchsafe, not only to take possession of, but to take up his residence in, this temple which he had built. Arise, O Lord, into thy rest, and let this be it, thou, even the ark of thy strength, the pledge of thy presence, thy mighty presence.

That God would give grace to the ministers of the sanctuary to do their duty: Let thy priests be clothed with white robes; let thy ministers, who appear righteous both in their administrations and in their conversations, and let both be according to the rule. Note, Righteousness is the best ornament of a minister. Holiness towards God, and goodness towards all men, are habits for ministers, of the necessity of which there is no dispute. "They are thy priests, and will therefore discriminate their relation to thee, if they be not clothed with righteousness."

That the people of God might have the comfort of the due administration of holy ordinances among them; Let thy saints shout for joy; they did so when the ark was brought into the city of David; (2 Sam. vi. 15.) they will do so when the priests are clothed with righteousness. A faithful ministry is the joy of the saints; it is the matter of it; it is a friend and a furtherance to it; we are helpers of your joy, 2 Cor. i. 24.

3. The Solomon's own prayer, upon occasion of the dedicating of the temple, might be accepted of God; "Turn not away the face of thine anointed; deny me not the things I have asked of thee; send me not away ashamed. He pleads, (1.) That he was the anointed of the Lord, and this he pleads as a type of Christ, the great Anointed, who, in his intercession, urges his designation to his office. He is God's Anointed, and therefore the Father hears him always. (2.) That he was the son of David; "For his sake do not deny me," and this is the Christ's plea; "For the sake of Christ," (our David,) "in whom thou art well pleased, accept me." He is David, whose name signifies beloved; and we are made accepted in the Beloved. He is God's Serv- ant, whom he upholds, Isa. xlii. 1. We have no merit of our own to plead, but, for his sake, in whom there is a fulness of merit, let us find favour. When we pray for the prosperity of the church, we may with great boldness, for Christ's sake, who pur- chased the church with his own blood; let both ministers and people do their duty.
14. This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it. 15. I will abundantly bless her provision: I will satisfy her poor with bread. 16. I will also clothe her priests with salvation; and her saints shall shout aloud for joy. 17. There will I make the horn of David to bud: I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed. 18. His enemies will I clothe with shame; but upon himself shall his crown flourish.

These are precious promises, confirmed by an oath, that the heirs of them might have strong consolation, Heb. vi. 17, 18. It is all one whether we take them as pleas urged to the prayer, or as answers returned to the prayer; believers know how to make use of the promises both ways; with them to speak to God, and in them to hear what God the Lord will speak to us. These promises relate to the establishment both in church and state, both to the throne of the house of David, and to the testimony of Israel fixed on mount Zion. The promises concerning Zion's hill are as applicable to the gospel-church, as these concerning David's seed are to Christ; both were made pleasurable by us, and very comfortable to us. Here is:

1. The choice blessings God has in store for David's house, and Zion hill. Both were of divine appointment.

1. God chose David's family for the royal family, and confirmed his choice by an oath, v. 11, 12. David, being a type of Christ, was made king with an oath, The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, will not turn from it. Did David swear to the Lord, that he would build him a house? (v. 2.) The Lord swore to David that he would build him a house; for God will be with him, and none of his people in afflictions or assurances. The promise made to David refers, (1.) To a long succession of kings that should descend from his loins; Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne, which was fulfilled in Solomon: David himself lived to see it with great satisfaction, 1 Kings i. 48. The crown was also vacated continually upon his heirs by prefixed conditions: If thy children, in following ages, will keep my covenant, and my testimony that I shall teach them; God himself engages to teach them, and he did his part; they had Moses and the prophets, and all he expects, is, that they should keep what he taught them, and keep to it, and then, their children shall sit upon thy throne for evermore. Kings are before God upon their good behaviour, and their commission from him runs quandam ex benevolentis et during good behaviour. The issue of this was, that they did not keep God's covenant, and so the entail was at length cut off, and the sceptre departed from Judah by degrees. (2.) To an everlasting Successor, a King that should descend from his loins, of the increase of whose government and praise there shall be no end. St. Peter applies this to Christ, nay, he tells us, that David himself so understood it; (Acts ii. 30.) He knew that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ c. sit on his throne; and in the fulness of time he did so, and gave him the throne of his father David, Luke i. 32. He did fulfill the condition of the promise, he kept God's covenant and his testimony, did his Father's will, and in all things pleased him, and therefore to him, and his spiritual seed, the promise of the horn of David was confirmed; he has given him, all believers, shall sit upon the throne for evermore, Rev. iii. 21.

2. God chose Zion hill for the holy hill, and confirmed his choice by the delight he took in it, v. 15, 14. He chose the mount Zion which he loved; (lxxxvii. 68.) he chose it for the habitation of his ark, and said of it, This is my rest for ever, and not my residence for a time, as Shiloh was. Zion was the city of David, he chose it for the royal city, because God chose it for the holy city. God said, Here will I dwell, and therefore David said, Here will I dwell, for he adhered to his promise, It is good for me to be near to God. Zion must be here looked upon as a type of the gospel-church, which is called mount Zion, (Heb. xii. 22.) and in it what is here said of Zion has its full accomplishment. Zion was long since ploughed as a field, but the church of Christ is the house of the living God, (1 Tim. iii. 15.) and it is his rest for ever, and shall be blessed with his presence always, even to the end of the world. The delight God takes in his church, and the continuance of his presence with his church, are the comfort and joy of all its members.

11. The choice blessings God has in store for David's house, and Zion hill. Whom God chooses he will bless.

1. God, having chosen Zion hill, promises to bless that. (1.) With the blessings of the life that now is; for godliness has the promise of them, v. 15. The hill, which shall be the inheritance of his people, shall appear up, there shall be provision, and in blessing God will bless it; (bxvi. 6.) he will surely and abundantly bless it. And a little provision, with an abundant blessing upon it, will be more serviceable, as well as more comfortable, than a great deal without that blessing. God's people have a special blessing upon common enjoyments, and that blessing puts a peculiar sweetness into them. Nay, the promise goes further; I will satisfy her poor with bread. Zion has her own poor to keep; and it is promised that God will take care even of them. [1.] By his providence they shall be kept from wanting, they shall have provision enough. If there be scarcity, the poor are the first that feel it, so that it is a sure sign of plenty if they have sufficient. Zion's poor shall not want, for God has obliged all the sons of Zion to be charitable to the poor, according to their ability, and the church must take care that they are not neglected, Acts vi. 1. [2.] By his grace, they shall be kept from complaining; though they have but dry bread, yet they shall be satisfied. Zion's poor have, of all others, reason to be content with a little of this world, because they have better things prepared for them. And this may be understood spiritually of the provision that is made for the soul, in the word and ordinances; God will abundantly bless that for the nourishment of the new man, and will supply the poor in spirit with the bread of life. What God sanctifies to us, we shall and may be satisfied with.

(2.) With the blessings of the life that is to come, things pertaining to godliness; (v. 16.) which is an answer to the prayer, v. 9. [1.] It was desired that the priests might be clothed with righteousness, it is here promised that God will clothe them with the raiment of salvation; not only save them to everlasting salvation, but make them instrumental for the salvation of his people; they shall both save themselves and them that hear them, and add those to the church that shall be saved. Note, Whom God clothes with righteousness he will clothe with salvation; we must pray for righteousness, and then with it God will give salvation. [2.] It was desired that the saints might shout for joy; it is promised that they shall shout aloud for joy. God gives us a foretaste of the joy, when he gives salvation he will give an abundant joy.

2. God, having chosen David's family, here promises to bless that also with suitable blessings.

(1.) Growing power; There, in Zion, will I make the horn of David to bud, v. 17. The royal dig nity shall increase more and more, and constant additions be made to the lustre of it. Christ is the Horn of salvation, denoting a plentiful and powersful salvation, which God has raised up, and made to bud, in the house of his servant David. David had promised to use his power for God's glory, to cut down the horns of the wicked, and to exalt the horns of the righteous: (lxv. 10.) in recompense for it, God here promises to make his horn to bud, for them that have power, and use it well, more shall be given.

(3.) Lasting honour; I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed. Thou wilt light my candle: (xviii.
28.) that lamp is likely to burn bright which God ordains. A lasting successor; for, when a lamp is put out, another may be lighted by it: it is a succession; for by this means David shall not want a man to stand before God. Christ is the Lamp and the Light of the world.

(3.) Complete victory; His enemies, who have formed designs against him, will I clothe with shame, when they shall see their designs baffled. Let this enemies of all good govern our expectation to be clothed with shame, and especially the enemies of the Lord Jesus Christ, and his government, who shall rise, in the great day, to everlasting shame and contempt.

(4.) Universal prosperity; Upon himself shall his crown flourish; his government shall be more and more his honour. This was to have its full accomplishment in Jesus Christ, whose crown of honour and power shall never fade, nor the flowers of it wither. The crowns of earthly princes endure not to all generations: (Ixxv. 22.) but Christ's crown shall endure to all eternity, and the crowns reserved for his faithful subjects are such as fade not away.

PSALM CXXXIII.

This psalm is a brief encomium on unity and brotherly love, which, if we did not see the miseries of discord among men, we should think needless: but we cannot say too much, it was well if we could say enough, to persuade people to live together in peace. Some conjeture that David penned it upon occasion of the peace that was made, when the tribes, after the slaughter of the sons of Ishbosheth, were united, and the house of David was crowned with glory for a very long time. The doctrine laid down is, that peace and unity is a blessing to all nations; and that doctrine, in the two ancient languages, v. 1., 2. 3. III. The proof of it, in a good reason given for it, (v. 3.) and then we are left to make the application, which we ought to do in singing it, provoking ourselves and one another to holy love. The contents of this psalm, in our Bibles, are short, but very proper; it is the benefit of the communion of saints.

A song of degrees of David.

1. Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! 2. It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that runn upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that grew down to the skirts of his garments; 3. As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion:
for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for evermore.

Here see, 1. What it is that is commended: brethren's dwelling together in unity; not only not quarrelling, and devouing one another, but delighting in each other with mutual endearments, and promoting each other's welfare with mutual services. Sometimes it is chosen, as the best expedicent for preserving peace, that brethren should live asunder and at a distance from each other; this indeed may prevent enmity and strife, (Gen. xi.
9.) but the goodness and pleasantness are, for brethren to dwell together, and so to dwell in unity; to dwell even as one, so some read it; as having one heart, one soul, one interest. David had many sons by many wives; probably, he penned this psalm for their instruction, to engage them to love one another; which, if they had done, much of the mischief that arose in his family had been happily prevented. The tribes of Israel had long had separate interests, during the government of the judges, and it was not until bad times; now that they were united under one common head, he would have them sensible how much it was likely to be for their advantage; especially since now the ark was fixed, and with it the place of their rendezvous for public worship, and the centre of their unity. Now let them live in love.

2. How commendable it is; Behold, how good and how pleasant it is! It is good in itself, agreeable to the will of God, the conformity of earth to heaven. It is good for us, for our honour and comfort; it is pleasant and pleasing to God and all good men; it brings constant delight to those who do thus live in unity. Behold, how good! We cannot conceive or express the goodness and pleasantness of it. Behold, it is a rare thing, and therefore admirable. Behold, and wonder that there should be so much goodness and pleasantness among men, so much of heaven on earth. How happy are those who are thus united under the same head. Behold, it is an encomium, the praise of such a thing, which will attract our hearts. Behold, it as an exemplary thing, which, where it is, is, to be imitated by us with a holy emulation.

3. How the pleasantness of it is illustrated.
(1.) It is fragrant as the holy anointing oil, which was strongly perfumed, and diffused its sweet smell, to the great delight of all the by-standers, when it was poured upon the head of Aaron, or his successor, the high priest, so pleasant was it when you delved the hand, even to the hair or garment of the dew. 2. [1.] This was holy ointment; such must our brotherly love be, with a pure heart, devoted to God. We must love them that are begotten, for sake that begat, 1 John v. 1. [2.] This oint-mant was a composition made up by a divine dispensary; God appointed the ingredients and the quantities. Thus believers are taught of God to love one another; it is a grace of his working in us.
[3.] It is fragrant, and the like to it was not to be made for any common use. Thus holy love is, in the sight of God, of great price; and that is precious indeed, which is so in God's sight.
[4.] It was grateful, both to Aaron himself and to all about him; so is holy love; it is like ointment and perfume which rejoiceth the heart.
Christ's love to mankind was a part of that oil of gladness with which he was anointed above his fellows.
[5.] It was substantial, and the like to it was not to be made for any common use. Thus holy love is, in the sight of God, of great price; and that is precious indeed, which is so in God's sight.

9. But the goodness and pleasantness are, for brethren to dwell together, and so to dwell in unity; to that it tarryth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men, Mic. v. 7. Nor shall our love to our brethren stay for theirs to us, that is publican's love; but should go before it, that is divine love.

4. The proof of the excellency of brotherly love. Loving people are blessed people. For, (1.) They are blessed of God, and therefore blessed indeed. Those were brethren dwell together in unity, the Lord commands the blessing, a complicated blessing, including all blessings. It is God's prerogative to command the blessings, man can but beg a blessing. Blessings, according to the promise, are commanded blessings, for he has commanded his covenant for ever. Blessings that take effect, are commanded blessings, for he speaks and it is done.

(2.) They are everlastingly blessed. The blessing which God commands on them that dwell in love, is, life for evermore; that is the blessing of blessings. They that dwell in love, not only dwell in God, but do already dwell in heaven. As the perfection of love is the blessedness of heaven, so the sincerity of love is the earnest of that blessedness. They that live in love and peace, shall have the God of love and peace with them now, and they shall be with him shortly, with him for ever in the world of endless love and peace. How good then is it, and how pleasant!

PSALM CXXXIV.

This is the last of the fifteen songs of degrees; and if they were at any time sung all together in the temple-service, it is fitting that the conclusion of them for the design of it is, to stir up the ministers to go on with their work in the night, when the solemnities of the day were over. Some make this psalm to be a dialogue. 1. In the two first verses, the priests or Levites, who sat up all night to keep the watch of the Lord, are called upon to spend their time while they were upon the guard, not in idle talk, but in the acts of devotion. 2. In the last verse, they were thus called upon to praise God, pray for him that gave them the exhortation, either the high priest, or the captain of the guard. Or thus; they who did that service, did mutually exhort one another, and pray for one another. In singing this psalm, we must both stir up ourselves to give glory to God, and encourage ourselves to hope for mercy and grace from him.

A song of degrees.

BEHOLD, bless ye the Lord, all ye servants of the Lord, which by night stand in the house of the Lord. 2. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the Lord. 3. The Lord, that made heaven and earth, bless thee out of Zion.

This psalm instructs us concerning a two-fold blessing: 1. Our blessing God; that is, speaking well of him, which here we are taught to do, v. 1, 2. (1) It is a call to the Levites to do it; they were the servants of the Lord by office, appointed to minister in holy things; they attended the sanctuary, and kept the charge of the house of the Lord, Numb. iii. 6, &c. Some of them did by night stand in the house of the Lord, to guard the holy things of the temple, that they might not be profaned, and the rich things of the temple, that they might not be plundered. While the ark was in curtains, there was the more need of guards upon it. They attended likewise to see that neither the fire on the altar, nor the lamps in the candlestick, went out. Probably, it was lawful for a young Levite to sit up with them; we read of one that departed not from the temple night or day, Luke ii. 37. Now these are here called upon to bless the Lord. Thus they must keep themselves awake by keeping themselves employed; thus they must re-decem time for holy exercises and how can we spend our time better than in praising God? It would be an excellent piece of good husbandry, to fill up the vacancies of time with pious meditations and ejaculations; and surely it is a very modest and reasonable duty that God calls us to, when we have nothing else to do. They who stood in the house of the Lord, must remember where they were, and that holiness and holy work became that house. Let them therefore bless the Lord; let them all do it in concert, or each by himself; let them lift up their hands in the doing of it, in token of their lifting up of their hearts. Let them lift up their hands in holiness, so Dr. Hammond reads it; or in sanctification; as it is fit when they lift them up in the sanctuary. When they that were appointed to wash before they went in to minister, they were thereby taught to lift up holy hands in prayer and praise.

(2.) It is a call to us to do it, who, as Christians, are made priests to our God, and Levites, Isa. lxvi. 21. We are the servants of the Lord, we have a place and a name in his house, in his sanctuary, we stand before him to minister to him, even by night. We are called and consecrated, and have access to him. Let us therefore bless the Lord, and his name; think and speak of his glory and goodness; let us lift up our hands in prayer, in praise, in vows; let us do our work with diligence and cheerfulness, and an elevation of mind. This exhortation is ushered in with Behold! a note commanding attention. Look about you, Sirs, when you are in God's presence, and conduct yourselves accordingly.

2. God's blessing us, and that is doing well for us, which we are here taught to desire, v. 3. Whether it is the watchmen's blessing their captain, or the Levites' blessing the high priest, or whoever was their chief, as many take it, because it is in the singular number, The Lord bless thee; or whether the blessing is pronounced by one upon many, The Lord bless thee, each of you in particular, thee and thee: you that are blessing God, the Lord bless you; is not material. We may learn, (1.) That we need desire no more to make us happy, than to be blessed of the Lord, for these whom he blesses are blessed indeed. (2.) That blessings out of Zion, spiritual blessings, the blessings of the covenant, and of communion with God, are the best blessings, which we should be most earnest for. (3.) It is a great encouragement to us, when we come to God for a blessing, that it is he who made heaven and earth, and therefore has all the blessings both at his disposal, the upper and nether springs. (4.) We ought to take these blessings with cheerfulness, and love to render to others also; not only, The Lord bless me, but, The Lord bless thee; thus testifying our belief of the fulness of divine blessings, that there is enough for others as well as for us, and our good will also to others. We must pray for them that exhort us. Though the less is blessed of the greater, (Heb. vii. 7) yet the greater must be praised for by the less.

PSALM CXXXV.

This is one of the Hallelujah psalms; this is the title of it, and that is the Amen of it, both its alpha and its omega. 1. It begins with a call to praise God, particularly a call to the servants of the Lord to praise him, as in the foregoing psalms. In the end, v. 4. He is called the God of Jacob, vv. 4, 5. As the God of the whole world, v. 6, 7. As a terrible God to the enemies of Israel, v. 8. As a God of great and powerful matter for praise. God is to be praised, 1. As the God of Jacob, v. 4. 2. As the God of gods, v. 5. 3. As the God of the whole world, v. 6, 7. 4. As a terrible God to the enemies of Israel, v. 8. 5. As a God of great and powerful matter, that he had done for them, and what he would do, v. 12, 14. 6. As the only living God, all other gods being vanity and a lie, v. 13, 18, 11. It concludes with another exhortation to all persons concern'd to praise God, v. 19, 21. In singing this psalm, our hearts must be filled, as well as our mouths, with the high praises of God.
PRAISE ye the Lord. Praise ye his name, O ye servants of the Lord. 2. Ye that stand in the house of the Lord, in the courts of the house of our God, 3. Praise the Lord; for the Lord is good: sing praises unto his name; for it is pleasant. 4. For the Lord hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure.

Here is,
1. The duty we are called to; to praise the Lord, to praise his name, to praise him, and again praise him. We must not only thank him for what he has done for us, but praise him for what he is in himself, and has done for others; take all occasions to speak well of God, and to give his truths and ways a good word.
2. The persons that are called upon to do this; the servants of the Lord, the priests and Levites that stand in his house, and all the devout and pious Israelites that stand in the courts of his house to worship there, v. 2. They have most reason to praise God, who are admitted to the privileges of his house; and they see most reason, who there behold him, that themselves believe them, as from them it is expected, for to that end they enjoy their places. Who should praise him, if they do not?
3. The reasons why we should praise God.
(1.) Because he whom we are to praise is good; and goodness is that which every body will speak well of. He is good to all, and we must give him the praise of that; his goodness is his glory, and we must make mention of it to his glory,
(2.) Because the work is its own wages; Sing praises to his name, for it is pleasant. It is best done with a cheerful spirit, and we shall have the pleasure of having done our duty. It is a heaven upon earth to be praising God; and the pleasure of that should quite put our mouths out of taste for the pleasures of sin.
(3.) Because of the peculiar privileges of God's people; (v. 4.) The Lord hath chosen Jacob to himself; and therefore Jacob is bound to praise him; for therefore God chose a people to himself, that they might be unto him for a name and a praise; Jer. xiii. 11. and therefore Jacob has abundant matter for praise, being thus dignified and distinguished. Israel is God's peculiar treasure above all people; (Exod. xix. 5.) they are his Segullah, a people appropriated to him, and that he has a delight in, precious in his sight, and honourable. For this distinguishing, surprising, favour, if the seed of Jacob do not praise him, they are the most unworthy, ungrateful, people under the sun.
5. For I know that the Lord is great, and that our Lord is above all gods. 6. whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places. 7. He caused the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth: he maketh lightnings for the rain: he bringeth the wind out of his treasuries. 8. Who smote the first-born of Egypt, both of man and beast. 9. Who sent tokens and wonders into the midst of thee, O Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his servants. 10. Who smote great nations, and slew mighty kings: 11. Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan, and all the kingdoms of Canaan: 12. And gave their land for a heritage, a heritage unto Israel his people. 13. Thy name, O Lord, endureth for ever; and thy memorial, O Lord, throughout all generations. 14. For the Lord will judge his people, and he will repent himself concerning his servants.

The psalmist had suggested to us the goodness of God, as the proper matter of our cheerful praises; here he suggests to us the greatness of God, as the proper matter of our awful praises; and on this he is most large, because this we are less forward to consider.
1. He asserts the doctrine of God's greatness; (v. 5.) The Lord is great: great indeed, who knows no limits of time or place. He asserts it with assurance, I know that he is so, and it is easy to observe the proofs of it, but by belief of the revelation of it. I know it; I am sure of it, I know it by my own experience of the divine greatness working on my soul. He asserts it with a holy defiance of all pretenders, though they should join in confederacy against him; he is not only above any god, but above all gods, infinitely above them, twixt him and them there is no comparison.
2. He has made him to be a great God, by the greatness of his power, v. 6. 1. He has an absolute power, and may do what he will; Whatever the Lord pleased, that did he, and none could control him, or say unto him, What does thou? He does what he pleases, because he pleases, and gives not account of any of his matters. 2. He has an almighty power, and can do what he will; if he will work, none shall hinder. 3. This absolute almighty power is of universal extent; he doeth what he will in heaven, in earth, in the seas and all deep places that are in the bottom of the sea or the bowels of the earth. The gods of the heathen can do nothing; but our God can do any thing, and does do every thing.

III. He gives instances of his great power.
1. In the kingdom of nature, v. 7. All the powers of nature prove the greatness of the God of nature, and therefore those who are derived, and on whom they depend. The elements of nature are framed by him at first, but is still preserved by him.
(1.) It is by his power that exhalations are drawn up from the terreneous globe; the heat of the sun raises them, but it has that power from God, and therefore it is given as an instance of the glory of God, that nothing is hid from the heat of the sun, xix. 6. He causes the vapours to ascend (not only unhelped, but unseen, by us) from the earth, from the ends of the earth, that is, from the seas, by which the earth is surrounded. (2.) It is he who, out of those vapours so raised, forms the rain, so that the earth is no loser by the vapours it sends up, for they are returned with advantage in fruitful showers. (3.) Out of the same vapours (such is his wonderful power) he makes lightnings for the rain, by them he opens the bottles of heaven, and shakes the clouds, that they may water the earth. Here are fire and water thoroughly reconciled by Divine Omnipotence. They come together, and with the water does not quench the fire, nor the fire lick up the water, as fire from heaven did when God pleased, 1 Kings xviii. 38. (4.) The same exhalations, to serve another purpose, are converted into winds, which blow where they list, from what point of the compass they will, and we are so far from directing them, that we cannot tell whence they come or whither they go, but God brings them out of his treasuries with as much exactness and design as a prudent prince orders money to issue out of his exchequer.
2. In the kingdoms of men; and here he mentions the great things God had formerly done for his people Israel, which were proofs of God's greatness as well as of his goodness, and confirmations of the truth of the scriptures of the Old Testament, which began to be written by Moses, the person employed in working those miracles. Observe God's sovereign dominion, and irresistible power, (1.) In bringing Israel out of Egypt, and delivering them by his power from the plagues, and so directing him to let them go. These plagues are called tokens and wonders, because they came not in the common course of providence, but there was something miraculous in each of them. They were sent upon Pharaoh and all his servants, his subjects; but the Israelites, whom God claimed for his servants, his sons, his first-born, his free-born, were exempted from them, and no plague came nigh their dwelling. The death of the first-born both of men and cattle, was the heaviest of all the plagues, and that which gained the point. (2.) In destroying the kingdoms of Canaan before them, v. 10. They that were in possession of the land designed for Israel, had all possible advantages for keeping possession; the people were numerous, and warlike, and confederate against Israel; they were great nations. Yet if a great nation has a meek and mean-spirited prince, it lies exposed; but these great nations had mighty kings, and yet they were all smitten and slain; Sihon and Og, and all the kingdoms of Canaan, v. 10, 11. No power of hell or earth can prevent the accomplishment of the promise of God, when the time, the set time, for it, is come. (3.) In settling them in the land of promise. He that gives kingdoms to whomsoever he pleases, gave Canaan to be a heritage to Israel his people. It came to them by inheritance, for their ancestors had the promise of it, though not the possession. and it is described as an inheritance to their seed. This was done long before, yet God is now praised for it; and with good reason, for the children were now enjoying the benefit of it.

IV. He triumphs in the perpetuity of God's glory and grace. 1. Of his glory; (v. 13.) Thy name, O God, endures for ever. God's manifestations of himself to his people have everlasting fruits and consequences. What God doeth, it shall be for ever, Exod. xix. 5. He that has made the heavens and earth, in the constant and everlasting praises of his people, his memorial endures, has endured hitherto, and shall still endure throughout all generations of the church. This seems to refer to Exod. iii. 15. where, when God had called himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, he adds, This is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations. God is, and will be, always the same to his church, a gracious, faithful, wonder-working God; and his church is and will be, the same to him, a thankful, praising, people; and thus his name endures for ever. 2. Of his grace; he will be kind to his people. (1.) He will plead their cause against others that contend with them; he will judge his people, he will judge for them, and will not suffer them to be run down. (2.) He will not himself contend for ever with them, but will repent himself concerning his servants, and not proceed in his controversy with them, but will be merciful to them, and will be for-}told concerning them; he will return in waves of mercy to them, and will delight to do them good. This verse is taken from the song of Moses, Dcut. xxxiii. 36.

15. The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. 16. They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not; 17. They have ears, but they hear not; neither is there any breath in their mouths. 18

They that make them are like unto them, so is every one that trusteth in them. 19.

Bless the Lord, O house of Israel: bless the Lord, O house of Aaron: 20. Bless the Lord, O house of Levi: ye that fear the Lord, bless the Lord. 21. Blessed be the Lord out of Zion, which dwelleth at Jerusalem. Praise ye the Lord.

The design of these verses is, 1. To arm the people of God against idarity and all false worship, by showing what sort of gods they were that the heathen worshipped, as we had it before, exv. 4, &c. (1.) They were gods of their own making; being so, they could have no power but what their makers gave them; and then, what power could their makers receive from them? The images were the work of men's hands, and the deities that were supposed to inform them, were as much the creatures of men's fancy and imagination. (2.) They had the shape of animals, but could not perform the least act, no not of the animal life. They could neither see, nor hear, nor speak, nor so much as breathe; and therefore to make them with eyes, and ears, and mouths, and nostrils, was such a jest, that one could wonder how reasonable creatures could ever have been so foolish as to expect any good from such mock-deities. (3.) Their worshippers were therefore as stupid and senseless as they were: both those that made them to be worshipped, and those that trusted in them when they were made, v. 18. The worshipping of such gods as were the objects of sense, and senseless, made the worshippers sensual and senseless. Let our worshipping of a God that is a Spirit, make us spiritual and wise. 2. To stir up the people of God to true devotion in the worship of the true God, v. 19. The more deplorable the condition of the Gentile nations that worship idols is, the more are we bound to thank God that we know better. Therefore, (1.) Let us set ourselves about the acts of devotion, and employ ourselves in them; Bless the Lord, and again, and again, bless the Lord. In the parallel places, (exx. 19, 21.) by this means, we may, from the impotency of idols, the duty thus pressed upon us, is, to trust in the Lord; here, to bless him; by putting our trust in God, we give glory to him, and they that depend upon God shall not want matter of thanksgiving to him. All persons that knew God are here called to praise him: the house of Israel, the nation in general; the house of Aaron, and the house of Levi, the Lord's ministers that attended in his sanctuary; and all others that feared the Lord, though they were not of the house of Israel. (2.) Let God have the glory of all; Blessed be the Lord. The tribute of praise arises out of Zion; all God's works do praise him, but his saints bless him; and they need not go far to pay their tribute, for he dwells in Jerusalem, in his church, which they are members of, so that he is always nigh unto them to receive their homage. The condescensions of his grace, in dwelling with men upon the earth, call for our grateful and thankful returns, and our repeated Hallelujahs.

PSALM CXXXVI.

The scope of this psalm is the same with that of the foregoing psalm, but there is something very singular in the composition of it; for the latter half of each verse is the same, repeated throughout the psalm, for his mercy endures for ever, and yet no vain repetition. It is allowed that such burthen, or keepings, as we call them, add very much to the beauty of a song, and help to make i Give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.
1. O give thanks unto the Lord of lords: for his mercy endureth for ever.
2. O give thanks unto the God of gods: for his mercy endureth for ever.
3. O give thanks to the Lord of lords: for his mercy endureth for ever.
4. To him who alone doeth great wonders: for his mercy endureth for ever.
5. To him that by wisdom made the heavens: for his mercy endureth for ever.
6. To him that stretched out the earth above the waters: for his mercy endureth for ever.
7. To him that made great lights: for his mercy endureth for ever:
8. The sun to rule by day: for his mercy endureth for ever:
9. The moon and stars to rule by night: for his mercy endureth for ever.

Give thanks to the Lord, for he is good:
1. We must give thanks to God for his goodness and mercy; (v. 1.) Give thanks to the Lord, not only because he is good, but because he is good; all the streams must be run over, and waters must not only because he is merciful to us, but because his mercy endures for ever, and will be drawn out to those that shall come after us. We must give thanks to God, not only for that mercy which is now handed out to us here on earth, but for that which shall endure for ever in the glories and joys of heaven.

More particularly, [1.] He made the heavens, and stretched them out, and in them we not only see his wisdom and power, but we taste his mercy in their beneficent influences; as long as the heavens endure, the mercy of God endures in them, v. 5.
[2.] He raised the earth out of the waters, when he caused the dry land to appear, that it might be fit to be a habitation for man, and therein also his mercy to man still endures; (v. 6.) for the earth will he give to the children of men, and all its products.
[3.] Having made both heaven and earth, he settled a correspondence between them, notwithstanding their distance, by making the sun, moon, and stars, which he placed in the firmament of heaven, to shed their light and influences upon this earth, v. 7.-9. These are called the great lights, because they appear so to us, for, otherwise, astronomers tell us, that the moon is less than many of the stars, but, being nearer to the earth, it seems much greater. They are said to rule, not only because they govern the seasons of the year, but because they are useful to the world, and benefactors are the best rulers, Luke xxii. 25. But the empire is divided; one rule by day, the other by night, (at least, the stars,) and yet all are subject to God's direction and disposal. Those rulers, therefore, which the Gentiles idolized, are the world's servants, and God's subjects; Sun, stand thou still, and thou, moon.

10. To him that smote Egypt in their first-born: for his mercy endureth for ever:
11. And brought out Israel from among them: for his mercy endureth for ever:
12. With a strong hand, and with a stretched-out arm: for his mercy endureth for ever.
13. To him which divided the Red Sea into parts: for his mercy endureth for ever:
14. And made Israel to pass through the midst of it: for his mercy endureth for ever:
15. But overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea: for his mercy endureth for ever.
16. To him which led his people through the wilderness: for his mercy endureth for ever.
17. To him which smote great kings: for his mercy endureth for ever:
18. And slew famous kings: for his mercy endureth for ever:
19. Sihon king of the Amorites: for his mercy endureth for ever:
20. And Og the king of Bashan: for his mercy endureth for ever:
21. And gave their land for a

22. Even a heritage unto Israel his servant:
for his mercy endureth for ever.

The great things God did for Israel, when he first formed them into a people, and set up his kingdom among them, are here mentioned, as often elsewhere in the Psalms, as instances both of the power of God, and of the particular kindness he had for Israel. See cxvii. 8, &c.

1. He brought them out of Egypt, v. 10-12.
That was a mercy which endured long to them, and our redemption by Christ, which was typified by that, is for ever, and an eternal redemption. Of all the plagues of Egypt, none is mentioned but the death of the first-born, because that was the conquering plague; by that, God, who, in all the plagues, distinguished the Israelites from the Egyptians, brought them last from among them; not by a wise, but with a strong hand, and an arm stretched out to reach for, and do great things. These miracles of mercy, as they proved Moses's commission to give law to Israel, so they laid Israel under lasting obligations to obey that law, Exod. xx. 2.

2. He forced them a way through the Red sea, which obstructed them at their first setting out. By the power he has to control the common course of nature, he divided the sea into two parts, between which he opened a path, and made Israel to pass between the parts, now that they were to enter into covenant with him; see Jer. xxxiv. 18. He not only divided the sea, but gave his people courage to go through it when it was divided; which was an instance of God's power over men's hearts, as the former of his power over the waters. And, to make it a miracle of justice as well as mercy, the same Red sea that was a lane to the Israelites, was a grave to their pursuers. There he shook off Pharaoh and his host.

3. He conducted them through a vast howling wilderness; (v. 16) there he fed them and fed them; their camp was victuall'd and fortified by a constant series of miracles for forty years; though they loitered and wandered there, they were not lost. And in this, the mercy of God, and the constancy of that mercy, were the more observable, because they often provoked him in the wilderness, and grieved him in the desert.

4. He destroyed kings before them, to make room for them; (v. 17, 18.) not deposed and banished them, but smote and slew them; in which appeared his wrath against them, but his mercy, his never-failing mercy, to Israel. And that which magnified it, was, that they were great kings and famous kings, yet God subdued them as easily as if they had been the least, and weakest, and meanest, of the children of men. They were wicked kings, a id then their grandeur and lustre would not secure them from God. The more great and famous they were, the more did God's mercy to Israel appear in giving such kings for them. Sihon and Og are particularly mentioned, because they were the two first that were conquered on the other side Jordan, v. 19, 20. It is good to enter into the detail of God's favours, and not to view them in the gross; and in each instance to observe, and own, the God's mercy endureth for ever.

5. He put them in possession of good land, v. 21, 22. He, whose the earth is, and the fulness thereof, the world, and they that dwell therein, took land from one people and gave it to another, as pleased him. The ingenuity of the Amorites was now full, and therefore it was taken from them; Israel was his servant, and though they had been provoking in the wilderness, yet he intended to have some service out of them, for to them pertained the service of God. As he said to the Egyptians, let my people go, so to the Canaanites, let my people in, that they may serve me. In this, God's mercy to them endureth for ever, because it was a figure of the heavenly Canaan, the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

1. In the redemption of his church; (v. 25, 24.) in the many redemptions wrought for the Jewish church, out of the hands of their oppressors; when, in the years of their servitude, their estate was very low, God remembered them, and raised them up savours, the judges, and David, at length, by whom God gave them rest from all their enemies; but especially in the great redemption of the universal church, of which these were types, we have a great deal of reason to say; "He remembered us, the children of Abraham; forsaking us in our low estate, for his mercy endureth for ever: he sent his Son to redeem us from sin, and death, and hell, and all our spiritual enemies; for his mercy endureth for ever; he was sent to redeem us, and not the angels that sinned; for his mercy endureth for ever."

2. In the provision he makes for all the creatures; (v. 25.) He giveth food to all flesh. It is an instance of the mercy of God's providence, that, wherever he has given life, he gives food agreeable and sufficient; and he is a good Housekeeper, that provides for so large a family.

3. In all his glories, and all his gifts; (v. 26.) Give thanks to the God of heaven; this denotes him to be a glorious God, and the glory of his mercy is to be taken notice of in our praises; the riches of his glory are displayed in the vessels of his mercy, Rom. ix. 23. It also denotes him to be the great benefactor, for every good and perfect gift is from above, from the Father of lights. He is the Father of light, and we should trace every stream to the fountain; this and that particular mercy may perhaps endure but a while, but the mercy that is in God endureth for ever; it is an inexhaustible fountain.

PSALM CXXXVII.

There are divers psalms which are thought to have been penned in the latter days of the Jewish church, when prophecy was near expiring, and the canon of the Old Testament ready to be closed up; but none of them appears so plainly to be of a late date as this, which was penned when the people of God were captives in Babylon, and there insulted over by their proud oppressors; probably it was toward the latter end of their captivity, for now they saw the destruction of Babylon hastening on apace, (v. 8.) which would be their discharge. It is a mournful psalm, a lamentation; and the Septuagint makes it one of the lamentations of Jeremiah, naming him for the author of it. Here, I. The melancholy captives cannot enjoy themselves, v. 1, 2. II. They cannot humour their proud oppressors, v. 3, 4. III. They cannot forget Jerusalem, v. 5, 6. IV. They cannot forgive Edom and Babylon, v. 7-9. In singing this psalm, we must be much affected with the concernsments of the church, especially that part of it that is in affliction, laying the sorrows of God's people near our hearts, comforting ourselves in the prospect of the deliverance of the church, and the ruin of its enemies, in due time, but carefully avoiding all personal animosities, and not mixing the leaven of malice with our sacrifices.
By the rivers of Babylon there we sat down; yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion. 2. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof. 3. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion. 4. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? 5. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. 6. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.

We have here the daughter of Zion covered with a cloud, and dwelling with the daughter of Babylon; the people of God in tears, but sowing in tears. 1. The mournful posture they were in, as to their affairs, and as to their spirits.
1. They were posted by the rivers of Babylon, in a strange land, and a great way from their own country, whence they were brought as prisoners of war; the land of Babylon was now a house of bondage to that people, as Egypt had been in their beginning. Their conquerors quartered them by the rivers, with design to employ them there, and keep them to work in their gallicies; or perhaps they chose it as the most melancholy place, and therefore most suitable to their sorrowful spirits. If they must build houses there, (Jer. xxxix. 5.) it shall not be in the cities, the places of converse, but by the rivers, the places of solitude, where they might mingle their tears with the streams. We find some of them by the river Chebar. (Ezek. i. 3.) others by the river Ulai, 2. They sat down to indulge their grief, by poring on their miseries. Jeremiah had taught them under this yoke to sit alone, and keep silence, and put their mouths in the dust, Lam. iii. 28, 29. We sat down, as those that expected to stay, and were content, since it is the will of God that it must be so.
3. Thoughts of Zion drew tears from their eyes: and it was not a sudden passion of weeping, such as we are wont to beguile away by a glass; it not surprizes us, but they were deliberate tears; we sat down and wept, tears with consideration. We wept when we remembered Zion, the holy hill on which the temple was built. Their affection to God's house swallowed up their concern for their own houses. They remembered Zion's former glory, and the satisfaction they had in Zion's courts, Lam. vii. Jerusalem remembered, in the days of her misery, all her pleasant things which she had in the days of old, Ps. xlii. 4. They remembered Zion's present desolations, and favoured the dust thereof, which was a good sign that the time for God to favour it was not far off, ci. 13, 14.
4. They lay by their instruments of music; (v. 2.) We hanged our harps upon the willows. (1.) The harps they used for their own diversion and entertainment; these they had laid aside both because it was the manner of those that ought not to use them, that God called to weeping and mourning, (Isa. xxi. 12.) and their spirits were so sad, that they had no hearts to use them; they brought their harps with them, designing perhaps to use them for the alleviating of their grief, but it proved so great, that it would not admit the experiment; music makes some people melancholy; As vinegar upon nitre, so is he that sings songs to a heavy heart. (2.) The harps they used in God's worship, the Levites; these they did not throw away, hoping they might yet again have occasion to use them, though they had no present use for them; God had cut them out a passage through them, by both hands, to sweet songs and lamentations, and their songs into lamentations, Amos viii. 10. Every thing is beautiful in its season. They did not hide their harps in the bushes, or the hollows of the rocks; but hung them up in view, that the sight of them might affect them with this deplorable change. Yet perhaps they were faulty in doing this; for praising God is never out of season, it is his will that we should in everything give thanks, (1. Thess. v. 16.) II. The abuses which their enemies put upon them when they were in this melancholy condition, v. 5. They had carried them away captive from their own land, and then wasted them in the land of their captivity, took what little they had from them; but this was not enough; to complete their woes, they insulted over them, they required of us mirth and a song. Now, 1. This was very barbarous and inhuman; even an enemy, in misery, is to be pitied, and not trampled upon. It argues a base and scroful spirit to upbraid those that are in distress either with their former joys or with their present grievances, or to challenge those to be merry, who, we know, are out of tune for it; this is adding affliction to the afflicted. 2. It was very profane and impious; no songs would serve them but the songs of Zion, with which God had been hallowed; so that in this demand they reflected upon God himself, as Belsazar when he drank wine in temple-bowls. Their enemies mocked at their sabbaths, Lam. i. 7.
III. The patience wherewith they bore their abuses, v. 4. They had laid by their harps, and would not resume them, no act to ingratiate themselves with those at whose mercy they lay; they would not answer those fools according to their folly. Profane scoffers are not to be humour'd, nor pears cast before swine. David prudently kept silence even from good, when the wicked were before him, who, he knew, would ridicule what he said, and make a jest of it, Ps. xxxix. 1, 2. The reason they gave is very mild and pious; How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? They do not say, "How shall we sing, when we are so much in sorrow?" If that had been all, they might perhaps have put a force upon themselves, so far as to take some measure to revenge their losses, by a song; but this is a sacred thing, it is peculiar to the temple-service, and therefore we dare not sing it in the land of a stranger, among idolaters. We must not serve common mirth, much less profane mirth, with any thing that is appropriated to God, who is sometimes to be honoured by a religious silence as well as by religious speaking.
IV. The constant affection they retained for Jerusalem, though they were in Babylon. Though their enemies banter them for talking so much of Jerusalem, and even doting upon it, their love to it is not in the least abated; it is what they may be jeered for, but will never be jeered out of, v. 5, 6. Observe, 1. How these pious captives stared affected to Jerusalem; (1.) Their heads were full of it; it was always in their minds, they remembered it, they did not forget it, though the rest of their poor condition was so great; they had never seen it, nor knew any thing of it but by report, and by what they had read in the scripture, yet it was graven upon the palms of their hands, and even its ruins were continually before them, which was an evidence of their faith in the promise of its restoration in due time. In their daily prayers, they opened their windows toward Jerusalem; and how then could they forget it? (2.) Their hearts were full of it; they preferred it above their chief joy, and therefore they remembered it.
and could not forget it. What we love, we love to think of. They that rejoice in God, do, for his sake, make Jerusalem their joy, and prefer it before that, whatever it is, which is the head of their joy, which is dearest to them in this world. A godly man will prefer a public good before any private satisfaction or gratification whatsoever.

2. How steadfastly they resolved to keep up this affection, we see by a solemn imprecation, a mischief to themselves if they should let it fall; "Let me be forever disabled, either to sing or play on the harp, if I so far forget the religion of my country as to make use of my songs and harps for the pleasing of Babylon’s sons, or the praising of Babylon’s gods. Let my right hand forget her art,“ (which the hand of an expert musician never can, unless it were withered,) “may, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, we have not a good word to say for Jerusalem, wherever I am.” Though they dare not sing Zion’s songs among the Babylonians, yet they cannot forget them, but as soon as ever the present restraint is taken off, they will sing them as readily as ever, notwithstanding the long disuse.

7. Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom in the day of Jerusalem; who said, Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof. 8. O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall he be that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us. 9. Happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones.
